SIR—On last evening I returned from Pensacola to this place—I reached that post on the evening of the 6th. On my approach, I sent major Pierre with a flag to communicate the object of my visit to the governor of Pensacola. He approached fort St. George, with his flag displayed, and was fired on by the cannon from the fort—he returned and made report thereof to me. I immediately went with the adjutant general and the major with a small escort, and viewed the fort and found it defended by British and Spanish troops. I immediately determined to storm the town, retired and encamped my troops for the night, and made the necessary arrangements to carry my determination into effect the next day.

On the morning of the 7th I marched with the effective regulars of the 3d, 39th, and 44th infantry, part of general Coffee's brigade, the Mississippi dragoons, and part of the West Tennessee regiment, commanded by lieutenant colonel Hammonds (colonel Lowry having deserted and gone home) and part of the Choctaws led by major Blue, of the 39th and major Kennedy of Mississippi territory. Being encamped on the west of the town I calculated they would expect the assault from that quarter, and be prepared to rake me from the fort, and the British armed vessels, seven in number, that lay in the bay. To cherish this idea I sent out part of the mounted men to show themselves on the west whilst I passed in rear of the fort undiscovered to the east of the town. When I appeared within a mile, I was in full view. My pride was never more heightened than viewing the uniform firmness of my troops, and with what undivided courage they advanced, with a strong fort ready to assail them on the right, 7 British armed vessels on the left, strong blockhouses and batteries of cannon in their front, but they still advanced with unshaken firmness, entered the town, when a battery of two cannon was opened upon the centre column composed of the regulars, with ball and grape, and a shower of musketry from the houses and gardens. The battery was immediately stormed by capt. Levall and company, and carried, and the musketry was soon silenced by the steady and well directed fire of the regulars.

The governor met cols. Williamson and Smith, who led the dismounted volunteers, with a flag, begged for mercy, and surrendered the town and fort unconditionally; mercy was granted and protection given to the citizens and their property—and still Spanish treachery kept us out of possession of the fort until 12 o'clock at night.

Never was more cool, determined bravery displayed by any troops; and the Choctaws advanced to the charge with equal bravery. On the morning of the 8th I prepared to march and storm the Barancas, but before I could move tremendous explosions told me that the Barancas, with all its appendages, was blown up. I dispatched a detachment of two hundred men to explore it, who returned in the night with the information that it was blown up, all the combustible parts burnt, the cannon spiked and dismounted, except two: this being the case I determined to withdraw my troops, but before I did I had the pleasure to see the British depart. Colonel Nicholls abandoned the fort on the night of the 6th, and betook himself to his shipping, with his friend capt. Woodbine, and their red friends.

The steady firmness of my troops has drawn a just respect from our enemies—it has convinced the Red Sticks that they have no strong hold or protection, only in the friendship of the United States—the good order and conduct of my troops whilst in Pensacola, has convinced the Spaniards of our friendship, and our prowess, and has drawn from the citizens an expression, that our Choctaws are more civilized than the British.

In great haste, I am respectfully, sir,

ANDREW JACKSON.

Extract of a letter from brigadier-general M. Arthur, to the secretary of war, dated Head-quarters, 8th military district, Detroit, 18th Nov. 1814.

SIR—I have the satisfaction to report to you the safe return of the mounted troops to this place on the 17th inst.

In a former communication I had the honor to inform you, that the mounted volunteers were marched in this direction in consequence of the regular troops having been withdrawn, and the apprehensions that were entertained for the safety of this territory, of which I was advised by his excellency gov. Cass.

The militia detached from Kentucky and Ohio, having arrived, they were assigned for the immediate protection of this place; it was then deemed expedient from the ardor and species of the force, that the mounted volunteers should be actively employed in the territory of the enemy, with a view to destroy their resources and ultimately paralyze any efforts which might be made against this place during the winter.

The valuable mills at the head of lake Ontario, and in the vicinity of Grand River, furnished large supplies to the army in the peninsula; their destruction was desirable. To that effect the mounted troops consisting of 600 volunteers, 50 U. States' rangers and 70 indians were put in motion on the 22d October, to pursue the route along the western shore of lake St. Clair, and pass into the enemy's territory near the mouth of that river.

The real object of the expedition was masked by the general impression, that it was destined against the Indian towns at Sagunna. To favor that idea, boats were prepared for the reception of artillery to be conveyed through lake St. Clair, up that river into lake Huron, and to co-operate with the mounted troops in the attack. The boats were, however, employed in the transportation of the troops and horses across the river St. Clair and Bear creek, which empties into Beldoon river. This movement was absolutely necessary to secure that secrecy to the expedition which could alone render it successful. All military movements in this direction are rapidly communicated to the enemy from Sandwich and this place; it was, therefore deemed improper to pass the troops across this river, but to proceed over the river St. Clair, down to the Scotch settlement on the Beldoon, up Bear creek about 30 miles, and across to the Moravian towns, a few miles above the lower settlement on the Thames, where the detachment arrived on the 30th of Oct.

We were very fortunate at this place in taking a sergeant in the British service, who was proceeding to Burlington, with the information that the detachment had passed into the enemy's territory. The capture of this sergeant at the commencement of the "Long Woods," between the Moravian towns and Delaware, enabled us to reach the latter place undiscovered. On our approach the rangers were detached to move across the Thames below the settlement, pass in the rear of it, and guard the different roads leading into the interior, whilst the troops were engaged in swimming their horses and transporting their baggage on rafts.

We were thus enabled to arrive at the town of Oxford, one hundred and fifty miles distant from Detroit, before the inhabitants knew that a force was approaching. They were promised protection to their persons and property, upon condition that they remained peaceably at their respective homes; otherwise, they were assured that their property should be destroyed.

However, notwithstanding this injunction and the sacred obligations of a previous parole, two of the inhabitants escaped to Burford, with the intelligence of our arrival. Their property, consisting of two dwelling houses, two barns and one shop, were instantly consumed.

On the succeeding day, the 15th inst. the detachment proceeded to Burford, where we were informed that the militia had been embodied about ten days previously to our arrival, in consequence of reports received from Sandwich that an expedition was expected to move from Detroit against Burlington.

A few hours before our arrival, the enemy retreated from Burford to Malcolm's mills, ten miles distant, on the road leading from Dover to Burlington, where they were joined by the militia from Long Point.

It was my intention to cross Grand river as soon as possible, without regarding the militia collected at Malcolm's mills, and attack Burlington. To my great mortification upon our arrival at the river, we found it high and rapid from the late excessive rains, and learned that general Brown had recrossed the Niagara, leaving only a strong garrison in fort Erie. No means were presented of even passing the river in rafts, and had it been effected, upon our return, the militia, contemptible as they were, might have been encouraged to attack when a rapid river divided us. Major Muir with about fifty indians and fifty militia, was preparing to contest the passage. A battery was also erecting as was understood for three pieces of artillery, distant 12 miles on the road from Burlington.

These considerations presented serious objections to any attempt to pass the river; it was also due to the past sufferings and the future safety of the gallant detachment under my command, that a direction should be given to its movements, calculated to afford compensation for the former and secure the latter.

It was therefore determined upon to attack and defeat or disperse the militia at Malcolm's mills, move down the Long Point road through the Grand river settlement, destroy the valuable mills in that quarter, and then return to our territory either by a movement across Grand river at the mouth to fort Erie, or along Talbot's street to the Thames.

To that effect, a detachment was directed to remain and engage the attention of the enemy, whilst the principal force should be withdrawn and marched to Malcolm's mills. We found the enemy, consisting of four or five hundred militia, and a few Indians, fortified on commanding ground beyond a creek, deep and difficult of passage, except at a bridge immediately in front of their works which had been destroyed. Arrangements were made for a joint attack on the front and rear. The Ohio troops, with the advance guard and indians, were accordingly thrown across the creek under cover of a thick wood, to approach the enemy in rear, whilst the Kentucky troops were to attack in front as soon as the attention of the enemy was engaged by the attack in the rear. The enemy would have been completely surprised and captured had not an unfortunate yell by our Indians announced the approach of the detachment destined to attack their rear; they were, however, defeated and dispersed with the loss in the skirmishes on that day of one captain and seventeen privates killed, nine privates wounded, and three captains, five subalterns and one hundred and three privates made prisoners; whilst our loss was only one killed and six wounded. Early on the 7th inst. the enemy were pursued on the road to Dover, many made prisoners, and five valuable mills destroyed.

Apprehensive that the troops could not be supplied on the route to fort Erie, and that difficulties would occur in the passage of Grand river, together with the uncertainty which existed as to the position of our army below, I was induced on the 8th inst. to commence my return to this place by the way of Talbot street and the Thames; which was happily effected on the 17th inst.

In this excursion, the resources of the enemy have been essentially impaired, and the destruction of the valuable mills in the vicinity of Grand river, employed in the support of the army in the peninsula, together with the consumption of the forage and provisions necessary for the troops, has added to the barrier heretofore interposed by an extensive and swampy frontier against any attempts which may be made this winter in the direction of Detroit.

With the exception of nine thousand rations and eight hundred bushels of forage, the detachment subsisted entirely on the enemy. Of private property, no more was destroyed than was absolutely necessary for the support of the troops, for which regular payments or receipts were given. It is, however, much to be regretted that there were some partial abuses produced by the unfortunate example presented by the Indians, whose customs in war impel them to plunder after victory; but for this blemish there was some excuse in their correct and gallant conduct before and during the battle. It is also gratifying to know that they were forgetful of the atrocious deeds committed by the Indians in the service of the enemy; neither the innocent or disarmed have been massacred or molested.

The honorable deportment of the chiefs, Lewis, Wolfe and Civil John, was truly animating to all the troops.

It was essential to the progress of the expedition that the horses of individuals should be taken to supply the places of those that were disabled and lost on the march—in all cases receipts were given.

The Michigan militia were invited to accompany us on the expedition; not more than twenty accepted it—of those six deserted near Delaware, and the remainder were permitted to return on the next day. Lieutenant Rutland, of captain Audrain's company of Rangers from Detroit, was distinguished for zeal and intrepidity.

The patriotic volunteers under my command, have just claims on the gratitude of their country, when it is recollected that they tendered their services with no other assurance than the approbation which always attends disinterested sacrifices; that they have performed much severe duty at an inclement season, through an extensive and swampy district, frequently intersected with deep and rapid rivers; that they have penetrated two hundred miles into the enemy's territory, destroyed two hundred stand of arms, together with five of their most valuable mills; parolled or dispersed the greater portion of the efficient militia of that part of Upper Canada west of Grand river, and the whole detachment has returned in safety to this place with the exception of one killed.

The ardor which the troops always evinced when they expected to meet the enemy, was not more conspicuous or praiseworthy than the cheerfulness with which they conformed to the rules of military propriety. The officers and privates of the detachment, with a very few exceptions, merited my warmest approbation.

I was much indebted to the zeal and intelligence displayed on all occasions by major Dudley, commanding the Kentucky battalion, and was ably assisted by the zeal and assiduity of Dr. Turner, of the 17th infantry; captain Bradford of the 19th infantry; my brigade-major, already distinguished at fort Meigs and Tehoopaw, is entitled to my sincere thanks for his exertions under every difficulty, and I have the support of the troops in assuring you, sir, that to the military talents, activity and intelligence of major Todd, who acted as my adjutant-general, much of the fortunate progress and issue of this expedition is attributable; and I cheerfully embrace this occasion to acknowledge the important services which he has at all times rendered me whilst in command of the district: his various merits justly entitle him to the notice of government.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

D. McARTHUR,

Brig. gen. U. S. army comd'g.

Hon. James Monroe, secretary of war, Washington.

ENEMY IN THE RAPPAHANNOCK.

On the morning of the 30th ult. a 74 and five frigates appeared off the mouth of the Rappahannock. They manned a number of barges and other small vessels, and proceeded up the river with all their disposable force. The next day they took possession of the village of Tappahannock, without much opposition, the militia coming in too slowly for their rapid movements, capturing on their way several small craft. At this village they burnt the courthouse, jail, collector's office, clerk's office and a large ware-house, and destroyed a great deal of private property. They entered even the tombs and disturbed the ashes of the dead for plunder, especially the family vault of the late colonel Ritchie, breaking open the coffers, and leaving their contents mutilated and exposed. They received many negroes into their "holy" alliance, and permitted the black, as well as their own white miscreants, to indulge themselves as they liked, wontonly destroying what they could not conveniently carry away, such as furniture, windows, &c. looking glasses were thrown against looking glasses, chairs, tables, sideboards, bedsteads, &c. broken to pieces, and the town looked as if it had been visited by devils. The feathers were emptied from the beds and scattered to the winds of heaven. Their force was estimated at nearly 2000 men. On the 4th they returned down the river, and had several brushes with the militia in the passage, in one of which, near Franham church, they acknowledged a loss of 15 killed, and 31 wounded—we had only 2 wounded. In another, it is thought that every man in one of their barges, except two were killed—10 or 12 prisoners also were taken, and several of their men deserted. It is reasonable to believe that they lost in this expedition at least 100 men. Capt. Barrie, of the Dragon, and col. Malcom, of the marines, commanded. The militia behaved admirably, anxious at all times to meet the pirates, and withstood them gallantly. Captain Vincent Shackleford, of the house of delegates, with about sixty of his artilleryists, encountered four hundred of the enemy with the utmost intrepidity; he gave them several fires with his 2 pieces, and drove them from the plain. Eventually capt. S. was wounded and taken prisoner—the enemy paroled him with compliments on his conduct.

Such are the leading features of an expedition that would disgrace a New Providence privateer-man, (the most abandoned villains that ever infested the ocean) but which is, probably, destined to fill a "London Gazette extraordinary." They carried away many negroes, doubtless for sale in the West-Indies—But "religious" England has abolished the slave trade! Cursed be the barbarians, that disturb even the quiet of the grave!

NAVAL.

The President frigate, com. Decatur, sailed from New York on the 26th ult. from which port also many merchantmen have recently departed—so "rigorous and strict" is the blockade!

Com. Perry is at Boston to purchase some vessels for his "flying squadron"—he has four fitting out at

A cannonading took place at New-London, we understand, on Friday night last, when a 74 gun ship came in and anchored within a frigate and sloop of war off the mouth of the harbor, and near a battery lately erected near the light-house, three miles below the town. Our troops went down with two eighteen pounders (the Stonington complement) and a travelling furnace, and opened a fire upon the ship on Friday night and Saturday morning, which she received without returning, and as soon as the tide served got under way and went over near Fisher's Island.—New York Columbian, Dec 27.

Privateers. During the present week we have received accounts of the sailing of the following privateers. Brigs Mars and Ranger, from Portsmouth, N. H. Prince of Neufchatel from Boston, 18 guns, 130 men. Brig Ino and schooner Mars, from Portland. Brig Antelope from Newburyport. Chasseur, Boyle, from New-York.

A queer article. If any man had said, three years ago, that the captain of a British frigate would be complimented for running away from a frigate of any other nation, John Bull would have said he was a — man that did not tell the truth—but here we have it:

Kingston, Jamaica, Nov. 14.—It affords us much pleasure to be informed that captain the honorable Anthony Maitland of H. M. S. Pique, has received letters from the admiralty expressing in very flattering terms their explicit approbation of his prompt adherence to his instructions, in not coming to an engagement with the American frigate Constitution, when he fell in with her on the 4th of May last.—Many who were at that time unacquainted with the circumstances of the case, thought captain Maitland had not acquitted himself with strict propriety; but his having peremptory orders to avoid a contest places his conduct in the most honorable point of view.

[If such are the "general orders" of the British navy, we are apprehensive that the gallant Stewart may make another unfortunate cruise in "old iron sides;" for she is rather a dull sailer.]

Constitution and Pique. From a Barbadoes paper of May 7.—"Arrived H. M. ship Pique, honorable captain Maitland, from a cruise. About 8 days ago the Pique fell in with the American frigate Constitution to the northward of Porto Rico. The Pique immediately hoisted her colors and invited her to come down, BUT SHE REFUSED THE CHALLENGE!"

The Wasp sunk. It is now clearly ascertained (says a London paper of October 25) that the American ship Wasp has gone to the bottom! On the 4th inst. the Pelican spoke the Castilian, and gave information of having been informed by H. M. frigate Hyperion, that a Scilly pilot boat had been alongside them, the master of which boat declared, that he was on board a Spanish schr. that had the surviving part of the Wasp's crew in, and that the Americans said their ship went down two days after their action, and that the Castilian sunk her! [This is something like a British official.]

Truly, may our vessels be considered "non descriptis," as the Wasp, so sunk, certainly got up again!

Before the battle.—Capt. Mackonochie, who arrived in town on Sunday (says a London paper of Oct. 12) with dispatches, left Quebec Sept. 11.—[the day on which the British forces were defeated by sea and land at Plattsburgh.] Capt. M. brings a confirmation of the capture of Plattsburgh, by the army under sir G. Prevost!—A naval action was expected forthwith to take place on Lake Champlain, where we had a decided superiority!

After the battle!! The London "Press" of Oct. 21, gives a British account of the two squadrons on Lake Champlain, previous to the late engagement, Their vessels (exclusive of 12 gun-boats, whose force is not stated,) are made to mount 72 guns, with 337 men—the American fleet 141 guns, with 1,480 men!

A London paper of Sept. 28, says—Com. Porter, his officers and crew, are officially declared by our government to be released from their parole, given at Valparaiso.

There arrived at Quebec, from sea, during the present year 169 merchant vessels and 201 transports—total 370.

The British who are stealing slaves from Maryland, Virginia, &c. have two frigates cruising on the African coasts to prevent a trade there! Such is the consistency of the "shield of afflicted humanity."

A schooner from New York was lately captured by the barges of the Majestic razee, and a midshipman and 3 seamen put on board. Soon after they stood for Fisher's island, where the midshipman went on shore—two Americans that yet remained on board persuaded the Englishmen to go below; when they got under way and safely reached the famous village of Stonington.

A great shot.—We understand that on the 16th inst. a British tender (formerly the Franklin, belonging to the Constellation, taken in Lynhaven bay) gave chase to an oyster boat in the neighborhood of Blackstone's island. A boat was manned from the tender with an officer and 4 men, armed with muskets and cutlasses, which got within gun shot of the oyster boat and fired several guns at her, which struck different parts of the vessel. The owner, a yellow man, not liking to lose his all without a struggle, made for a small creek, and advised a young white man who was with him (the only two on board) to take his ducking gun, (having but the one) get into the canoe and go ashore and secrete himself till the boat should come near a point which he was endeavoring to make, and then fire into it. The young man kept himself snug until the boat came within about 50 yards of him, when he fired with such effect as to wound the officer and 3 men—they all immediately fell flat and bellowed out lustily for quarter. The young man loaded his gun again and ordered them to push the boat ashore and surrender, which they did, and after having secured their arms (3 muskets and 2 cutlasses) and being joined by his companion, they marched them to where some militia were stationed, not far off in St. Mary's county, and delivered them up to the commanding officer, who sent them under guard to Washington. The oyster boat arrived here yesterday and proceeded on to Washington with her prize.—Alex. Herald.

[The poor boatmen have done a much better business by catching Englishmen than oysters. We hope they may successfully pursue their new trade.]

The nominal insurance from Halifax to Castine is 20 per cent.

The British do not permit their vessels to cross the Irish channel without convoy. Insurance from London to Halifax is 30 guineas per 100£.

Lloyd's list of the 23rd Sept. contains a list of 40 valuable vessels captured by our privateers.

A late Halifax paper says that certain persons captured by the Surprise of Baltimore, were treated very well because they were freemasons.

Promotions. Joseph Bainbridge, William W. Crane, Thomas Macdonough, Johnston Blakely, and Lewis Warrington, master commandants, have been appointed post captains in the navy of the United States.

Lieutenants Robert Henley, Stephen Cassin, Daniel S. Dexter, James Renshaw, David Deacon, and Thomas Brown, have been appointed master commandants—and About 40 midshipmen have been appointed lieutenants.

CHRONICLE.

BENJAMIN W. CROWINSHIELD, of Massachusetts, is appointed by the president, with the concurrence of the senate, to the office of secretary of the navy.

WILLIAM EUSTIS, of Massachusetts, is appointed, with the concurrence of the senate, to be our minister to Holland.

Levin Winder has been re-elected governor of Maryland. For Mr. Winder, 48—Mr. Bowie, (rep.) 23. The council, of course, is federal.

Mr. Hawkins having served out his constitutional term, William Miller, esq. (rep.) has been chosen governor of North Carolina.

D. R. Williams has been elected governor of South Carolina. Joseph Kerr is elected a senator of the United States from Ohio, vice Mr. Worthington elected governor of that state.

The members of congress from Pennsylvania are 18 republicans and 5 federalists. The state senate, 21 republicans and 13 federalists. The house of representatives, 70 republicans and 25 federalists.—The votes for governor when officially counted stood thus—for Simon Snyder, 51,099; Isaac Wayne, 29,566; scattering, 928; clear majority for Snyder over all the rest voted for, 20,665.

By a law of Pennsylvania it is provided, that the militia in service shall be allowed to vote for governor, members of congress, &c. By the returns of the election in October last, it appears that governor Snyder had 4,806, and Mr. Wayne 1,298 "votes in camp."

JONATHAN ROBERTS is re-elected a senator of the United States by the legislature of Pennsylvania, for the term of six years from the fourth day of March next. For Mr. Roberts, 84—Mr. Sitgreaves, 32 votes.

Francis Lock (rep.) has been elected a senator of the United States, from North Carolina, vice David Stone, resigned.

Massachusetts election.—The return of votes for representatives of this state in the next congress gives us the following result—seventeen federalists and one republican elected, and in two districts no choice, for which new elections must be held.

Mr. Jefferson's Library.—The bill to purchase Mr. Jefferson's library appropriates 23,950 dollars for the purpose. It is strange that the rancor of party should penetrate even in the temple of science, and that an opposition was made to the purchase of a collection that any monarch in Europe would be proud to own. For such a library the British parliament would have given £ 50,000. We are not informed what this library cost, but venture to say that the amount appropriated will not pay the expense of it, by a large sum, independent of the value of the time and talent employed in the collection.

FOREIGN ARTICLES.

Montevideo, with all its rich stores, has surrendered to the Buenos Ayrean whigs. The garrison was reduced greatly by famine. It was fortified by 500 pieces of cannon. The capture of this place will present many difficulties to Spain in her attempts to reduce this delightful country to its former base servitude.

We have the satisfaction to believe that Peru has, at last, effected her independence. The war for liberty has been tedious and bloody; but it seems that the whigs of Buenos Ayres and Chili throwing a force into the scale of the Peruvian patriots, utterly defeated the royalists and Tories near Gzuro, in Upper Peru, after which the viceroy fled to Guayaquil, the only remaining place where the standard of Ferdinand, the ungrateful, yet waned.

There is every prospect that the whole South American provinces will be lost to the monopoly of Spain. The establishment of independent governments there, and in Mexico, will have a wonderful effect on the general commerce and happiness of the world.

Murat, king of Naples, is said to have accumulated the enormous sum of four millions [sterling] in cash, which is deposited in the coffers of his palace. He seems to be providing "for the time to come." His army consists of 16,000 men.

The British has as yet refused to give up Martinique, Guadalupe, &c. to France—they wait the result of the congressional proceedings at Vienna; and, in case of a rupture with France, they may make a grand exploit by capturing the French who have been sent out to garrison them.

A number of French merchant vessels have arrived at Guadalupe, and several vessels of war have also reached the West Indies or may be immediately expected.

A contagious fever prevails at Gibraltar and Cadiz. The troops at the latter, destined for South America, about to embark, had been marched out of the city.

The pope, at the instance of Charles VI. has declined sending the prince of peace to Spain for trial, as Ferdinand had requested. He remains near Rome.

It is said Amsterdam is now so far removed from its former opulence, that a private carriage is scarcely to be met with amongst its inhabitants.

Immense seizures have been made in England of French goods smuggled.

Martial law was declared at Cadiz the latter part of August, on its being discovered that a great part of the inhabitants were devoted to the old king.

It is contemplated to light the streets and the shops in London with inflammable gas, as it has been late successfully used in several manufactories, &c. The mode of the patent is to be by tubes conveying the gas from reservoirs, as water is now conveyed. The annual charge to a shop is £4.

At the session of the Old Baily, London, in September last, the grand jury sat upon near 500 indictments, comprehending crimes of almost every kind, and committed by persons of all ages, from infancy to hoary years.

The slave trade has been "restored" by the "royal Bourbons," under its old arrangements and regulations. Let Africa "rejoice," and humanity "repose in the arms of its legitimate sovereign."

The Milan Courier of June last states that the pope had lately paid a visit to Charles IV. of Spain, and adds very gravely, that on his departure he permitted the whole royal family to kiss his foot!

A contribution of one million of dollars was exacted of the people of Cadiz, to accelerate the expedition to the river Plate.

The British admiral Bradley, has been capitally convicted of forgery in England; and sentenced to Botany Bay, for life.

British commerce. The trade at Malta is stated to have received an immense impulse from situations whence it was not expected. Thirty-five ships from Marseilles have delivered their cargoes and received their returns, with which they have taken their departure. A vessel fully laden had entered the port direct from the Havanna.

London, August 24.—The number of French prisoners who have been sent from England to France since the conclusion of the peace, exceeds sixty-seven thousand men. It is said that only thirteen continental prisoners of war (who are Poles) now remain in this country.

A London paper says—"The oldest Jesuit in the world is at present living at Perugia, in the state of the church. This is father Albert de Montauro. He is 126 years of age, and took the vows of his order on the 2d of February 1724."

British empire.—Dr. Colquhoun computes the population of the British empire, after being reduced 1,500,000 by cessations, at 59,655,000 souls. The company's possessions in the East Indies he reckons at 40,053,000; of whom 25,000, or the one sixteen hundredth part are Britons.

Mermaid.—The British public have been amused with a well-told story about a mermaid caught on the western coast of Scotland—the tale has also been published in most of our papers. The thing was well enough, and had only the fault, like the "officials" given to John Bull, of being totally false.

The pope. We learn from Rome, that in a secret consistory of the 27th September, the holy father pronounced a very pathetic oration on the mischief done to the church by the impious man of these latter times, and on the extraordinary and providential events which have gloriously delivered it. His holiness rejoiced particularly to see France restored to her excellent king, to her very christian king, and entertained the most happy hopes of the increase of religion in that fine kingdom. He bestowed the greatest eulogies on the courage, the piety, and the charity of the French ladies, who, during the persecution, were entirely employed in relieving the ministers of the church who were deprived of all means of existence. His holiness speaking afterwards of the good which he has effected with the assistance of God, since his return to Rome, announced that he had banished all the secret conventicles, which were not less fatal to the state, than to religion; that he had revived from its ashes the company of Jesus, the most useful of religious societies, to extend the kingdom of God, and procure the salvation of souls; that he had opened again the convents of the religious, against which the rage of the persecutor [Bonaparte] was so violently directed; finally, that he had restored the holy virgins, whom impious and sacrilegious hands had dragged from their cloisters.

By the above it appears that the Jesuits, famous to a proverb for hypocrisy and crime, are to be restored.

Further from Rome. A late London paper observes—"A letter from Rome gives an account of the real motives, which actuated his holiness the pope in issuing his order for the prohibition of freemason's lodges: "I know that much misconception will take place as to the motives of the church for abolishing freemasonry in the papal dominions; but be assured it is not because they have discovered, or because they dread any treasonable practices, against the state in those fraternities. They are well aware that no political subjects of any kind, are discussed in the meetings of lodges of the free masons. No—the dread is of another kind. They know that the principle of free-masonry is freedom of conscience, and that the very first principle it inculcates is that, not merely of universal toleration, but of universal religious freedom; for they assert that worship is acceptable to the Divine author of our being which is contrite, whatever may be its form. Free-masonry, therefore, embraces the members of all churches and sects; but it is not a proselyting fraternity. They send out no missionaries—they admit none, on the contrary, without strict examination as to their moral character, and only after a long apprenticeship; but the idea of their inculcating a notion, that a protestant as well as a catholic may be saved, is so abhorrent to the views of the mother church, that it is no wonder the Holy Father should wish to extirpate the dangerous brotherhood."

We read in the Italian papers, that one Besilacqua, a merchant, has fled from Rome to Naples, in order to escape the inquisition, and that his property has been confiscated. He is accused of being a freemason.

Let the people "rejoice," for the rack and wheel is prepared by the "legitimate sovereign."

Spanish liberty.—"On the night of the 30th September, (says a late London paper) ninety persons were arrested at Madrid and thrown into prisons, which are now so full that several convents have been converted into goals, to immure persons suspected of the least crime."

"Rejoice Spain, the royal line now reigns"—the son of the adulterous wife, of the late king, thus requites your loyalty and perseverance in your contest with France. "Rejoice" that they who beat the "usurper" now groan in dungeons—shout loudly, he a cause the inquisition is restored, and scoundrel priests and nobles take the place of your high souled patriots, and because a full despotism has destroyed the free constitution you built up in the name of the ingrate that tramples upon you.

Turkish troops. It seems that the Turkish government has at length partially succeeded in the introducing of the European system of discipline and tactics among the troops.

Proceedings of Congress.

SENATE.

The senate determined to insist on its disagreement to the amendments of the house to the militia draft bill, and appointed Messrs. Bibb, Brown and German, a committee of conference thereon.

Tuesday, Dec. 27.—The senate made several amendments to the bill for imposing duties on certain manufactures.

Wednesday, Dec. 28.—The message from the house in relation to their disagreement to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two houses on the militia draft bill, was taken up; and the proposition for a further conference thereon being under consideration—

A motion was made by Mr. King of N. Y. to postpone the further consideration of the subject to the second Monday in March next—in other words, to reject the bill: which motion was decided as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Chase, Daggett, Dana, Fromentin, Gore, Horsey, Hunter, King, Lambert, Mason, Robinson, Thompson, Varum, Wells—14.

NAYS—Messrs. Bibb, Bledsoe, Condit, Gaillard, Lacombe, Morrow, Roberts, Smith, Tait, Taylor, Turner, Walker Wharton—13.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

The following are the yeas and nays for Mr. Yancey's motion to strike out that part of the bill for laying a direct tax of six millions, which pledges its continuance for the purpose of establishing an adequate revenue to pay the expenses of government, and the principal and interest of the public debt, &c. decided on Wednesday, Dec. 21.

The bill for regulating militia drafts, which had passed as amended, and was sent to the senate, being returned, (with the refusal of the senate to agree to the substitution of one year as the term of service instead of two—and to authorise the president to call on the militia officers to supply the men in case the governors of states should refuse the requisition) was taken up, and the house refused 93 to 6 to recede from the several amendments they had made, and further resolved to insist upon them. It appears possible that this bill may be lost between the two houses.

The amendments of the senate to the bill which passed this house supplementary to the 25 million and three million loan acts was taken up and agreed to.

Friday, Dec. 23. The house in committee of the whole took up the bill from the senate to establish a National Bank. On a motion made to strike out the first section of the bill, or, in other words, to reject it, the yeas were 50 nays 71. The amendments proposed by the committee of ways and means were agreed to. The committee reported progress, and had leave to sit again.

Saturday, Dec. 24.—Mr. Calhoun, from the committee to whom was referred on the 23d ult. the report of the secretary of war relating to an uniform system of discipline for the army of the United States, reported the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the secretary of war be directed to appoint a board of officers to modify 'the rules and regulations for the field service and manoeuvres of the French infantry,' as translated by Macdonald, so as to make them correspond with the organization of the army of the United States, and to make such additions and retrenchments as may be thought proper; and to lay the same, as soon as possible, before the house."

The said resolution was agreed to.

The whole of the day was consumed in the discussion of the details and propositions to amend the bill to establish a national bank, without giving birth to any material amendments.

The amendments made in the committee were reported to the house, and agreed to, before the house adjourned.

As amended, the bill exhibits the following features, viz.

The capital to consist of fifty millions of dollars, divided into shares of five hundred dollars each; subscribable and payable as follows: by the government, in stock to bear an interest of four per cent. per annum: fifteen millions, by individuals, the remaining thirty-five millions, payable as follows, viz. five millions in specie, ten millions in treasury notes, and twenty millions in what is usually called the war-stock. The bank to commence its operations as soon as 11,500,000 are paid in, in the proportions before mentioned, of specie, treasury notes and stock.

Other amendments were proposed to the bill, when the house adjourned, at dusk, without taking a question on the bill's going to a third reading.

Monday, December 26. Mr. Ingersoll rose to make a motion. He said their was now an individual in this town, by the name of Matthew Guy, a native of the town of Dumfries, who by an extraordinary act of bravery and heroism, had himself captured a British officer and four British seamen. He was an oyster boat in the neighborhood of Chippewanzie, into which he was pursued by a British vessel; and after he got into the creek, a barge was sent after him with a midshipman and four men. This individual finding he must be overtaken, went ashore in a small skiff, and concealed himself on the margin of the creek with his duck-gun, directing a mulatto man, who was the only person in company with him, to pursue his way up the creek. The mulatto man accordingly steered up the creek, under a sharp fire from the barge which was in pursuit. When the barge passed within a convenient distance, Mr. Guy discharged his gun with such steady aim at it, as to wound four of the five men on board, who immediately cried for quarter; which being readily granted, they pushed ashore whilst Guy was loading his gun a second time. On finding the inferiority of force to which they had surrendered their arms, the prisoners were disposed to attempt a rescue; but their captor presented his piece a second time at them, and they deemed it proper to submit, the officer and three others being already wounded. The brave man who performed this exploit delivered his prisoners up to the militia in St. Mary's county, by whom they had been brought to the city. Though this case did not come within the letter, he said it certainly did within the equity of the law, which allows a bounty of 100 dollars on every prisoner taken by privateers; because this individual had redeemed from captivity one of our naval officers and four of our seamen by obtaining the means of their exchange—which was the principle on which the act in question was passed. He was desirous to extend the provision of that bill to this individual; and therefore moved the following resolution:

“Resolved, That the committee on naval affairs be instructed to enquire into the expediency of allowing a bounty to Matthew Guy for five English prisoners captured by him.”

The motion was agreed to without opposition.

The rest of the day was occupied in discussing the bill to establish a national bank.

Tuesday, Dec. 27. The Speaker laid before the house a communication, signed by the acting secretary of state, the secretary of the treasury and attorney general, in their capacity as commissioners under the act for the final adjustment and settlement of Yazoo claims, respectfully representing, that, as the day approaches for the execution of the duties assigned by that act, they become more and more sensible, that, with a due attention to the duties of their respective offices, they cannot do justice to the examination of such numerous and conflicting claims as will present themselves for examination under that act; and suggesting the propriety of the establishment of a board of commissioners expressly for that object, who may be able to devote their whole attention to it. The letter was, on motion of Mr. Oakley, referred to a select committee.

Mr. Troup from the committee of conference on the disagreeing vote of the two houses, on the bill to call into service 80,000 men, as to the time of service [1 year fixed by the house, 2 years by the senate] proposed to substitute the term of eighteen months—which the house refused to agree to—for the proposition 64, against it 73.

The second proposition of the committee of conference is, that the house shall recede from an amendment—the object of which is to authorise the executive, in case of neglect or refusal of the governors of the states to execute the provisions of the law, to call directly on the militia officers of the states to carry them into effect.

On this a considerable debate took place—but the house refused to agree to it;—for agreeing 69, against it 80.

The house then took up the bill to establish a national bank. After some motions had been made, Mr. Ingersol moved the previous question—carried 72 to 70.

A motion was made to lay the bill and amendments on the table.

The chair decided (Mr. Macon, in the absence of Mr. Cheves, occupying the chair) that the motion was not in order; inasmuch as, the house having decided that the main question shall be now put, no other motion can obtain, unless a motion to adjourn.

An appeal was made from the decision of the chair; but the decision was confirmed, 103 to 36. After a good deal of time spent in another question of order—

The main question, viz. shall the amendments be engrossed, and, together with the bill, be read a third time? Was put, and decided as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Alexander, Alston, Anderson, Archer, Avery, Bard, Barnett, Bines, Bradley, Brown, Calhoun, Cannon, Chappell, Clark, Clendenin, Constock, Conard, Creighton, Cuthbert, Dana, Davis, of Penn. Denoyelles, Duvall, Earle, Farrow, Findley, Fisk, of N.Y., Forney, Forsyth, Gourdin, Griffin, Harris, Hasbrouck, Hawes, Hawkins, Hodge, of Ken. Hubbard, Ingersoll, Ingham, Irving, Irwin, Kent, of Md. Kerr, Kershaw, Kilbourn, King, of N. C. Lefferts, Lowndes, Lyle, McCoy, McKee, McLean, Montgomery, Moore, Murrefree, Nelson, Gensby, Parker, Pickens, Pleasant, Rea, of Penn. Rhea, Ten. Rich, Ringgold, Robertson, Sage, Sharp, Skinner, Smith, of Pen. Smyth of Virg. Strong, Tannehill, Taylor, Telfair, Udree, Ward, of N. J. Williams, Wilson, of Penn. Yancey—81.

NAYS.—Messrs. Baylies, of Mass. Bigelow, Bowen, Boyd, Bradbury, Brigham, Butler, Caperton, Champion, Cilley, Clopton, Cooper, Coxe, Crawford, Davenport, Davis, of Mass. Desha, Ely, Evans, Franklin, Gaston, Gholston, Hale, Hall, Henderson, Humphreys, Jackson, of R. I. Johnson, of Virg. Kennedy, King, of Mass. Law, Lovett, Macon, Miller, Mosely, Markell, Newton, Oakley, Pearson, Pickering, Pitkin, Potter, John Reed, Wm. Reed, Ruggles, Schureman, Seybert, Sheffield, Sherwood, Shipperd, Sny-maker, Stanford, Stockton, Thompson, Vose, Ward, of Mass. Webster, Wheaton, White, Wilcox, Wilson of Mass. Winter—62.

So the bill was ordered to be read a third time tomorrow; and the house adjourned about sun down.

Wednesday, Dec. 28.—The bill to establish a national bank being announced for its third reading—was, on a motion to re-commit it to a select committee for certain amendments—re-committed. For re-commitment 79, against it 76.

Thursday, Dec. 30. observes the National Intelligencer, was the most boisterous day in the House of Representatives that we have seen for two years. The bank bill having again come before the house, was attacked with the most determined zeal by the opposition side of the house, and beset with every obstacle that they could throw in the way of the proceedings of the house. By the aid of the previous question, however, the bill was again ordered to a third reading, and would have been passed last night, but for the evident determination of the minority to tire out the majority by desultory debate.

Particulars hereafter—the bill, probably, passed the next day.

GEN. SCOTT. The legislature of Virginia have named a new county after their illustrious citizen, maj. gen. Scott, the hero of Chippewa and Bridge-water.

Retort courtous.—The honorable Henry Clay, being on a tour through the chief towns of the Netherlands, we understand that the affable Henry Goulburn, esquire, one of the British commissioners at Ghent, forwarded to him at Brussels, a London paper containing the official account of the destruction of the public edifices at Washington, with an apology suitable to the occasion, presuming he would through that channel receive the latest information from America. It so happened that the honorable Mr. Clay had just received the Paris Journals containing the official accounts of the defeat of the British forces on lake Champlain, which he enclosed to the honorable Mr. Goulburn, with a similar apology.

The "New England Convention," No. IV. was nearly prepared for the press in the early part of the week—but, on account of the great length to which it extended, and a desire to give an insertion to Washington's plan for raising an army, and get up our "prize lists" so long neglected, induced its postponement.

Resources of Great Britain.

[The following is from the same hand to which we were indebted for the article in our last number, headed "Agriculture, manufactures and commerce," and will amply reward the reader, curious of fact and seeking the truth.]

Is there not some mistake in supposing that it is in consequence of the value of the commerce of Great Britain, that she is enabled to bear the enormous taxes, duties, excises and loans that the present war has made necessary—and which for 1810 are stated as follows:

Nett revenue payable into the exchequer for 1810,	$ 311,344,695
Loans for the same year,	59,922,777
Poor rates for 1810	23,860,000
Amount of Tythes	22,220,000

Emporium Feby. p. 281. $ 422,347,472

In the same work, p. 241, the real value of the imports and exports of Great Britain are given as follows:

	Imports.	Exports.
1806	50,621,707	53,028,881
1807	53,500,990	50,482,661
1808	55,718,698	49,969,746
1809	59,851,352	66,017,712
1810	74,538,061	62,702,409

6)357,812,954 6)333,310,540

Average 59,635,492 55,551,757

Averaged annual excess of imports for six years, £4,083,735—excess of imposts in 6 years 24,502,410£ which is equal to 108,790,700 dollars.

If these statements be correct in the work they are extracted from, and they are given on good authority, it seems pretty clear that the balance of trade in those years could have given no aid in the payment of the public expences. But we find in the same work, p. 258, that in the above 6 years there was raised for the public service the prodigious sum of 515,372,323£. sterling, equal to 2,228,253,114 dollars. As it appears from what is above stated, that no relief for the public burdens was obtained from a favorable balance of trade, even if we admit a mercantile profit of 10 per cent. on the exports as supposing the whole to have been exported in British ships, which was not the fact—for by the same work, p. 248 it appears that the tons of shipping which cleared from the ports of Great Britain in the years 1806, 7, 8, 9, 10 and 11, were "British 8,944,694 tons" and "foreign 4,016,552 tons."—Where, then, are we to look for the means of paying those prodigious sums of money, constantly levied on that people? The same work, page 280, states—"the whole annual income of the people of Great Britain (1805) including "revenues, resources, and earnings of individuals, of every description at 1,078,920,000 dollars," and the "British manufactures, for home consumption, at 408,982,816 dollars." "The real and personal property in Great Britain at 13,320,000,000 dollars"—and the whole circulating paper medium at 4,570,333,417 dollars. All the difficulty of accounting for how that government can raise such immense sums of paper, may seem to be obviated if we can suppose the credit of the paper medium to be kept up; 422 millions of dollars per ann. being but about a tenth part of the amount of their paper money. If then the government of that country lay their taxes judiciously (and there is no doubt but that that great art is brought to perfection there) and so contrive the disbursements of them, that they will be principally expended within the realm; that for any part of the war expences, or those of trade, or of civil government, for which they are obliged to make payments out of the kingdom, they can keep up such a surplus of labor, in the shape of exports, as will discharge those payments—it seems probable the nation may continue, while this paper retains its credit, to bear such enormous expenditures—but it is a fickle foundation resting entirely upon that credit.

It also appears by the same work, (Emporium) p. 250, "that the paper currency had depreciated 35 per cent." This circumstance must create a necessity for heavier taxes and greater loans to meet a correspondent rise in the price of every article to be purchased with paper; or, what is the same thing, to meet the fall in the value of that paper.

If the history of the depreciation of our continental money could be a rule whereby to calculate the final extinction of the British paper, we might fix upon some data to ascertain the period of its circulation; but all the powers of a strong government are on the side of the British paper, whereas, there was no power to support the continental paper. We, therefore, can draw no conclusions from its fate to predict the fate of that of Great Britain. That, in time, its credit will be finally destroyed, there can be little doubt; as it is impossible to suppose 200 millions a year can be added without sinking its value. Its period, then, may arrive either by domestic convulsions, or when their commerce will no longer pay the balance due on their trade and expeditions to other countries. That day had arrived in the years we have stated, and accordingly their paper was diminished in value—but during that period merchants and manufacturers accumulated great stocks, which now they may have an opportunity of disposing of on the continent of Europe, and by this operation reverse the balance of trade and render it favorable."

"It would rather appear that an effect the reverse of this has been experienced by the peace in Europe. During the war, it seems, immense sums of money from the continent had been invested in the British funds for security; which are now drawing out of the country, to a considerable depression in the price of the stocks. Thus, at least, it is that the *minis-*terialists account for the fall of the funds; being unwilling to admit that the war with America has any material effect upon them.—Ed. Reg.

But what we set out with was an idea that it was not the commerce of Great Britain that the nation relied on for the payment of its immense taxes; and it seems clear, in the years we have stated, commerce brought no relief—indeed was a burden on the national energy: but their agriculture and manufactures—their vast mass of real and personal property, and, above all, their four thousand millions of nominal money, were truly, it would seem, resources upon which the government calculated—for by their taxes, duties and excises it was necessary only to cause one fifth part of this nominal money to pass through the treasury and they had 800 millions at command. But supposing a further depreciation of paper money to 50 per cent. they must, in that case, cause 1000 millions to go the same rounds, and so on to the end of the chapter, which, probably, cannot be a long one; for it is a sword that cuts both ways—as, while the depreciation continues, the necessity of higher taxes and more issues of paper money will continually press upon them, until the whole system must fall from mere dearth—as, an incapacity of performing what it used to perform.

If this reasoning is just it would seem that commerce, as a national benefit, may be estimated above its real value—holding but an inferior place to either agriculture or manufactures.

The winds and seas are Britain's wide domain,
And not a sail, but by permission spreads!"

British Naval Register.

These lists only include such enemy vessels as safely arrive in our ports, or are sunk or burnt, or otherwise "satisfactorily" accounted for. A record of all the prizes heard of will be kept from the 1st inst. and those re-captured be published occasionally in separate lists.

1293. Brig Concord, captured by a letter of marque of Wilmington, N. C. divested and made a cartel of.

1294. Brig Speculation from Lauzarote for London, captured by the Grampus, of Baltimore, divested and being an old vessel, given up to the prisoners.

The Grampus has arrived at New York, with the loss of her captain, that excellent seaman and worthy man, John Murphy, and one seaman, in a contest with a British sloop of war off the Canaries, disguised as a merchantman, from whom, however, she escaped by desperately daring exertion.

1297. Ship Farmer, from England for Halifax, captured by the Mammoth of Baltimore, off the British coast and destroyed.

1298. Ann and Eliza, from Newfoundland for Meramachi, captured by do. and do.

1299. Ship Urania, from do. captured by do. and do.

1300. Ship Anisby, from Quebec for Barbadoes, captured by do. and do.

1301. Eliza, from Newfoundland for Prince Edward's island, captured by do. and given up.

1302. Ship Dobson, from Cork for Quebec, captured by the same and burnt.

1303. Sellust, from England for Quebec, captured by the same, divested and made a cartel of. She has arrived at Liverpool.

The Mammoth, when last heard of (and we have the account of her from Liverpool) had been out 7 weeks, and made 16 prizes. She cruized 17 days off Cape Clear, Ireland. Several valuable vessels had been manned for the United States. We shall have a better account of her hereafter.

1304. Sloop Christianna, of Kirkcaldy, Scotland, captured by the Chasseur of Baltimore and made a cartel of.

1305. Brig Prudence of Aberdeen, from the island of Lauzarote for London, with barilla and wine, captured by the same and burnt.

1306. Sloop Favorite, from the same for the same, laden with the same, captured by do. and do.

1307. Brig Marquis Cornwallis, from the same for the same, captured by the same and being of little value, made a cartel of.

1308. Brig Alert, of Pool, from Newfoundland with timber, captured by the same and burnt.

1309. Brig Harmony, of Aberdeen, from Newfoundland for London, captured the same and made a cartel of.

1310. Ship Carlbury, of London, from Jamaica, with an immense cargo of cotton, cocoa, hides, indigo, &c. captured by the same, divested of 237 sermons of indigo and ordered into port. [As the Chasseur has arrived, we consider the Carlbury, as a good prize, the indigo being worth about $50,000.]

The Chasseur, also captured and manned the valuable brig Eclipse, (14 guns arrived, at New York and already accounted for); brig Commerce, a valuable vessel, laden with fish; the brig Antelope, eight 18lb carronades and a long Tom, (without resistance) from Havana, with 900 boxes of sugar; the schooner Fox, laden with fish; brig Atlantic, of London, 8 guns, and ship James of do. 12 guns, in company, from the River Plate, with great cargoes of hides, tallow, bark, furs, &c. ship Theodore, of Liverpool, 8 guns, from Marenham, with 1600 bales of cotton; brig Amicus, of Liverpool, from Lisbon, with wool, fruit, and 2 bales of woollens—and several other vessels, making eighteen in the whole. Captain Boyle brought in 43 prisoners, and parolled 150, during his cruise of three months. If the Chasseur had been an United States vessels, acting under the orders to "sink, burn and destroy," the certain loss to the enemy would have exceeded a million and a half of dollars. As war is, emphatically, a contest to see "who can do the other the most harm," let those who manage its business think of this. It is true, we are much more willing that the whole should arrive in our ports; but this we cannot hope for. Some of them probably will, and in any event, the Chasseur has made a profitable cruise. She is a formidable vessel, carrying 16 long 12's.

Captain Boyle while sailing round the coasts of Great Britain, had many "hair breadth escapes." He was once so near a frigate as to exchange broadsides with her! At another time he was nearly surrounded by two frigates and two men of war brigs—and was often chased, but easily out-maneuvred them all, though by a ball from a frigate he had three men wounded. While off England he issued the following proclamation, and by a cartel sent it to London, with orders to have it stuck up at Lloyd's coffee house!

By Thomas Boyle, Esq. commander of the private armed brig Chasseur, &c.

PROCLAMATION—Whereas it has become customary with the admirals of Great Britain, commanding small forces on the coast of the United States, particularly with sir John Borlase Warren, and sir Alexander Cochrane, to declare all the coast of the said United States in a state of strict and rigorous blockade without possessing the power to justify such a declaration, or stationing an adequate force to maintain said blockade.

I do, therefore, by virtue of the power and authority in me vested (possessing sufficient force) declare all the ports, harbours, bays, creeks, rivers, inlets, outlets, islands and sea coast of the united kingdom of G. Britain and Ireland, in a state of strict and rigorous blockade. And I do further declare, that I consider the force under my command, adequate to maintain strictly, rigorously and effectually the said blockade: And I do hereby require the respective officers, whether captains, commanders or commanding officers under my command, employed or to be employed on the coast of England, Ireland and Scotland, to pay strict attention to the execution of this my proclamation. And I do hereby caution and forbid the ships and vessels of all and every nation in amity and peace with the United States from entering or attempting to enter; or from coming or attempting to come out of any of the said ports, harbours, bays, creeks, rivers, inlets, outlets, islands, or sea coast, under any pretence whatsoever. And that no person may plead ignorance of this my proclamation, I have ordered the same to be made public in England.

Given under my hand on board the Chasseur, day and date as above.

THOMAS BOYLE.

By command of the commanding officer.

J. J. STANSBURY, Sec'y.

1311, 1312, 1313, 1314, 1315, 1316, 1317, 1318, 1319, 1320, 1321, fourteen vessels, viz. brig Sea Flower, from St. Johns to Barbadoes; brig Stranger, from Buenos Ayres to Greenock; sloop Fortitude, from Liverpool to London; brig Venus, from Bordeaux to London; brig Diana, from Liverpool to Quebec; sloop Leith Packet, from Teneriffe to Dublin; William and Ann, from Glasgow to Jamaica; Peggy and Jane, do. do; barque William, from St. Andrew's to Greenock; ship Sir Edward Pellew, from Quebec to Glasgow; brig Bellona, from Cotte to Hamburg; brig Triton, from St. Johns to Lisbon; brig Duck, from Fort-en-Ventura to Teneriffe; ship Mary, from Point Petre, Guadeloupe, for Halifax, captured by the United States sloop of war Peacock, capt. Warrington, during a cruise of nearly five months, on the coasts of England, Ireland, Surinam, &c.—all sunk or burnt, except two of little value that were made cartels of. The property destroyed is estimated to have been worth 494,222 dollars. For particulars see the official letter of capt. Warrington to the secretary of the navy. The Peacock lost but one man [and by sickness] during her cruise. Three of her prizes have already been noticed in our lists, and are, therefore, not counted now. Those vessels were laden with—1, codfish; 2, hides and tallow; 3, salt; 4, barley, oats, brandy, cork; 5, salt; 6, Teneriffe wine; 7, coals; 8, coal, crates and glass; 9, timber; 10, lumber; 11, brandy, wine and verdigrise; 12, fish; 13, cargo not stated; 14, sugar, coffee, rum and molasses. They carried in the whole 30 guns, and 150 men.

1322. Privateer Thinks-I-to-myself, 2 guns, 20 men, captured by the Dash of Portland and brought into that port.

1323. Schooner Britania, in ballast, commanded by captain Freeman, late of the privateer Liverpool packet, captured by the Harpy of Baltimore and burnt.

1324. Brig Halifax Packet, from Aberdeen for Halifax, with a valuable cargo of dry goods, hardware and sundries, captured by the same, divested of her richest articles and arrived at Portsmouth.

The Harpy sailed from and has returned to Portsmouth N. H. after a cruise of twenty days laden with the choicest spoils of the foe, and sixty prisoners. Besides the above she captured the transport ship Amazon, 6 guns, 18 men, an elegant vessel, from London for Halifax with a cargo of beef, pork, bread and flour. Also the transport ship Budges, 44 tons, 6 18lb carronades, with a mighty cargo of rum, brandy, beef, pork, flour and bread—both which were manned and ordered into port:—Among the prisoners brought in are two majors and several other officers. These three vessels belonged to the fleet that lately sailed from Port-mouth, Eng. of which the great prize James (see No. 1290) was one. The prizes of the Harpy may be moderately valued at 4 or 500,000 dollars—and we hope for their arrival.

1325. Brig Harvest, laden with fish, furs, &c. sent into an eastern port by the York of Baltimore.

1326. Schooner Prince Regent with 360 bbls. alewives and a quantity of salmon, sent in by the Dash of Portland.

1327. Privateer Retaliation, 5 guns, 20 men, captured near Barnstable (Mass.) by the sloop Two Friends, fitted out for the occasion, and manned by volunteers. By good management she was taken by complete surprise, and carried without resistance.

1328. Brig Commerce, a very valuable vessel, coppered and copper fastened, laden with fish and oil, sent into Charleston, S. C. by the Chasseur of Baltimore.

1329. Sloop Farmer with flour and wheat, captured by the Mammoth of Baltimore, and sunk.

1330. Brig Britannia, for Liverpool, laden with lumber, captured by the same and burnt.

1331. Schooner Two Brothers, laden with fish, captured by the same and made a cartel of.

1332. Brig Ann Eliza, for Merimache, in ballast, captured by the same and burnt.

1333. Brig Uniza, for the same, in ballast, captured by ditto and ditto.

1334. Brig Anslay, from Quebec for Barbadoes, with horses and lumber, captured by the same and scuttled.

1335. Brig Sarah, from Cork for Merimache, with 600 bbls. flour, captured by the same and burnt.

1336. Brig Sir Home Popham, with fruit, captured by the same, and ditto.

1337. Schooner Rapid, from Newfoundland for Lisbon, with fish, captured by the same and burnt.

1339, 1340. Two other vessels captured by the same and destroyed.

The Mammoth also captured and brided in, the barque Mary, brigs Alexander and Charlotte and the ship Mentor, with valuable cargoes—and gave up the schooner Thomas, Good Intent, and brigs Joseph and Eliza. She made twenty-one prizes in all, and paroled about 300 prisoners. The privateer has arrived at Portsmouth, N. H. full of rich spoil.

1341. Schooner ———, from Halifax for Cuatin, with a cargo of dry goods, captured by a customs house barge, and sent into Camden, Maine. It is stated that $20,000 were offered for her ransom and refused by the captors.

1342. "His majesty's" sloop of war Avon, rated at 18 guns, sunk by the U. S. sloop of war Wasp, of the same rate, after an action of 46 minutes in which, according to the British account, they lost thirty men killed and wounded; we had only two killed and one slightly wounded. For particulars, see official account.

1343. Brig Atalanta, 253 tons, (formerly the elegant schooner Siro, of Baltimore) coppered and found in the best manner, and laden with an exceedingly rich cargo of wines, brandy, silks, cambricks, and dry goods—from Bordeaux for Pensacola, captured by the U. S. sloop of war Wasp, and sent into Savannah.

The cargo of the ship James, prize to the Portsmouth, see No. 1290, as advertised by the marshal, consists of 250 packages of British dry goods, containing a prodigious variety of valuable articles; 32 pipes Holland gin, 40 pipes brandy; 32 do. red wine; 60 puncheons rum; 25 boxes raisins; 40 bags pepper; 12 chests tea; 80 casks gun-powder; 6 bags nuts; 2 cases almonds; 140 cases pickles;—besides packages of fish sauce, mustard, glass, corks, nails, &c. &c. 2 printing presses, 2 fonts of type, &c. &c. The James, as to goods, was a sort of Noah's Ark. We do not believe her invoice was over-rated when given at £100,000 sterling.—This is touching John Bull in a very tender place.

1345. Brig Canada, 10 guns, from Bermuda, laden with 300 puncheons of rum, sent into Wilmington, N. C. by the Lawrence of Baltimore.

1348. Brig Lulice, 7 men, 90 tons, with a cargo of pork, captured by the U. S. S. Wasp, and burnt.

1349. Brig Bon Accord, 131 tons, 7 men from Seville for London, with a cargo of Merino wool, fruits and wine, captured by the same and sunk.

1350. Transport, brig Mary, 10 men, 2 guns, 151 tons, laden with ordnance and military stores, captured by the same, being cut out from a convoy of a 74 and a bomb vessel, and burnt in the face of the enemy.

1351. Brig Three Brothers, 7 men, 114 tons, with lime, captured by the same and burnt.

1352. Brig Bacchus; 11 men, 2 guns, 169 tons, laden with fish, from Gibraltar, captured by the same and destroyed.

The privateer Saratoga has returned, after a cruise of 110 days, during which she captured, the schr. Mary, cargo fish. Brig Swiftsure, 12 32lb carronades, and 2 long 9's, and schr. James, 6 12lb. carronades, and 2 18lb. ditto, both laden with fish. Being in company, they made battle, but were soon compelled to strike their colors. Ship Ann Dorothy, arrived, see No. 1253. Ship Enterprise, from Goree for London, with a cargo of hides, ivory, &c. schr. Mary, with fish—all which were manned and ordered for the United States. The privateer has brought in some indigo, ivory and furs.

The privateer Syren, of Baltimore, returning from a cruise was chased off New York, and lost on making the Delaware, Nov. 16, being run ashore by the pilot; where she was attacked by three barges from a razez at anchor, which were kept at bay for two hours; but finding no chance of escape, the privateer was set on fire, and her crew (only 20 in number with 6 prisoners in charge) reached the New-Jersey shore in safety. One of the enemy's barges is said to have sunk. The Syren has captured and manned several valuable vessels.

1354. Brig Hiram from Liverpool, last from Cork, with a convoy from which she separated in a gale, bound for St. John's, with a cargo of dry goods, crockery, cordage, &c. captured by the David Porter of Boston, divested of goods to the value of 100,000$ and given up.

The David Porter has arrived at Boston with her rich spoils, after a cruise of only fifteen days, during which she captured the Hiram, re-captured the ship Dorothy Ann (1353) and captured two valuable brigs, which she ordered into port.

1355. Brig Nancy, from Leghorn, with an exceeding rich cargo of silks, oil, sulphur, marble, &c. sent into New York, by the famous privateer Scourge of that port.

1356. Ship Lord Hood, from Quebec for London, captured by the same and burnt.

1357. Brig Trident, from ditto for ditto, captured by ditto and ditto.

1358. Brig Haddock, from ditto for ditto, captured by ditto and ditto.

1359. Brig Belfield, from ditto for ditto, captured by ditto and ditto.

1360. Brig Susan and James, captured by the Fox of Portsmouth and burnt.

1361. Schooner Retrieve, captured by ditto and ditto.

1362. Brig Concord, captured by ditto and made a cartel of.

1363. Brig Cossack, laden with wine, sent into Boston, by the Surprize of Baltimore. This vessel had been captured by the Grand Turk, of Salem, re-captured by the Bulwark, 74, and taken again and sent into port by the Surprize.

1364. Schooner Pink, captured by the Grand Turk of Salem, and sunk.

1365. Brig Brothers, from St. John's for Liverpool, with lumber, captured by ditto and ditto.

1366. Brig Belgrade from Malta for Falmouth, captured by the same, divested of some guns, &c. and permitted to proceed.

1367. Brig Robert Stewart, with lumber, captured by the same and burnt.

1368. Schooner Commerce, laden with fish, captured by the same and destroyed. The Grand Turk has arrived at Salem after a cruise of 103 days, with 44 of her original crew (the rest being on board her prizes) and fifty prisoners. Besides the above, she captured 7 or 8 other vessels, one with an invoice of £30,000 sterling—all which were manned and ordered for the U. S. The G. T. has on board goods to the value of 20,000 dollars.

1369. Schooner Mary, from Halifax, with a cargo of mackerel, captured by the Surprize of Baltimore, and sunk.

1370. A transport sloop "laden with naval stores and various implements of war," sunk by the enemy in Champlain, when running away from commodore Macdonough; and since raised. See official letter.

1371. Schooner Bird, from Newfoundland for the West Indies, with a cargo of fish, captured by the Grand Turk and sent into Salem.

1372. Ship Ocean, 350 tons, of and for London, laden with a cargo of masts, &c. viz. 35 masts, 35 bow-spirits for men of war—and a great quantity of other timber and lumber, and sent into — by the General Putnam, of Salem. The privateer herself has since been captured.

1373. Schooner Georgiana, from Martinico for Newfoundland, with 93 bbls. of rum, 4 bbls., and a few barrels of sugar, sent into — by the Grand Turk.

1374. Sloop —, captured by the Scorpion, of Salem, (of 1 gun) and sent into —.

1375. Schooner —, captured by the same and bilged.

1376, 1377. Schooners Eugene and Stinger, captured by the Nidas of Baltimore, divested and destroyed.

1378. Schooner Betsy and Jane, from St. John's for Castine, with 119 packages of dry goods, valued at 150,000 dollars, brought into — by the Cadet of Salem.

1379. Brig —, laden with fish, sent into — by the letter of marque Jonguille, of New-York.

1380. Sloop — from St. Lucia, captured by the Saucy Jack of Charleston, divested and given up.

1381. Schooner Mary, captured by ditto and ditto.

1382. Schooner Kingston Packet, captured by ditto and made a tender of.

1383. Sloop Cyrus, captured by said tender and burnt.

1384. Sloop Jane, with provisions, captured by the Saucy Jack, divested and given up to the prisoners.

1385. Ship Amelia, four long guns and eight 12-pound carronades, richly laden with dry goods, captured by the same after a close engagement of an hour, divested of the richest of her cargo and burnt. The Saucy Jack had one killed and one wounded—the Amelia four killed and five wounded.

1386. Schooner Wesley, laden with provisions, captured by the same and sent into St. Mary's.

1387. Schooner Jane, from Jamaica for St. John's, laden with rum, sugar, &c. brought into Savannah by the Saucy Jack; where she has arrived with a full cargo of dry goods, taken from the Amelia, and twenty prisoners.

Extract from the journal of the Saucy Jack:—October 31, at six P. M. Cape Tiberon bore east by south and Navassa south-east by south, distant twenty miles—at ten P. M. I have ton in company with the Packet, our tender. At one A. M. I saw two ships standing to the westward—gave chase, and at two being within gun shot, fired three shots at them from our long guns, on which, one of the ships returned the fire and both immediately shortened sail. At six A. M. being within half gun shot of them found that one mounted sixteen and the other eighteen, but did not appear to be well manned. At seven hoisted the colors and began the engagement with the nearest ship—at ten minutes past seven boarded her on the larboard beam and then found her to be full of soldiers. The Saucy Jack on perceiving this, immediately cheered off, when the two ships continued to chase her until a quarter before eight o'clock, putting her at the time a constant fire of grape and musketry—it was 8 o'clock before the schooner got out of reach of the enemy's guns. In this engagement the Saucy Jack had eight men killed and fifteen wounded—received two balls in her hull, and her spars and rigging were very much cut up.

Kingston, Jamaica, November 2.—Yesterday morning, the Volcano bomb-ship, captain Price, and transport ship Golden Fleece, from the Chesapeake, having on board 250 troops, appeared in the offing, but from the baffling winds were not enabled to reach Port Royal at the time this paper was put to press.

On Sunday night, about twelve o'clock, off the Navassa, the Volcano perceived a schooner standing towards her, which fired several shot when they were returned. The Volcano shortened sail, in order that the schooner might approach her. At about eight o'clock the following morning, she was ascertained to be a large black vessel with white streaks, which ran alongside and attempted to board, but finding the Volcano was not a merchantman, she endeavored to sheer off, at which time several volleys of musketry and great guns were discharged at her, that swept her deck and killed most of those who endeavored to board, when the remainder perceived to run below. The Volcano then chased her for three miles, but perceiving no probability of coming up with her, relinquished the pursuit. During the contest, a very enterprising officer of marine artillery, lieutenant W. P. Putzel, and two seamen were killed, and two men wounded. The privateer had in company a balahoo schooner, which did not attempt to afford her any assistance; she mounted six carriage guns on a pivot and was full of men.

1388. Brig Louisa, laden with salt and a few boxes of tin, captured by the Macedonian of Portsmouth, divested of the tin and burnt.

1389. Brig Britannia, from St. John's for Liverpool with 195 tons of timber and a quantity of stores, captured by the same and burnt.

1390. Ship St. Edward Pellew, 307 tons, two guns, 19 men, in ballast, coppered, captured by the same and sunk.

1391. Schooner Mariner, laden with fish, captured by the same and made a cartel of.

¶ The Macedonian also manned two vessels—she was at sea only twenty days having carried away her bowsprit in a gale. She has arrived at Portsmouth with twenty-two prisoners.

1392. Schooner —, with a cargo of codfish, sent into Charleston by the Resolution of Baltimore.

1393. Brig S. B. two guns, twelve men, from Havana for London, laden with sugar and coffee, sent into — by the Kemp of Baltimore.

¶ The Kemp sailed from Wilmington on the 9th of November, and returned to the same port on the 6th of December, with fifty-three prisoners! The following account of the battle with and capture of a small fleet of the enemy is singular and interesting.

"December 1, at 8 A. M. I despatched a fleet from the mast-head of nine sail, out every sail drawing in chase. Meridian came up with them near enough to discover a frigate in company. Lat. 32, 32. N. long. 77, 01. W. December 4, the frigate gave chase to us and drove us out of the fleet—made short tacks to windward, at sun set, ran her out of sight, during the night dodged her, and made after the fleet, judging how they steered. At day-light discovered them on the weather beam bearing NNE, wind at SE—At eleven A. M. boarded the Spanish ship Isabella, from Havana bound to Hamburg, overhauled her and permitted her to proceed. Proceeded after the fleet. Dec. 3, lat. 31, 06, N. long. 76, 02, W. The fleet five miles to windward, laid by in a line prepared for combat, a large ship in the van, three brigs, two schooners and a large ship in the rear. At two P. M. they bore up to us, and as they passed commenced firing in rotation; we returned our fire and tacked; they wore and we commenced firing with all our armament at half past two, the enemy in confusion, we fell on board one of the brigs, boarded her, she struck, one man wounded on our side—the rest keeping up their fire on us, our schooner not idle in returning the salute—at three fell on board the ship, Mr. Sellers, sailing master, and Mr. Myers, first-lieutenant, with eight men boarded her, she struck, no loss on our side, three wounded of hers; in attempting next to board the schooner they cried for quarters; ordered them to lie by. In a short time got alongside the largest of the brigs, after a contest of fifteen minutes she struck. During this time the schooner rehoisted 4th colors and commenced firing on the schooner again, when observing the single strike, she made sail and got off with the other brig who struck half an hour before. Conceived it best to secure all the prizes struck, and the number of our men and officers on board, then enquiring of one crew on board the schooner saw much, we could not pursue them. Manned for the four prizes as much, we could not pursue them. Manned for the four prizes and despatched them for the United States. Like the gallant Perry, we may say, "we have met the enemy and they are ours." In this unequal contest every man acted as Americans should do.

The following is a list of the vessels engaged.

The two last after striking rehoisted their colors and made off. Dec. 4th, at midnight got clear of all the prizes dispatched for the United States and the prisoners on board, amounting in all captured to seventy-one, fifty-three on board the schooner. Made the best of our way to the port of destination; at three got the ground; at eight made the land of Cape Romano—so ends the cruise, lasting six days. Our loss is one killed (John Irwin) and four wounded, all on the recovery doing well.

N. B. The prizes are large and valuable, loaded with coffee chiefly.

1394. Ship Rosabella, 16 guns, 35 men, an elegant vessel of 264 tons burthen and coppered, with a full cargo of sugar and coffee, captured by the Kemp, of Baltimore, and sent into Charleston. The Rosabella unfortunately grounded on the bar, where she was bilged and lost. This vessel is a loss to the enemy of from 2 to 50,000 dollars. She was afterwards set fire to by a British brig.

1395. Brig Portsea, 8 guns, 26 men, heavily laden with sugar and coffee, captured and sent into Charleston by the same.

1396. Ship Princess, 2 guns, 14 men, with a great cargo of sugar and coffee, sent into — by the same.

1397. Schooner —, laden with 5000 bushels of salt, sent into Ocracoke, by the Young Wasp.

1398. Schooner Hazard, from Halifax for Annapolis, N. S. with a valuable cargo of dry goods, West India produce, &c. captured by the Surprise of Baltimore, divested and burnt.

1399, 1400. Two small vessels captured by ditto and ditto—one burnt, the other given up to the prisoners.

1401. Schooner Mary, from Halifax for the West Indies, (cargo not mentioned) captured by the same and burnt.

1402. Brig Courtesy, 20 tons, laden with 30 tons cordage, 200 packages and bales of dry goods, 49 boxes shantling copper, and a quantity of iron, sent into Fairhaven by the Yankee, of Bristol, R. I. The invoices of this vessel are said to amount to 300,000 dollars.

1403. Schooner Polly, from Halifax for Martinique, laden with fish, &c. sent into Boston, by the Dash of Portland.

1404. Schooner Swift, laden with fish, lumber, &c. from St. John's for Grenada, captured by the Exp of Baltimore, and sent into —. The Expedition had taken three other prizes which we hope to notice a little while hence.

1405. Ship L'Amable, from Havana, under Spanish colors, sent into Wilmington, N. C. by the Roger of Norfolk, cargo, sugar.

1406. Schooner —, with a valuable cargo of crates, glass hardware, lead, &c. &c. sent into Beaufort, by the Hero of Newbern.

1407. Ship —, laden with provisions and stores for the allied forces in Florida, entering Mobile in a mistake for Pensacola Bay and there captured by our troops. Lucky!

48. Schooner Mary, from St. John's for Castine, with a rich cargo of dry goods, captured by the Cadet of Salem, divested of 100 cases of dry goods, manned and arrived in port. The privateer has safely arrived with her rich spoils at Thomastown. This prize was under convoy of an armed schooner, with whom the privateer coming up and supposing she might be a British vessel, the Charles Stewart started a fight, but seeing the Comber and Englishman, and was beaten off with the loss of one killed and one wounded—but the convoyed schooner (the Mary) was afterwards taken and served as above stated by the Cadet.

¶ An officer of the Endymion has stated, that the number of men they had killed and since died of their wounds, in the attack on the Neufchatel privateer, was sixty-two.

Militia drafts—or “Conscription.”

The ghost of “French influence” being laid in the sea that washes the shores of the little island of Elba—faction, at a loss for some noisy word, happily grasped “conscription,” and wielded it with no little effect on the minds of the people. It is astonishing how complete may be a delusion when a large body of men unite and act together to mislead the judgment—and I dare say, there are tens of thousands of very honest men who really believe that the plans for raising a military force lately before congress, had their origin with Napoleon Bonaparte, and never were embodied on paper but by him, except in the project of the secretary of war, or in the bill recently reported to the senate by Mr. Giles.

To undeceive honest men, and give our readers, in general, a document of high interest, we devote a great part of this number to the insertion of WASHINGTON's plan for organizing an army in 1790. That it was his plan, is undeniable from the assertion of gen. Knox—that “it was modified according to the alterations you [WASHINGTON] were pleased to insert.”

We heartily recommend it to the perusal of every one. Let Mr. Munroe's project (page 137) and Mr. Giles's bill (page 181) be also carefully read—and let the reader lay his hand on his heart and say which looks the most like a “conscription.”

To assist the collection, however, and present the leading features of the three plans, we have put them in brief contrast, for ready reference, as occasion requires:

WASHINGTON'S PLAN.	MONROE'S PLAN.	GILES' PLAN.
1. Liable to service. All persons between the ages of eighteen and sixty, except those excepted by the several states, &c. and all actual mariners—who are divided into classes, for marine services, &c.] 2. Classes. Youths of 18, 19 and 20 years old for the first class—men from 21 to 45, the second class; those from 45 to 60 the third class. 3. Requisitions for men. All persons, except as before excepted, between the ages of 18 and 60 years, to be formed into legions, regiments, companies and sections of 12 persons each. When men are wanted to “FORM AN ARMY,” they shall be furnished by the classes from 18 to 45 years old; the executive of the United States, or the commander in chief of the militia of each state, shall assess the numbers required; and from each section, if the demand be so great, “one person shall be detached by indiscriminate draft,” and the others of the section shall compensate him in money, &c. The men thus drafted to be as regulars for three years, and not to serve longer than that period at one time; but the draft may be repeated as often as occasion requires. The power to obtain substitutes regulated and confined, to certain cases. The rights of a free citizen denied for years to those who, while minors, had not served in the militia, &c. 4. Exemptions. Persons above the ages of 45 years and to 60, must, in cases of actual invasion or rebellion, furnish their quota of men, in like manner as the other classes.	1. Liable to service. All persons between the ages of eighteen and forty five, except as excepted in Washington's plan. 2. Class. All persons from 18 to 45 years old, in a general class for service. 3. Requisitions for men. The whole body of the militia from 18 to 45 years are divided into classes or companies, of 100 men, who shall “furnish men for the war, and replace them in case of casualty.” If any class, or company fails to provide the men required (which it may do by substitutes out of any class) a draft shall be made; but the persons so drafted may also furnish substitutes; and the rest of the class shall compensate the person drafted by money equal to the bounty money paid by the United States, according to their respective property. The men thus drafted to be as regulars. 4. Exemptions. All persons above the age of 45 years.	1. Liable to service. All persons the same as in Mr. Munroe's plan. 2. Class. The same as Mr. Monroe's. 3. Requisitions for men. The operation of the classification essentially the same as Mr. Munroe's—but the persons drafted “shall serve in the militia for the term of two years, unless sooner discharged.” Whatever time a person may have served in the militia theretofore, shall be deducted from the period of service required by this plan—so that no one can be compelled to serve a second time. Substitutes are allowed in all cases. The militia, so drafted, shall not be compelled to serve out of the United States, nor beyond the limits of the state or territory furnishing the same, and the limits of the adjoining state or territory, except that those of Kentucky and Tennessee may be required to serve in the defence of Louisiana. In the house of representatives, where the bill was chiefly opposed, the term of service was limited to one year. 4. Exemptions. The same as Mr. Monroe's.

According to my understanding of the three plans, the above is a fair abstract of their contents, on the four material points. It will be seen that WASHINGTON's is far more rigid and severe than Mr. Monroe's, and that of Mr. Monroe essentially harder than Mr. Giles's; which, in fact and honest truth, has nothing more in it than an extension of the service of the militia from six months to two years; and no man can make any thing more of it.

A very considerable part of WASHINGTON's plan is mere matter of detail, having little application to the immediate object of inserting it now; but we prefer to give it entire lest a fertile imagination might work itself into a belief that in the sections left out were contained some things essential to the merits of the whole, as is charitably supposed, when any thing is omitted by government in publishing its communications to or with our ministers abroad, even though the discussions may not yet have been closed.

Whether Bonaparte took his ideas of a "conscription" from the project laid before congress by gen. Washington and extended the plan; or whether he drew it from the practices of the Roman republic, and other ancient governments, is a matter of little importance. It is sufficient to shew that Mr. Monroe (and much less Mr. Giles) did not take Napoleon's. On the merits or demerits of either of those plans I have nothing to say—I would only shew how foolishly, or wickedly, it has been called a "FRENCH conscription."

Washington's Plan

OF THE GENERAL ARRANGEMENT OF THE MILITIA OF THE UNITED STATES, PUBLISHED BY ORDER OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

War Office, January 18, 1790.

Sir—Having submitted to your consideration a plan for the arrangement of the militia of the United States, which I had presented to the late congress, and you having approved the general principles thereof, with certain exceptions, I now respectfully lay the same before you, modified according to the alterations you were pleased to suggest.

It has been my anxious desire to devise a national system of defence, adequate to the probable exigencies of the United States, whether arising from internal or external causes; and, at the same time, to erect a standard of republican magnanimity, independence of, and superior to, the powerful influence of wealth.

The convulsive events, generated by the inordinate pursuits of riches or ambition, require that the government should possess a strong corrective arm.

The idea is, therefore, submitted, whether an efficient auxiliary branch of government can be invented, with safety to the great principles of liberty, unless the same shall be formed of the people themselves, and supported by their habits and manners.

I have the honor to be, sir, with the most perfect respect, your obedient servant,

H. KNOX,

Secretary for the department of war.

The president of the United States.

THE INTRODUCTION.

That a well constituted republic is more favorable to the liberties of society, and that its principles give a higher elevation to the human mind than any other form of government, has generally been acknowledged by the unprejudiced and enlightened part of mankind.

But it is at the same time acknowledged, that unless a republic prepares itself by proper arrangements to meet those exigencies to which all states are, in a degree, liable; that its peace and existence are more precarious than the forms of government in which the will of one directs the conduct of the whole for the defence of the nation.

A government whose measures must be the result of multiplied deliberations, is seldom in a situation to produce instantly those exertions which the occasion may demand; therefore it ought to possess such energetic establishments as should enable it, by the vigor of its own citizens, to controul events as they arise, instead of being convulsed or subverted by them.

It is the misfortune of modern ages, that governments have been formed by chance and events, instead of system—that without fixed principles, they are braced or relaxed, from time to time, according to the predominating power of the rulers, or the ruled: the rulers possessing separate interests from the people, excepting in some of the high-toned monarchies, in which all opposition to the will of the princes seems annihilated.

Hence we look around Europe in vain for an extensive government, rising on the power inherent in the people, and performing its operations entirely for their benefit. But we find artificial force governing every where, and the people generally made subservient to the elevation and caprice of the few: almost every nation appearing to be busily employed in conducting some external war—grappling with internal commotion—or endeavoring to extricate itself from impending debts, which threaten to overwhelm it with ruin. Princes and ministers seem neither to have leisure nor inclination to bring forward institutions for diffusing general strength, knowledge and happiness. But they seem to understand well the Machiavelian maxim of politics—divide and govern.

May the United States avoid the errors and crimes of other governments, and possess the wisdom to embrace the present invaluable opportunity of establishing such institutions as shall invigorate, exalt and perpetuate the great principles of freedom—an opportunity pregnant with the fate of millions, but rapidly borne on the wings of time, and may never again return.

The public mind, unbiassed by superstition or prejudice, seems happily prepared to receive the impressions of wisdom. The latent springs of human action, ascertained by the standard of experience, may be regulated and made subservient to the noble purpose of forming a dignified national character.

The causes by which nations have ascended and declined, through the various ages of the world, may be calmly and accurately determined; and the United States may be placed in the singularly fortunate condition of commencing their career of empire, with the accumulated knowledge of all the known societies and governments of the globe.

The strength of the government, like the strength of any other vast and complicated machine, will depend on a due adjustment of its several parts. Its agriculture—its commerce—its laws—its finance—its system of defence, and its manners and habits, all require consideration, and the highest exercise of political wisdom.

It is the intention of the present attempt to suggest the most efficient system of defence which may be compatible with the interests of a free people: a system which shall not only produce the expected effect, but which, in its operations shall also produce those habits and manners which will impart strength and durability to the whole government.

The modern practice of Europe, with respect to the employment of standing armies, has created such a mass of opinion in their favor, that even philosophers, and the advocates of liberty, have frequently confessed their use, and necessity, in certain cases.

But whoever seriously and candidly estimates the power of discipline, and the tendency of military habits, will be constrained to confess, that whatever may be the efficacy of a standing army in war, it cannot, in peace, be considered as friendly to the rights of human nature. The recent instance in France, cannot, with propriety, be bro't to overturn the general principle, built upon the uniform experience of mankind. It may be found, on examining the causes that appear to have influenced the military of France, that while the springs of power were wound up in the nation to the highest pitch, that the discipline of the army was proportionably relaxed. But any argument on this head may be considered as unnecessary to the enlightened citizens of the U. States.

A small corps of well disciplined and well informed artillerists and engineers, and a legion for the protection of the frontiers, and the magazines and arsenals, are all the military establishment which may be required for the present use of the United States. The privates of the corps to be enlisted for a certain period, and after the expiration of which to return to the mass of the citizens.

An energetic national militia is to be regarded as the CAPITAL SECURITY of a free republic; and not a standing army, forming a distinct class in the community.

It is the introduction and diffusion of vice and corruption of manners into the mass of the people, that renders a standing army necessary. It is when public spirit is despised, and avarice, indolence and effeminacy of manners predominate, and prevent the establishment of institutions which would elevate the minds of the youth in the paths of virtue and honor, that a standing army is formed and riveted forever.

While the human character remained unchanged and societies and governments of considerable extent are formed; a principle ever ready to execute the laws and defend the state, must constantly exist. Without this vital principle, the government would be invaded or overturned, and trampled upon by the bold and ambitious. No community can be long held together, unless its arrangements are adequate to its probable exigencies.

If it should be decided to reject a standing army for the military branch of the government of the United States, as possessing too fierce an aspect, and being hostile to the principles of liberty, it will follow that a well-constituted militia ought to be established.

A consideration of the subject will show the impracticability of disciplining at once the mass of the people. All discussions on the subject of a powerful militia, will result in one or other of the following principles.

First. Either efficient institutions must be established for the military education of the youth; and that the knowledge acquired therein shall be diffused throughout the community, by the mean of rotation. Or,

Secondly. That the militia must be formed of substitutes, after the manner of the militia of Great Britain.

If the United States possess the vigor of mind to establish the first institution, it may reasonably be expected to produce the most unequivocal advantages. A glorious national spirit will be introduced, with its extensive train of political consequences. The youth will imbibe a love of their country, reverence and obedience to its laws; courage and elevation of mind; openness and liberality of character; accompanied by a just spirit of honor; in addition to which, their bodies will acquire a robustness, greatly conducive to their personal happiness, as well as the defence of their country; while habit, with its silent but efficacious operations, will durably cement the system.

Habit, that powerful and universal law, incessantly acting on the human race, well deserves the attention of legislators—formed at first in individuals, by separate and almost imperceptible impulses, until at length it acquires a force which controls with irresistible sway. The effects of salutary or pernicious habits, operating on a whole nation, are immense, and decide its rank and character in the world.

Hence the science of legislation teaches to scrutinize every national institution, as it may introduce proper or improper habits to adopt with religious zeal the former, and reject with horror the latter.

A republic constructed on the principles herein stated, would be uninjured by events, sufficient to overturn a government supported solely by the uncertain power of a standing army.

The well informed members of the community, actuated by the highest motives of self-love, would form the real defence of the country. Rebellions would be prevented or suppressed with ease. Invasions of such a government would be undertaken only by madmen; and the virtues and knowledge of the people would effectually oppose the introduction of tyranny.

But the second principle—a militia of substitutes, is pregnant, in a degree, with the mischiefs of a standing army; as it is highly probable the substitutes from time to time, will be nearly the same men, and the most idle and worthless part of the community. Wealthy families, proud of distinctions which riches may confer, will prevent their sons from serving in the militia of substitutes, the plan will degenerate into habitual contempt; a standing army will be introduced, and the liberties of the people subjected to all the contingencies of events.

The expense attending an energetic establishment of militia, may be strongly urged as an objection to the institution. But it is to be remembered, that this objection is levelled at both systems, whether by rotation or by substitutes. For if the numbers are equal, the expense will also be equal. The estimate of the expense will show its unimportance, when compared with the magnitude and beneficial effects of the institution.

But the people of the United States will cheerfully consent to the expenses of a measure calculated to serve as a perpetual barrier to their liberties; especially as they well know that the disbursements will be made among the members of the same community, and therefore cannot be injurious.

Every intelligent mind would rejoice in the establishment of an institution, under whose auspices the youth and vigor of the constitution would be renewed with each successive generation, and which would appear to secure the great principles of freedom and happiness against the injuries of time and events.

The following plan is formed on these general principles:

First. That it is the indispensable duty of every nation to establish all necessary institutions for its own perfection and defence.

Secondly. That it is a capital security to a free state for the great body of the people to possess a competent knowledge of the military art.

Thirdly. That this knowledge cannot be attained in the present state of society but by establishing adequate institutions for the military education of youth; and that the knowledge acquired therein should be diffused throughout the community by the principles of rotation.

Fourthly. That every man of the proper age and ability of body, is firmly bound by the social compact, to perform, personally, his proportion of military duty for the defence of the state.

Fifthly. That all men of the legal military age, should be armed, enrolled, and held responsible for different degrees of military service.

And sixthly. That agreeably to the constitution, the United States are to provide for organizing, arming and disciplining the militia; and for governing such part of them as may be employed in the service of the United States; reserving to the states respectively the appointment of the officers, and the authority of training the militia according to the discipline prescribed by congress.

THE PLAN.—The period of life in which military service shall be required of the citizens of the United States, to commence at eighteen, and terminate at the age of sixty years.

The men comprehended by this description, exclusive of such exceptions as the legislatures of the respective states may think proper to make, and all actual mariners, shall be enrolled for different degrees of military duty, and divided into three distinct classes.

The first class shall comprehend the youth of 18, 19 and 20 years of age, to be denominated the advanced corps.

The second class shall include the men from 21 to 45 years of age—to be denominated the main corps.

The third class shall comprehend, inclusively, the men from 46 to 60 years of age—to be denominated the reserve corps.

All the militia of the United States shall assume the form of the legion which shall be the permanent establishment thereof.

A legion shall consist of one hundred and fifty-three commissioned officers, and two thousand eight hundred and eighty non-commissioned officers and privates, formed in the following manner.

First.—Legionary staff.

One legionary, or major-general.

Two aids-de-camp, of the rank of major; one of whom to be the legionary quarter-master.

One inspector and deputy adjutant general, of the rank of lieutenant-colonel.

One chaplain.

Second.—The brigade staff.

One brigadier-general.

One brigade-inspector, to serve as an aid-de-camp.

Third.—The regimental staff.

One lieutenant-col. commandant.

Two majors.

One adjutant.

One paymaster, or agent.

One quartermaster.

Fourth.—Two brigades of infantry.

Each brigade of 2 regiments; each regiment of 8 companies, forming 2 battalions; each company of a captain, lieutenant, ensign, 6 sergeants, 1 drum, 1 fife, and 64 rank and file.

Fifth.—Two companies of riflemen.

Each company to have a captain, lieutenant, ensign, 6 sergeants, a buglehorn, 1 drum, and 64 rank and file.

Sixth.—A battalion of artillery.

Consisting of four companies, each to have a captain, captain-lieutenant, 1 lieutenant, 6 sergeants, 12 artificers, and 53 rank and file.

Seventh.—A squadron of cavalry.

Consisting of two troops; each troop to have a captain, 2 lieutenants, a cornet, 6 sergeants, 1 farrier, 1 saddler, 1 trumpeter, and 64 dragoons.

In case the whole number of the advanced corps in any state should be insufficient to form a legion of this extent yet the competent parts must be preserved, and the reduction proportioned, as nearly as may be, to each part.

The companies of all the corps shall be divided into sections of twelve each. It is proposed by this division to establish one uniform vital principle, which, in peace and war, shall pervade the militia of the United States.

All requisitions for men to FORM AN ARMY, either for state or federal purposes, shall be furnished by the advanced and main corps, by means of the sections.

The executive government, or commander in chief of the militia of each state, will assess the numbers required on the respective legions of these corps.

The legionary general will direct the proportions to be furnished by each part of his command. Should the demand be so great as to require one man from each section, then the operations hereby directed shall be performed by single sections. But if a less number should be required, they will be furnished by an association of sections, or companies, according to the demand. In any case, it is probable that mutual convenience may dictate an agreement with an individual, to perform the service required. If, however, no agreement can be made, one must be detached by an indiscriminate draught; and the others shall pay him a sum of money, equal to the averaged sum which shall be paid in the same legion for the voluntary performance of the service required.

In case any sections, or companies of a legion, after having furnished its own quota, should have more men willing to engage for the service required, other companies of the same legion shall have permission to engage them. The same rule to extend to the different legions in the state.

The legionary general must be responsible to the commander in chief of the militia of the state that the men furnished are according to the description, and that they are equipped in the manner and marched to the rendezvous, conformably to the orders for that purpose.

The men who may be drafted, shall not serve more than three years at one time.

The reserved corps being destined for the domestic defence of the state shall not be obliged to furnish men, excepting in cases of actual invasion, or rebellion—and then the men required shall be furnished by means of the sections.

The actual commissioned officers of the respective corps, shall not be included in the sections nor in any of the operations thereof.

The respective states shall be divided into portions or districts; each of which to contain, as nearly as may be, some complete part of a legion.

Every citizen of the United States, who shall serve his country in the field, for the space of one year, either as an officer or soldier, shall, if under the age of twenty one years, be exempted from the service required in the advanced corps. If he shall be above the age of twenty-one years, then every year he shall so serve in the field, shall be estimated as equal to six years service in the main or reserved corps, and shall accordingly exempt him from every service therein for the said term of six years, except in cases of actual invasion of, or rebellion within, the state in which he resides. And it shall also be a permanent establishment, that six years actual service in the field shall entirely free every citizen from any further demands of service, either in the militia or in the field, unless in cases of invasion or rebellion.

All actual mariners, or seamen, in the respective states, shall be registered in districts, and divided into two classes. The first class to consist of all the seamen, from the age of sixteen to thirty years, inclusively. The second class to consist of all those of the age of thirty-one to forty-five inclusively.

The first class shall be responsible to serve three years on board of some public armed vessel, or ship of war, as a commissioned officer, warrant officer, or private mariner, for which service they shall receive the customary wages and emoluments.

But should the state not demand the said three years service during the above period, from the age of sixteen to thirty years then the party to be exempted entirely therefrom.

The person so serving shall receive a certificate of his service, on parchment, according to the form which shall be directed, which shall exempt him from any other than voluntary service, unless in such exigencies as may require the services of all the members of the community.

The second class shall be responsible for a proportion of service, in those cases to which the first class shall be unequal. The numbers required shall be furnished by sections in the same manner as is prescribed for the sections of the militia.

OF THE ADVANCED CORPS.

The advanced corps are designed not only as a school in which the youth of the United States are to be instructed in the art of war, but they are, in all cases of exigence, to serve as an actual defence to the community.

The whole of the armed corps shall be clothed according to the manner hereafter directed, armed and subsisted at the expense of the United States; and all the youth of the said corps, in each state, shall be encamped together, if practicable, or by legions, which encampments shall be denominated the annual camps of discipline.

The youth of 18 and 19 years shall be disciplined for thirty days successively in each year; and those of 20 years shall be disciplined only for ten days in each year, which shall be the last ten days of the annual encampments.

The non-commissioned officers and privates are not to receive any pay during the said time. But the commissioned officers will receive the pay of their relative ranks, agreeably to the federal establishment for the time being.

In order that the plan shall effectually answer the end proposed, the first day of January shall be the fixed period for all who attain the age of eighteen years, in any part, or during the course of each year, to be enrolled in the advanced corps, and to take the necessary oaths to perform personally such legal military service as may be directed for the full and complete term of three years, to be estimated from the time of entrance into the said corps; and also to take an oath of allegiance to the state and to the United States.

The commanding officer, or general of the advanced legions of the district, shall regulate the manner of the service of the youth respectively, whether it shall be in the infantry, artillery, or cavalry; but after having entered into either of them, no change should be allowed.

Each individual at his first joining the annual camps of discipline, will receive complete arms and accoutrements, all which, previously to his being discharged from the said camps, he must return to the regimental quarter-master, on the penalty of dollars, or months imprisonment.

The said arms and accoutrements shall be marked in some conspicuous place with the letters M. U. S. And all sales or purchases of any of said arms or accoutrements, shall be severely punished according to law.

And each individual will also, on his first entrance into the advanced corps, receive the following articles of uniform clothing: one hat, one uniform short coat, one waist coat, and one pair of overalls; which he shall retain in his own possession, and for which he shall be held accountable, and be compelled to replace all deficiencies during his service in the annual camps of discipline.

Those who shall serve in the cavalry, shall be at the expense of their own horses, and uniform helmets, and horse furniture; but they shall receive forage for their horses, swords, pistols, and clothing equal in value to the infantry.

At the age of twenty-one years, every individual having served in the manner and for the time prescribed, shall receive an honorary certificate thereof, on parchment, and signed by the legionary general and inspector.

The names of all persons to whom such certificates shall be given, shall be fairly registered in books to be provided for that purpose.

And the said certificate, or an attested copy of the register aforesaid, shall be required as an indispensable qualification for exercising any of the rights of a free citizen, until after the age of years.

The advanced legions, in all cases of invasion or rebellion, shall on requisition of lawful authority, be obliged to march to any place within the United States, to remain embodied for such time as shall be directed, not to exceed one year, to be computed from the time of marching from the regimental parades; during the period of their being on such service, to be placed on the continental establishment of pay, subsistence, clothing, forage, tents, camp equipage, and all such other allowances as are made to the federal troops at the same time and under the same circumstances.

If the military service so required should be for such a short period as to render an actual issue of clothing unnecessary, then an allowance should be made, in proportion to the annual cost of clothing for the federal soldier, according to estimates to be furnished for that purpose from the war office of the United States.

In case the legions of the advanced corps should march to any place, in consequence of a requisition of the general government all legal and proper expenses of such march shall be paid by the United States. But should they be embodied, and march, in consequence of an order derived from the authority of the state to which they belong, and for state purposes, then the expenses will be borne by the state.

The advanced corps shall be constituted on such principles that, when completed, it will receive one third part, and discharge one third part of its numbers annually. By this arrangement, two thirds of the corps will at all times, be considerably disciplined; but, as it will only receive those of 18 years of age, it will not be completed, until the third year after its institution. Those who have already attained the ages of 19 and 20 years, will, in the first instance, be enrolled in the main corps.

But one half of the legionary officers to be appointed the first, and the other the second year of the establishment.

The officers of each grade in the states respectively, shall be divided into three classes, which shall, by lot, be numbered one, two, and three, and one of the said classes, according to their numbers, shall be deranged every third year. In the first period of nine years, one third part will have to serve three, one third part six, and one third part nine years. But after the said first period the several classes will serve nine years, which shall be the limitation of service by virtue of the same appointment; and in such cases where there may not be three officers of the same grade, the limitation of nine years service shall be observed. All vacancies occasioned by the aforesaid derangements, or any casualties, shall be immediately filled by new appointments.

The captains and subalterns of the advanced corps, shall not be less than twenty-one, nor more than thirty-five; and the field officers shall not exceed forty five years of age.

Each company, battalion and regiment, shall have a fixed parade or place at which to assemble. The companies shall assemble at their own parade and march to the parade of the battalion, and the battalions to the regimental parade; and when thus embodied the regiment will march to the rendezvous of the legion. Every commanding officer of a company battalion and regiment, will be accountable to his superior officer that his command is in the most perfect order.

The officers to receive subsistence money in lieu of provisions, in proportion to their respective grades; and those whose duties require them to be on horseback will receive forage in the same proportion.

Every legion must have a chaplain, of respectable talents and character, who besides his religious functions, should impress on the minds of the youth, at stated periods, in concise discourses, the eminent advantages of free governments to the happiness of society—and that such governments can only be supported by the knowledge, spirit, and virtuous conduct of the youth; to be illustrated by the most conspicuous examples of history.

No amusements should be admitted in camp, but those which correspond with war. The swimming of men and horses, running, wrestling, and such other exercises as should render the body flexible and vigorous.

The classes should if possible, be formed near a river, and remote from large cities. The first is necessary for the practice of the manoeuvres, the second to avoid the vices of populous places.

The time of the annual encampment shall be divided into six parts or periods of five days each.—The first of which shall be occupied in acquiring the air, attitudes, and first principles of a soldier—the second in learning the manual exercise, and to march individually, and in small squads. The third and fourth in exercising and manoeuvring in detail and by battalions and regiments. In the fifth, the youth of twenty, having been disciplined during the two preceding annual encampments, are to be included. This period is to be employed in the exercise and tactics of the legion; or, if more than one, in executing the grand manoeuvres of the whole body—marching, attacking and defending in various forms, different grounds and positions; in fine, in comprehending all the real images of war, excepting the effusion of blood.

The guards, and every other circumstances of the camp, to be perfectly regulated.

Each state will determine on the season in which its respective annual encampments shall be formed, so as best to suit the health of the men, and the general interests of the society.

The U. S. to make an adequate provision to supply the arms, clothing, rations, artillery, ammunition, forage, straw, tents, camp-equipage, including every requisite for the annual camps of discipline; and also for the pay and subsistence of the legionary officers, and for the following general staff: one inspector-general, one adjutant-general, one quartermaster-general, with a deputy for each state.

These officers will be essential to the uniformity, economy and efficacy of the system, to be appointed in the manner prescribed by the constitution of the United States.

The quarter-master general shall be responsible to the United States for the public property of every species, delivered to him for the annual camps of discipline; and his deputy in each state shall be responsible to him,

At the commencement of the annual camps of discipline, the deputy quartermaster will make regular issues to the legionary or regimental quartermasters, as the case may be, of all the articles, of every species, provided by the United States.

The returns for the said articles to be examined and certified by the highest legionary or regimental officer, as the case may be, who shall be responsible for the accuracy thereof.

At the expiration of the annual camps of discipline, all public property (clothing excepted) shall be returned to the deputy quartermasters of the state who shall hold the legionary quartermaster accountable for all deficiency. All the apparatus and property so returned shall be carefully examined, repaired and deposited in a magazine, to be provided in each state for that purpose, under the charge of the said deputy quartermaster, until the ensuing annual encampment, or any occasion which may render a new issue necessary.

Corporal punishments shall never be inflicted in the annual camps of discipline, but a system of fine and imprisonment shall be formed for the regular government of said camps.

OF THE MAIN CORPS.

As the main and reserved corps are to be replenished by the principle of rotation from the advanced corps, and ultimately to consist of men, who have received their military education therein, it is proper that one uniform arrangement should pervade the several classes.

It is for this reason, the legion is established as the common form of all the corps of the militia.

The main legions, consisting of the great majority of the men of the military age, will form the principal defence of the country.

They are to be responsible for their proportion of men, to form an army whenever necessity shall dictate the measure; and on every sudden occasion to which the advanced corps shall be incompetent, an adequate number of non-commissioned officers and privates shall be added thereto, from the main corps, by means of the sections.

The main corps will be perfectly armed in the first instance, and will practice the exercise and manoeuvres four days in each year, and will assemble in their respective districts, by companies, battalions, regiments, or legions, as shall be directed by the legionary general; but it must be a fixed rule, that in the populous parts of the states, the regiments must assemble once annually, and the legions once in three years.

Although the main corps cannot acquire a great degree of military knowledge, in a few days prescribed for its annual exercise; yet by the constant accession of the youth from the advanced corps, it will soon command respect for its discipline, as well as its numbers.

When the youth are transferred from the advanced corps, they shall invariably join the flank companies, the cavalry, or artillery of the main corps, according to the nature of their former services.

OF THE RESERVED CORPS.

The reserved corps will assemble only twice annually for the inspection of arms, by companies, battalions, or regiments, as shall be directed by each state. It will assemble by legions, whenever the defence of the state may render the measure necessary.

Such are the propositions of the plan: to which it may be necessary to add some explanations.

Although the substantial political maxim, which requires personal service of all the members of the community for the defence of the state, is obligatory under all forms of society, and is the main pillar of a free government, yet the degrees thereof may vary at the different periods of life, consistently with the general welfare. The public convenience may also dictate a relaxation of the general obligation, as it respects the principal magistrates, and the ministers of justice and religion, and perhaps some religious sects. But it ought to be remembered, that measures of national importance, should never be frustrated by the accommodation of individuals.

The military age has generally commenced at sixteen, and terminated at the age of 60 years; but the youth of sixteen do not commonly attain such a degree of robust strength, as to enable them to sustain, without injury, the hardships incident to the field; therefore, the commencement of military service is herein fixed at eighteen—and the termination as usual, at sixty years of age.

As the plan proposes, that the militia shall be divided into three capital classes, and that each class shall be formed into legions; the reasons for which shall be given in succession.

The advanced corps, and annual camps of discipline, are instituted in order to introduce an operative military spirit in the community, to establish a course of honorable military service, which will at the same time, mould the minds of the young men, to a due obedience of the laws; instruct them in the art of war, and by the manly exercise of the field, form a race of hardy citizens, equal to the dignified task of defending their country.

An examination into the employments and obligations of the individuals composing the society, will evince the impossibility of diffusing an adequate knowledge of the art of war, by any other means than a course of discipline, during the period of manhood. The time necessary to acquire this important knowledge, cannot be afforded at any other period of life, with so little injury to the public or private interest.

Without descending to minute distinctions, the body of the people of the United States may be divided into two parts—the yeomanry of the country, and the men of various employments resident in the towns and cities. In both parts, it is usual for the male children, from the age of fourteen to twenty one years, to learn some trade or employment, under the direction of a parent or master. In general, the labor or service of the youth during this period, besides amply repaying the trouble of tuition, leaves a large profit to the tutor. This circumstance is stated, to show, that no great hardships will arise in the first operations of the proposed plan; a little practice will render the measure perfectly equal, and remove every difficulty.

Youth is the time for the state to avail itself of those services which it has a right to demand, and by which it is to be invigorated and preserved; in this season, the passions and affections are strongly influenced by the splendor of military parade. The impressions the mind receives will be retained through life. The young men will repair with pride and pleasure to the field of exercise, while the head of a family, anxious for its general welfare and perhaps its immediate subsistence, will reluctantly quit his domestic duties for any length of time.

The habits of industry will be rather strengthened than relaxed by the establishment of the annual camps of discipline, as all the time will be occupied by the various military duties. Idleness and dissipation will be regarded as disgraceful, and punished accordingly. As soon as the youth attain the age of manhood, a natural solicitude to establish themselves in the society, will occur in its full force. The public claims for military service, will be too inconsiderable to injure their industry. It will be sufficiently stimulated to proper exertions, by the prospects of opulence attending on the cultivation of a fertile soil, or the pursuits of a productive commerce.

It is presumed that thirty days annually during the eighteenth and nineteenth, and ten days during the twentieth year, is the least time that ought to be appropriated by the youth to the acquisition of the military art. The same number of days might be added during the twentieth as during the two preceding years, were not the expense an objection.

Every means will be provided by the public, to facilitate the military education of the youth, which it is proposed shall be an indispensable qualification of a free citizen; therefore they will not be entitled to any pay. But the officers being of the main corps are at a different predicament, they are supposed to be passed through the course of discipline required by the laws, and to be competent to instruct others in the military art. As the public will have but small claims for personal services on them, and as they must incur considerable expenses to prepare themselves, to execute properly their respective offices, they ought to be paid while on actual duty.

As soon as the service of the youth expires in the advanced corps, they are to be enrolled in the main corps. On this occasion, the republic receives disciplined and free citizens, who understand their public rights, and are prepared to defend them.

The main corps is instituted, to preserve and circulate throughout the community, the military discipline, acquired in the advanced corps; to arm the people, and fix firmly by practice and habit, those forms and maxims, which are essential to the life and energy of a free government.

The reserved corps is instituted to prevent men being sent to the field, whose strength is unequal to sustain the severities of an active campaign. But by organizing and rendering them eligible for domestic service, a greater proportion of the younger and robust part of the community may be enabled, in cases of necessity, to encounter the most urgent duties of war.

It would be difficult, previously to the actual formation of the annual camps of discipline, to ascertain the number in each state, of which it would be composed. The frontier counties of several states are thinly inhabited, and require all their internal force for their immediate defence. There are other infant settlements, from which it might be injurious to draw away their youth annually for the purpose of discipline.

No evil will result, if the establishment of the advanced corps should be omitted in such districts for a few years. Besides, the forbearance in this respect would lessen the expense, and render the institution more compatible with the public finances.

The several state legislatures, therefore as best understanding their local interests, might be invested with a discretionary power to omit the enrolments for the advanced corps, in such of their frontier and thinly inhabited counties as they may judge proper.

If the number of three millions may be assumed as the total number of the inhabitants within United States, half a million may be deducted therefrom for blacks, and pursuant to the foregoing ideas, another half million may be deducted, on account of the thinly settled parts of the country.

The proportion of men of military age, from eighteen to thirty years inclusively, of two millions of people of all ages and sexes, may be estimated at four hundred thousand. There may be deducted from this number, as actual mariners, about fifty thousand, and a further number of twenty-five thousand, to include exemptions of religious sects, and of every other sort which the respective states may think proper to make.

Three hundred and twenty-five thousand therefore may be assumed, as the number of operative fencible men, to compose the militia. The proportion of the several classes of which would be nearly as follows—

Firstly—The advanced corps, one tenth composed of the youth of the ages of 18, 19, and 20 years,	32,500
Secondly—The main corps, six tenths and one twentieth,	211,250
Thirdly—The reserved corps, two tenths and one twentieth,	81,250

The following estimate is formed for the purpose of exhibiting the annual expense of the institution of the advanced corps, stating the same at thirty thousand men.

[Here follows an estimate formed for the purpose of exhibiting the annual expense of the institution of the advanced corps, stating the same at 30,000 men.]

It is to be observed, that the officers for four legions will be adequate to command the youth of 18, who commence their discipline the first year, and that the same number of officers will be required for the second year. The youth of the third year may be incorporated by sections in the existing corps, so that no additional officers will be required on their account.

Hence it appears that the expense of 10,000 men, for one year, amounts, to	225,670
20,000, for the 2d year, to	316,840
30,000, for the 3d year, to	390,440

If the youth of the three ages of 18, 19 and 20 be disciplined at once, the last mentioned sum will be about the fixed annual expense of the camps of discipline, from which, however, is to be deducted 6.00 dollars, being the expense of the standards and colors, the former of which will be of a durable nature, and the latter will not require to be replaced oftener than once in twenty years,

The annual expense of the advanced corps, 384,140

Thus for a sum less than four hundred thousand dollars annually, which, apportioned on three millions of people, would be little more than one-eighth of a dollar each, an energetic republican militia may be durably established—the invaluable principles of liberty secured and perpetuated, and a dignified national fabric erected on the solid foundation of public virtue.

The main and reserved corps must be perfectly organized in the first instance; but the advanced corps will not be completed until the third year of its institution.

The combination of troops of various descriptions into one body so as to invest it with the highest and greatest number of powers, in every possible situation, has long been a subject of discussion and difference of opinion. But no other form appears so well to have sustained the criterion of time and severe examination, as the Roman legion. This formidable organization, accommodated to the purposes of modern war, still retains its original energy and superiority. Of the ancients, Polybius and Vegetius have described and given the highest encomiums of the legion. The former, particularly, in his comparative view of the advantages and disadvantages of the Macedonian and Roman arms, and their respective orders of battles, has left to mankind an instructive and important legacy. Of the moderns, the illustrious marshal Saxe has modelled the legion for the use of fire arms, and strenuously urges its adoption, in preference to any other form. And the respectable and intelligent veteran, late inspector general of the armies of the United States, recommends the adoption of the legion.*

"Upon a review," says he, "of all the military of Europe, there does not appear to be a single form which could be safely adopted by the United States. They are unexceptionably different from each other; and like all other human institutions, seem to have started as much out of accident as design. The local situation of the country, the spirit of the government, the character of the nation, and in many instances the character of the prince, have all had their influence in settling the foundation and discipline of their respective troops, and render it impossible that we should take either as a model. The legion, alone, has not been adopted by any; and yet I am confident in asserting, that whether it be examined as applicable to all countries, or as it may immediately apply to the existing or probable necessity of this, it will be found strikingly superior to any other.

1st. Being a complete and little army of itself, it is ready to begin its operations on the shortest notice or slightest alarm.—2d. Having all the component parts of the largest army of any possible description, it is prepared to meet every species of war that may present itself. And, 3d. As in every case of detachment, the first constitutional principle will be preserved, and the embarrassments of draughting and detail, which, in armies differently framed, too often distract the commanding officer, will be avoided,

* Vide, Letter addressed to the inhabitants of the United States on the subject of an established militia.

"It may easily suggest itself, from this sketch, that in forming a legion, the most difficult task is to determine the necessary proportion of each species of soldiers which is to compose it. This must obviously depend upon what will be the theatre, and what the style of the war. On the plains of Poland, whole brigades of cavalry would be necessary against every enemy; but, in the forests, and among the hills of America, a single regiment would be more than sufficient against any. And as there are but two kinds of war to which we are much exposed, viz. an attack from the sea-side by an European power, aided by our sworn enemies,* settled on our extreme left, and an invasion of our back settlements by an Indian enemy, it follows, of course, that musketeers and light infantry should make the greatest part of your army."

The institution of the section is intended to interest the patriotism and pride of every individual in the militia to support the legal measures of a free government—to render every man active in the public cause, by introducing the spirit of emulation, and a degree of personal responsibility.

The common mode of recruiting is attended with too great destruction of morals to be tolerated, and is too uncertain to be the principal resource of a wise nation in time of danger. The public faith is frequently wounded by unworthy individuals, who hold out delusive promises which can never be realized. By such means an unprincipled banditti are often collected for the purpose of defending every thing that should be dear to freemen. The consequences are natural; such men either desert in time of danger, or are ever ready on the slightest disgust to turn their arms against their country.

By the establishment of the sections, an ample and permanent source is opened, whence the state, in every exigence, may be supplied with men, whose all depends upon the prosperity of their country.

In cases of necessity, an army may be formed of citizens, whose previous knowledge of discipline will enable it to proceed to an immediate accomplishment of the designs of the state, instead of exhausting the public resources, by wasting whole years in preparing to face the enemy.

The previous arrangements necessary to form and maintain the annual encampments, as well as the discipline acquired therein, will be an excellent preparation for war. The artillery and its numerous appendages, arms, and accoutrements of every kind, and all species of ammunition, ought to be manufactured within the United States. It is of high importance that the present period should be embraced to establish adequate institutions to produce the necessary apparatus of war.

It is unworthy the dignity of a rising and free empire to depend on foreign and fortuitous supplies of the essential means of defence.

The clothing for the troops could, with ease, be manufactured within the United States, and the establishment in that respect would tend to the encouragement of important manufactures.

The disbursements made in each state for the rations, forage, and other necessary articles for the annual camps of discipline, would most beneficially circulate the money arising from the public revenue.

The local circumstances of the United States, their numerous seaports, and the protection of their commerce, require a naval arrangement. Hence the necessity of the proposed plan, embracing the idea of the states obtaining men on republican principles for the marine as well as the land service. But one may be accomplished with much greater facility than the other, as the preparation of a soldier for the field requires a degree of discipline, which cannot be learned without much time and labor; whereas the common course of sea service, on board of merchant vessels, differs but little from the service required on board of armed ships. Therefore, the education for war, in this respect, will be obtained without any expense to the state. All that seems to be requisite on the head of marine service, is, that an efficient regulation should be established in the respective states, to register all actual seamen, and to render those of a certain age amenable to the public for personal service, it demanded within a given period.

The constitutions of the respective states, and of the United States, having directed the modes in which the officers of the militia shall be appointed, no alteration can be made therein. Although it may be supposed that some modes of appointment are better calculated than others, to inspire the highest propriety of conduct, yet there are none so defective to serve as a sufficient reason for rejecting an efficient system for the militia. It is certain, that the choice of officers, is the point on which the reputation and importance of a corps must depend. Therefore every person who may be concerned in the appointment should consider himself as responsible to his country for a proper choice.

The wisdom of the states will be manifested by inducing those citizens, of whom the late American army was composed to accept of appointments in the militia. The high degree of military knowledge which they possess, was acquired at too great a price, and is too precious to be buried in oblivion; it ought to be cherished, and rendered permanently beneficial to the community.

The vigor and importance of the proposed plan, will entirely depend on the laws relative thereto. Unless the laws shall be equal to the object, and rigidly enforced, no energetic national militia can be established.

If wealth be admitted as a principle of exemption, the plan cannot be executed. It is the wisdom of political establishments, to make the wealth of individuals subservient to the general good, and not to suffer it to corrupt, or attain undue indulgence.

*"Sworn enemies settled on our extreme left"—the British in Canada—the "rod held over the back of the rebel colonies." What—and did Washington adopt this idea of the "bulwark of the religion and liberties of the world?" It may be considered a "melancholy truth," but he certainly did.

EE, Reg.

It is conceded, that people, solicitous to be exonerated from their proportion of public duty, may exclaim against the proposed arrangement as an intolerable hardship; but it ought to be strongly impressed, that while society has its charms, it also has its indispensable obligations. That to attempt such a degree of refinement, as to exonerate the members of the community from all personal service, is to render them incapable of the exercise, and unworthy of the character of freemen.[†]

Every state possesses, not only the right of personal service from its members, but the right to regulate the service on principles of equality for the general defence. All being bound, none can complain of injustice on being obliged to perform his equal proportion. Therefore it ought to be a permanent rule, that those who in youth, decline or refuse to subject themselves to the course of military education, established by the laws, would be considered as unworthy of public trust or public honors, and be excluded therefrom accordingly.

If the majesty of the laws should be preserved inviolate in this respect the operations of the proposed plan would foster a glorious public spirit; infuse the principles of energy and stability into the body politic; and give an high degree of political splendor to the national character.

Proceedings of Congress.

IN SENATE.

December 29. The bill for taxing house-hold furniture, &c. was passed to a third reading.

December 30. Mr. Kerr, a senator from Ohio, in the place of Mr. Worthington took his seat.

The death of Mr. Brent, a senator from Virginia was announced, and the usual order taken to pay the respect of congress to the memory of the deceased.

Monday, January 2. The bill laying duties on household furniture, having been read a third time as amended, the question on its passage was decided in the affirmative by the following vote:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Bibb, Brown, Chase, Condit, Gailard, Kerr, Lacoek, Morrow, Roberts, Robinson, Taylor, Turner, Varnum, Walker, Wharton—16.

NAYS—Messrs. Dargett, Horsey, Hunter, King, Lambert, Mason, Smith, Thompson, Wells—9.

So the bill was passed, and the concurrence of the house of representatives desired in the amendments thereto.

The senate resumed the consideration of Mr. Varnum's motion contemplating the reporting a bill for a draft of eighty thousand militia, to serve for nine months: which having been amended so as to require the committee, instead of reporting a bill, to enquire into the expediency of adopting such a measure was agreed to.

Mr. Horsey submitted for consideration the following resolution:

Resolved, That the fiscal committee be instructed to prepare and report a bill allowing drawbacks of the duties imposed on goods, wares and merchandise manufactured within the United States exported to any foreign port or place.

The senate resumed the consideration of the direct tax bill.

Mr. Turner moved to reduce the proposed amount of the tax from six millions to four millions five hundred thousand dollars; which motion was decided as follows:

YEAS—Anderson, Bibb, Condit, Lambert, Smith, Turner, Wharton—7.

NAYS—Bledsoe, Brown, Chase, Dargett, Fromentin, Gaillard, German, Horsey, Hunter, Kerr, King, Lacoek, Mason, Morrow, Roberts, Tait, Taylor, Thompson, Varnum, Walker—20.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Thursday, Dec. 29.—This day was consumed in considering amendment after amendment and motion after motion respecting the bill to establish a national bank, the most of which appeared to be got up only to waste time. We intended a detail of them, but the room is required for other things.—The house sat until 7 o'clock in the evening, and [†]The paragraph and the two that follow we recommend should be read at least twice over. Not because their meaning is any wise obscure, but on account of the strong doctrine they inculcate.

the majority rose with an apparent determination of passing the bill the next day.

Friday, Dec. 30.—After some other business, the House again took up the bank bill, but the proceedings were interrupted by a message from the senate announcing the death of one of their body, Mr. Brent, of Virginia, and the usual resolutions to attend the funeral were passed and the house adjourned.

Saturday, Dec. 31.—No business done, on account of the funeral of Mr. Brent.

Monday, Jan 2.—A good deal of minor business being disposed of, the house again took up the bill to establish a national bank—after a good many motions had been made, they came to the main question, "shall the bill pass?" and the yeas and nays were as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Alexander, Alston, Anderson, Archer, Avery, Barnett, Bigelow, Bradley, Brown, Caldwell, Cannon, Chappell, Clark, Clemenlin, Constock, Conard, Crighton, Crouch, Cuthbert, Dana, Davis of Pa., Denoyelles, Duval, Earle, Farrow, Findley, Fisk, of Vt. Fisk, of N. Y., Forney, Forsythe, Gholson, Gourdin, Griffin, Harris, Hasbrouck, Hawes, Hawkins, Hopkins, of Ky., Hubbard, Ingersoll, Lugham, Irving, Irwin, Kent of Md., Kerr, Kishaw, Kilbourn, King, of N. C., Lefferts, Lowndes, Lyle, McCoy, McKee, McLean, Montgomery, Moore, Murrel, Nelson, Ormsby, Parker, Pickens, Plemons, Roy of Pa., Rheo of Tex., Rich, Ringgold, Robertson, Sage, Sevier, Sharp, Schinor, Smith, of Pa., Strong, Tammill, Taylor, Telfair, Udree, Ward, of N. J., Williams, Wilson, of Pa., Yancy—81.

NAYS.—Messrs. Bard, Baylies of Mass., Bayly of Va., Bines, Bowen, Boyd, Bradbury, Breckenridge, Bingham, Burwell, Butler, Caperton, Cathoun, Champion, Cilley, Clouton, Cooper, Cox, Crawford, Culpepper, Davenport, Davis of Mass., D-slag, Ely, Evans, Franklin, Gaston, Gaddes, Glassrow, Grosvenor, Hale, Hall, Hanson, Henderson, Howell, Humphreys, Hulbert, Jackson, of R. I., Johnson, of Vir., Johnson of Ky., Kennedy, Kent of N. Y., King of Mass., Law, Lewis, Lovett, Macon, McKim, Miller, Moseley, Marcell, Newton, Oakley, Pearson, Pickering, Pitkin, Potter, John Reed, Wm. Reed, Ruggles, Schureman, Seybert, Sheffield, Sherwood, Shipperd, Slaymaker, Stanford, Stockton, Stuart, Sturges, Taggart, Thompson, Vose, Ward of Mass., Webster, Wheaton, White, Wilcox, Wilson of Mass., Winter—80.

The state of the vote having been declared—

THE SPEAKER (Mr. Cheves of S. C.) rose. After adverting to the rule of the house, which makes it the right and duty of the Speaker to vote in two cases, of which this was one, he proceeded to assign briefly the reasons which influenced him to vote against the bill. He noticed the opinions expressed on both sides of the house for and against the measure; and declared his conviction that the bill proposed a dangerous, unexampled, and, he might almost say, a desperate resort. He cursorily examined the three views in which the passage of the bill had been advocated, namely as calculated to resuscitate public credit; to establish a circulating medium; and to afford the ways and means for the support of the government. He delivered, with even more than his usual eloquence and impressiveness, his opinions on these several points, and concluded with expressing his solemn belief, that neither of these purposes would be answered by the bill. He denied that the passage of this bill was demanded by the safety of the nation; but intimated his opinion that a national bank bill might be framed, by which the avowed objects of the present bill might be accomplished, which he had no doubt would unite a majority in its favor. Although the vote was painful to him to give, he was therefore obliged to vote in the negative.

The Speaker's vote having produced an equality of votes, he declared the decision of the house to be, that the bill should not pass.

So the bill is rejected.

After which, Mr. Hall, who had voted in the negative, moved a reconsideration—not because he had changed his opinion, but to afford his friends an opportunity of giving such shape to the bill as might unite all the members favorable to the principle of establishing such a bank—before the question was decided on this motion the house adjourned.

[On the yeas and nays inserted above, it may not be amiss to remark, that several in the negative so voted from constitutional objections to the bill—others on account of its details.]

Tuesday, January 3. A bill to establish an uniform system of bankruptcy, and the bill from the senate to appoint certain naval officers (admirals) were read and referred.

The question then came up to reconsider the vote on the bill respecting the national bank. Many remarks were made by different gentlemen shewing their reasons why they should vote for or against the motion. After they had spoken, Mr. Hale said he had made his motion with the hope of obtaining a compromise, of conflicting opinions, and a modification of the present bill. But, finding its friends so wedded to it as to attempt to force it through the house, he withdrew his motion for a reconsideration.

Mr. McKim renewed the motion to re-consider the vote on the bank bill; not from any intension to change his vote, but from a disposition to accommodate his friends on a question of so much magnitude.

The question was decided by yeas and nays—for a re-consideration 107, against 54. After some time, the bill was re-committed to a select committee—yeas 89, nays 71.

Wednesday, Jan. 4. Mr. Fisk from the committee of ways and means, to whom was referred the amendments of the senate, to the furniture tax bill, recommend a disagreement to the same; and the question being taken thereon, they were accordingly disagreed to.

The amendments of the senate to the bill for taxing certain manufactures, were considered in committee of the whole, and afterwards in the house. Those amendments which go to exempt pig iron from taxation, and add umbrellas and parasols, were disagreed to, and the others were agreed to.

The house spent some time in committee of the whole, on the bill to prohibit intercourse with the enemy, and for other purposes; which underwent a considerable discussion, until late in the day, when the committee rose, reported progress and obtained leave to sit again thereon.

Events of the War.

MISCELLANEOUS.

HARTFORD CONVENTION. The doings of this assemblage are still a profound secret, except it appears that a person from Vermont, appointed, no body knows how, has been received, not as a delegate, but as "assistant secretary." Some persons have supposed they would adjourn in the first week in this month; and think they will report to their respective legislatures before their proceedings are made public. But we have no hint of what these proceedings are.

The effect of this meeting, let it end as it may, will be infelicitous. At two or three places the "publicans and sinners" have held meetings, and resolved that they considered it inexpedient to pay the duties for licenses until after the proceedings of the Hartford convention were published, by which they would regulate their conduct. Are these the men of "steady habits"—the "friends of order and law"—the "RELIGIOUS?"

We do not see any reason to apprehend the things so much talked of—we believe there is a "redeeming spirit" in the people of Massachusetts that will hunt the jacobins into the "bottomless pit" of confusion and disgrace, pell mell and headlong, the moment they do the overt act.

NEW-ORLEANS.—The intelligence of an enemy's fleet being off the Balize, as stated in our last, must have been premature. We have accounts from New Orleans to the 10th of December, at which time the enemy had not been heard of in that quarter, nor did they seem much to care how soon he came, being amply prepared to receive him. Gen. Jackson arrived there about the 2d of that month with a fine body of men. He proceeded down the river a day or two afterwards to inspect the different forts and works, some of which are represented as very powerful; and we are well supplied with block ships, gun boats, rafs, &c. His whole command is estimated at 22,000 men, besides the militia of Louisiana—of these about 10,000 were with him on the 2d December, and the Kentucky and Tennessee boys were pushing on to join him, as were also the Georgia troops. The following despatch received at Milledgeville, by the governor of Georgia, on the 10th, gives us some information of the enemy.

Milledgeville, Dec. 21.—Yesterday a despatch was received by the governor from general McIntosh, stating that information had been given by the Indians of the arrival at the mouth of the Appalachicola in Florida of a large British fleet, having on board according to the enemy's statement, fourteen thousand troops, and a considerable part of them blacks. Seven of the vessels are said to be very large, the remainder of smaller size and loaded with ammunition and presents for the Indians. The British have built a strong fort at Forbes's store, and placed in it a garrison of 300 men. All the Indians have been invited to come to receive presents—The Red Sticks and many runaway negroes have gone.

If the above news be true, the British evidently intend carrying on an active warfare against this state, and we shall not be surprized if an attempt be made to prevent a junction between our army and that under general Jackson.

The troops at fort Hawkins amounting to about 2500, struck their tents on Monday, and took up the line of march for Mobile, of which place and neighborhood gen. McIntosh will have the command, gen. Jackson intending to remain in the vicinity of New-Orleans. Of the route of the army we deem it improper to speak.

[Appalachicola bay may be about 250 miles, south in a direct line from Milledgeville, and about 300 east from the mouth of the Mississippi. The Flint river, which empties into this bay, has a navigation for small vessels or boats a considerable distance into the country inhabited by the Seminoles, the most savage Indians of the south, and also the most hostile. It is possible that the "bulwark of religion" may have made his appearance here to give life and spirit to his "dear allies," the savages and negroes; and, perhaps, leave a small force, with a full supply of arms and ammunition, for the purpose of murdering women and children on the inland frontiers of Georgia, while with his chief body he proceeds on his grand expedition.]

PENSACOLA. By a sloop that has arrived at Wilmington, N. C. with a cargo of sugar, and with several passengers from Havana, we learn "that great dissatisfaction with king Ferdinand existed there, and that though at first the capture of Pensacola by general Jackson had given a shock in that place which occasioned the stopping of American vessels—yet as soon as they received accounts of the manner in which Pensacola was restored, all difficulties ceased, the vessels were liberated and the Americans treated with great respect."

[Jackson's conduct at Pensacola will be approved, we trust, by all men, except the Jacobins of his own country, who would convert a Gabriel into a Belshazzar, if he opposed the white, red and black allied savages.]

The British, before they left Pensacola committed every excess—"pillage, ravage, destruction and fire marked their progress;" and to cap the whole, they carried off 100 negroes belonging to their "dear friends" the Spaniards! Letters from thence are filled with eulogiums on the conduct of Jackson; they call him the "liberator of Pensacola"—and well might the people of that place declare, that "our Chactaws were more civilized than the (religious) English!"

BALTIMORE. The following tale was told to the committee of vigilance of the city of Baltimore, by two persons who have been with the enemy since August last, and were in the Menelaus frigate at the time of the de onstration on Baltimore. The attempt to pass the Ferry Branch [Fort Covington] was made, as one of them states, by eighty boats carrying about 25 men each, eight of which were entirely destroyed, with a loss as was admitted by some inferior officers, after their return, of from 5 to 600 men! Two boats only went from the Menelaus, both of which returned, but 17 of the men were missing. They have communicated some other information, highly interesting, but improper to communicate at the present time.

[We put no faith in this report to the extent stated—but it is impossible to believe that the enemy did not suffer severely on the occasion alluded to, though the admiral, (candid soul!) does not even mention the expedition.]

SOUTH CAROLINA has placed at the disposition of the government of the United States, 260,000 dollars, to pay the troops in that quarter, to be passed to the credit of the state in anticipation of its quota of the direct tax. The honorable particulars of this transaction shall be recorded.

STATE TROOPS.—The legislature of South Carolina has passed a law to raise a brigade of state troops—the officers are: Daniel Elliott Huger, brigadier-general; Andrew Pickens and James R. Pringle, colonels; Francis A. Deloach and W. G. Middleton, lieutenant-colonels; James M. Kibben and John Canty, 1st majors; Andrew Hasell and John S. Maner, 2d majors.

NEW YORK. Gov. Tompkins having proceeded to Albany, the command of this post has devolved on brig. gen. Boyd. In a letter to the mayor, he offers his warmest thanks to the corporation of the city for its liberality and patriotism. The governor appears to have given great satisfaction in his military capacity, and to have secured the attachment and esteem of all parties.

CASTINE.—The British at Castine have had a report that the Independence and Constitution, with 27 privateers, and 13,000 men, were in complete readiness at Boston for an attack on that place!

THE HOSTAGES.—The original twenty-three hostages held by the British government in Canada, have at length been released. They arrived at Plattsburgh on the 22d ult. from Quebec.

MILITARY.

Maj. gen. Macomb has resumed his command at Plattsburgh, where the apprehension of a winter campaign seems considerably lessened.

Lt. col. Towson, is at present in Baltimore, on a visit to his friends. It is the first time that he has left his corps since the war.

Col. Joseph D. Learned, of the 34th regiment U. S. infantry, has been lately tried by a court martial, convened at Portland, of which brig. gen. Chandler was president, and found guilty of "fraud and embezzlement of public monies." It was proved that in the summer of 1845 he procured 709 cartridges boxes, belts and bayonet-scabbards to be made on account of the United States at $1 75 for each sett, and paid for them at that rate; but contrived to obtain a receipt for the rate of $2 per sett; by which means he obtained of the deputy commissary of purchases payment at the latter rate, thereby making a profit to himself of 25 cents on each sett, amounting in the whole to 175 dollars. He was found guilty likewise on other charges, and sentenced to be cashiered, which sentence is approved by the commanding officer of this district, and the said colonel Learned is no longer an officer of the army.

The Democratic Press, says—"We understand that an arrangement for the exchange of prisoners has been made, and that 4000 prisoners are expected to arrive in the United States."

GENERAL ORDERS.

Soldiers—It is a matter of congratulation to our country, to behold with what promptitude you have obeyed the summons to the field.

No sooner was the will of your government known, than you threw aside the habiliments of the peaceful citizen, and attired yourselves in the armor of war.

The convulsions which have agitated Europe for such a long series of years, have settled down into that despotism which favors legitimate kings; and the attention of the despots are now turned alone to our happy republic, with the hope of despoiling our free institutions, and sweeping our government from the map of the world.

The peace which has been formed by the consent of the princes of Europe, has given our enemy a great disposable force, which he will be enabled to throw on our borders, and will make him still more haughty than before this recent event. It becomes us then, my countrymen, to be prepared for any sudden invasion—to go forth and meet the enemy at the threshold of our territory—to be patient under all fatigue, and firm in sustaining all difficulties, remembering that the first glory of a soldier is his submission to the will of his country.

It is matter of pride to your general to know that he has the honor of commanding the troops of Tennessee.

Our state has risen to the highest lists of military glory, and he has a presentiment this army will be equally distinguished with those who have already served in the field.

The war has assumed such an aspect, and the pressure of it is so great that if ever exertions were necessary, they are at this moment.

The whole circumference of the United States can be invaded, either by the British or their numerous indian allies. Let us then be watchful of our territory, that its soil be not polluted by the sacrilegious tread of the savage, or of the subjects of that government who basely employs them.

The exigency of the times requires our immediate march to the lower country, there to protect that section of our union which is so important to the people westward of the Alleghany mountain.

The city of New-Orleans is the grand depot of the products of our country, and every one of us ought to feel a strong interest in defending this great mart of trade and source of wealth to the upper country.

It will afford your general infinite satisfaction, if your conduct in camp and while on the march, shall be such as to be pleasing to our fellow citizens. He hopes every soldier will be mindful of the reputation of the army. Let there be no offences given to the peaceful citizen, nor any waste of his private property.

It is in the power of a few men, by their refractory conduct, to bring disgrace on the whole army.

It is, therefore, the duty of every one of the detachment, to report the disorderly conduct of any of the soldiers, so that the commanding general may exact exemplary punishment on the offenders.

The embarkation of the troops will take place this day on board the transports now in the Cumberland river.

The general invokes the benedictions of heaven for this army—for its safety—its glory—and its honorable return—humbly knowing that the strong arm of power is alone derived from the Almighty.

By command,

ANDR. HYNES, adj. gen. of Ten. and aid to maj. gen. Carroll.

THE MEN OF TENNESSEE.—By the adjutant general.

Head-Quarters, on board the transports, near Fort Massac, Ohio river, November 28, 1814.

"The greater proportion of the Tennessee army are this far on their way to the lower country; consisting of three thousand men, under the command of major-general Carroll. The balance of our army have marched through the indian country by land, by way of forts Strother, Williams, and Jackson, to Mobile, consisting of two thousand men; making in the whole five thousand, which we have raised and marched without the limits of the state in about one month. Tennessee has now eleven thousand five hundred troops in the service of the United States, which is at least one third of the men who are entitled to bear arms. The returns of the militia of Tennessee, which have been made to my office as adjutant general, do not make the militia of the state more than thirty thousand; yet I presume the number is greater than the returns make them, and that nearly or about one third are now in service.

"The present secretary of war advised our governor Blount, dated in October last, that lord Hill was fitting out a large expedition from Ireland, destined to take possession of all that country from Cape Florida westward to the provinces of Spain, including the city of Orleans. Our government are anxious to anticipate his lordship's arrival, by having an adequate force to give him that reception which is due to so distinguished a personage. Every effort has been made to raise, organize and march our troops, and I hope to heaven they may arrive in time to avert the fall of that country, which is so important to the western world. Our state has made wonderful sacrifices, and is still willing to make many more, to preserve the integrity of the union.

"There are no difficulties which our citizens will not forego to aid the government at the present trying crisis—and I hope our efforts may not be unavailing."

NAVAL.

The President frigate did not sail from New York, as reported in our last.

Com. Campbell has taken up his head quarters at Savannah. Fifty vessels, under convoy of the gun-boats, arrived at that port from St. Mary's and Amelia island about 3 weeks ago.

We have a report that the sloop of war Wasp has again returned to France, after a brilliant cruise.

POSTSCRIPT.

The bill for laying a direct tax of six millions has passed the senate, and only wants the signature of the president to become a law—ayes 23, nays 7.

A strong bill is before the house to prevent smuggling, &c. It was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading—all but 8 or 9 of the opposition being absent when the vote was taken, to prevent a quorum.

The convention at Hartford rose, sine die, on the 4th instant. As the editor thought he could not present any thing that would so much gratify the curiosity of his readers, as a copy of their proceedings—many articles in type have been laid over to make room for it. There are a variety of statistical tables, published by order of the convention, which we expect to insert in our next—and some of them shall be examined and elucidated by other statistical facts, as we proceed in our essays regarding that assembly; which will be continued, as room is allowed, in several future papers.

Rates of Postage.

Postmasters will take notice, that by an act of congress passed on the 23d inst. the several rates of postage are augmented fifty per cent. and that after the first day of February next the Rates of Postage for single letters will be:

Post Master General.

General Post-Office, December 28, 1814.

POSTAGE OF THE REGISTER.

For the information of all concerned, we republish a letter from the late Post Master General, on the postage of the REGISTER. As his decision has never been reversed, (and, indeed, I cannot see how that it ever can be) it is binding in all cases whatsoever. The letter was in answer to one I had written to Mr. Granger, complaining that some post masters had charged my subscribers at the pamphlet rate of postage.

GENERAL POST-OFFICE,
January 13th, 1815.

Sir—Yours of the 6th is before me, as well as your former letter on the same subject. The delay of this answer has arisen partly from a multiplicity of business, and partly from a serious doubt of the legal character of your publication. But I am now satisfied and admit your publication to be a newspaper and to be rated at News-paper postage.

With esteem,

G. GRANGER.

H. NILES, Baltimore.

Eighty-one Copies.

By re-printing certain sheets of the first and second volumes of the WEEKLY REGISTER, eighty-one complete files of the work may be perfected; and they are all that can be furnished until the entire first volume, and a considerable part of the second, shall be re-printed. When this will be done, in the present state of the times, I have no idea of; as the expense will be very great. As those few copies are for sale, it is desirable to dispose of them as soon as possible, and they who wish complete files can ensure them only by immediate application. They may safely be sent to any post-office in the United States, at the expense of the purchaser for postage, at the same rate as for newspapers, per sheet; and the editor will guarantee their safe arrival, except at the offices in the state of Louisiana and in the several territories of the United States, to which, if sent, they must go at the risk of the owner.

The terms are these, absolute—

Before a file leaves the office, twenty two dollars must be paid for it, as follows:

For the three first years, or 6 vols. up to the present year in advance to Sept.
September, 1814,	$15
1815,	5
the extra supplement to vol. 5,	1
ditto ditto to be added to vol. 7,	1
	22

The 7th (or first volume of the present year) finishes on the last Saturday of next month (Feb.) "Brothers of the type," editors of newspapers, will oblige by giving the above an insertion.

37 Letters addressed to the editor must be post-paid.

Hartford Convention.

The proceedings of a convention of delegates, convened at Hartford, in the state of Connecticut, December 15, 1814.

REPORT, &c.

The delegates from the legislatures of the states of Massachusetts, Connecticut, and Rhode Island, and from the counties of Grafton and Cheshire, in the state of New-Hampshire, and the county of Windham in the state of Vermont; assembled in convention, beg leave to report the following result of their conference.

The convention is deeply impressed with a sense of the commission which they were appointed to execute, of devising the means of defence against dangers, and of relief from oppressions proceeding from the acts of their own government, without violating constitutional principles, or disappointing the hopes of a suffering and injured people. To prescribe patience and firmness to those who are already exhausted by distress, is sometimes to drive them to despair, and the progress towards reform by the regular road, is irksome to those whose imaginations discern, and whose feelings prompt to a shorter course. But when abuses reduced to system and accumulated through a course of years, have pervaded every department of government, and spread corruption through every region of the state, when these are clothed with the forms of law, and enforced by an executive whose will is their source, no summary means of relief can be applied without recourse to direct and open resistance. This experiment, even when justifiable, cannot fail to be painful to the good citizen; and the success of the effort will be no security against the danger of the example. Precedents of resistance to the worst administration are eagerly seized by those who are naturally hostile to the best. Necessity alone can sanction a resort to this measure; and it should never be extended in duration or degree beyond the exigency, until the people, not merely in the fervor of sudden excitement, but after a full deliberation, are determined to change the constitution.

It is a truth, not to be concealed, that a sentiment prevails to no inconsiderable extent, that administration have given such constructions to that instrument, and practised so many abuses under color of its authority, that the time for a change is at hand. Those who so believe, regard the evils which surround them as intrinsic and incurable defects in the constitution. They yield to a persuasion, that no change, at any time, or on any occasion, can aggravate the misery of their country.—This opinion may ultimately prove to be correct.—But as the evidence on which it rests is not yet conclusive, and as measures adopted upon the assumption of its certainty might be irrevocable, some general considerations are submitted, in the hope of reconciling all to a course of moderation and firmness, which may save them from the regret incident to sudden decisions, probably avert the evil, or at least insure consolation and success in the last resort.

The constitution of the United States, under the auspices of a wise and virtuous administration, proved itself competent to all the objects of national prosperity, comprehended in the views of its framers.

No parallel can be found in history, of a transition so rapid as that of the United States—from the lowest depression to the highest felicity—from the condition of weak and disjointed republics, to that of a great, united and prosperous nation.

Although this high state of public happiness has undergone a miserable and afflicting reverse, through the prevalence of a weak and profligate policy, yet the evils and afflictions which have thus been induced upon the country, are not peculiar to any form of government. The lust and caprice of power, the corruption of patronage, the oppression of the weaker interests of the community by the stronger, heavy taxes, wasteful expenditures, and unjust and ruinous wars, are the natural offspring of bad administrations, in all ages and countries. It was indeed to be hoped, that the rulers of these states would not make such disastrous haste to involve their infancy in the embarrassments of old and rotten institutions. Yet all this have they done; and their conduct calls loudly for their dismissal and disgrace. But to attempt upon every abuse of power to change the constitution, would be to perpetuate the evils of revolution.

Again, the experiment of the powers of the constitution, to regain its vigor, and of the people to recover from their delusions, has been hitherto made under the greatest possible disadvantages arising from the state of the world. The fierce passions which have convulsed the nations of Europe, have passed the ocean, and finding their way to the bosoms of our citizens, have afforded to administration the means of perverting public opinion, in respect to our foreign relations, so as to acquire its aid in the indulgence of their adherents. Further, a reformation of public opinion, resulting from dear bought experience in the southern and Atlantic states, at least, is not to be despaired of. They will have felt, that the eastern states cannot be made exclusively the victims of a capricious and impassioned policy. They will have seen that the great and essential interests of the people, are common to the south and to the east. They will realize the fatal errors of a system, which seeks revenge for commercial injuries in the sacrifice of commerce, and aggravates by needless wars, to an immeasurable extent, the injuries it professes to redress. They may discard the influence of visionary theorists, and recognize the benefits of a practical policy. Indications of this desirable revolution of opinion among our brethren in those states, are already manifested, while a hope remains of its ultimate completion, its progress should not be retarded or stopped, by exciting fears which must check these favorable tendencies and frustrate the efforts of the wisest and best men in those states, to accelerate this propitious change.

Finally, if the union be destined to dissolution, by reason of the multiplied abuses of bad administrations, it should, if possible, be the work of peaceable times, and deliberate consent. Some new form of confederacy should be substituted among those states, which shall intend to maintain a federal relation to each other. Events may prove that the causes of our calamities are deep and permanent. They may be found to proceed, not merely from the blindness of prejudice, pride of opinion, violence of party spirit, of the confusion of the times; but they may be traced to implacable combinations of individuals, or of states, to monopolize power and office, and to trample without remorse upon the rights and interests of commercial sections of the union. Whenever it shall appear that these causes are radical and permanent, a separation by equitable arrangement, will be preferable to an alliance by constraint, among nominal friends, but real enemies, inflamed by mutual hatred and jealousies, and inviting by intestine divisions, contempt and aggression from abroad. But a severance of the union by one or more states, against the will of the rest, and especially in time of war, can be justified only by absolute necessity. These are among the principal objections against precipitate measures tending to disunite the states, and when examined in connection with the farewell address of the father of his country, they must, it is believed, be deemed conclusive.

Under these impressions, the convention have proceeded to confer and deliberate upon the alarming state of public affairs, especially, as affecting the interests of the people who have appointed them for this purpose, and they are naturally led to a consideration, in the first place, of the dangers and grievances which menace an immediate or speedy pressure, with a view of suggesting means of present relief; in the next place, of such as are of a more remote and general description, in the hope of attaining future security.

Among the subjects of complaint and apprehension, which might be comprised under the former of these propositions, the attention of the convention has been occupied with the claims and pretensions advanced, and the authority exercised over the militia by the executive and legislative departments of the national government. Also, upon the destitution of the means of defence in which the eastern states are left; while at the same time they are doomed to heavy requisitions of men and money for national objects.

The authority of the national government over the militia is derived from those clauses in the constitution which give power to congress "to provide for calling forth the militia to execute the laws of the union, suppress insurrections and repel invasions." Also "to provide for organizing, arming and disciplining the militia, and for governing such parts of them as may be employed in the service of the United States, reserving to the states respectively the appointment of the officers, and the authority of training the militia according to the discipline prescribed by congress." Again, "the president shall be commander in chief of the army and navy of the United States, and of the militia of the several states, when called into the actual service of the United States." In these specified cases only has the national government any power over the militia; and it follows conclusively that for all general and ordinary purposes, this power belongs to the states respectively, and to them alone. It is not only with regret, but with astonishment, the convention perceive that under color of an authority conferred with such plain and precise limitations, a power is arrogated by the executive government, and in some instances sanctioned by the two houses of congress, of control over the militia, which, if conceded, will render nugatory the rightful authority of the individual states over that class of men, and by placing at the disposal of the national government the lives and services of the great body of the people, enable it at pleasure to destroy their liberties, and erect a military despotism on the ruins.

An elaborate examination of the principles assumed for the basis of these extravagant pretensions, of the consequences to which they lead, and of the insurmountable objections to their admission, would transcend the limits of this report. A few general observations, with an exhibition of the character of these pretensions, and a recommendation of a strenuous opposition to them, must not, however, be omitted.

It will not be contended that by the terms used in the constitutional compact, the power of the national government to call out the militia, is other than a power expressly limited to three cases. One of these must exist as a condition precedent to the exercise of that power—unless the laws shall be opposed, or an insurrection shall exist, or an invasion shall be made, congress, and of consequence the president as their organ, has no more power over the militia than over the armies of a foreign nation.

But if the declaration of the president should be admitted to be an unerring test of the existence of these cases, this important power would depend, not upon the truth of the fact, but upon executive infallibility. And the limitation of the power would consequently be nothing more than merely nominal, as it might always be eluded. It follows, therefore, that the decision of the president in this particular, cannot be conclusive. It is as much the duty of the state authorities to watch over the rights reserved, as of the United States to exercise the powers which are delegated.

The arrangement of the U. States into military districts, with a small portion of the regular force under an officer of high rank of the standing army, with power to call for the militia, as circumstances in his judgment may require; and to assume the command of them, is not warranted by the constitution or any law of the United States. It is not denied that congress may delegate to the president of the United States the power to call forth the militia in the cases which are within their jurisdiction; but he has no authority to substitute military prefects throughout the union, to use their own discretion in such instances. To station an officer of the army in a military district without troops corresponding to his rank, for the purpose of taking command of the militia that may be called into service, is a manifest evasion of that provision of the constitution which expressly reserves to the states, the appointment of the officers of the militia; and the object of detaching such officer cannot be well conceived to be any other than that of superseding the governor or other officers of the militia in their right to command.

The power of dividing the militia of the states into classes and obliging such classes to furnish by contract or draft, able bodied men, to serve for one or more years for the defence of the frontier, is not delegated to congress. If a claim to draft the militia for one year for such general object be admissible, no limitation can be assigned to it, but the discretion of those who make the law. Thus with a power in congress to authorize such a draft or conscription, and in the executive to decide conclusively upon the existence and continuance of the emergency, the whole militia may be converted into a standing army, disposable at the will of the president of the United States.

The power of compelling the militia and other citizens of the United States by a forcible draft or conscription, to serve in the regular armies, as proposed in a late official letter of the secretary of war is not delegated to congress by the constitution, and the exercise of it would be not less dangerous to their liberties than hostile to the sovereignty of the states. The effort to deduce this power from the right of raising armies, is a flagrant attempt to pervert the sense of the clause in the constitution which confers that right, and is incompatible with other provisions in that instrument. The armies of the United States have always been raised by contract, never by conscription, and nothing more can be wanting to a government possessing the power thus claimed, to enable it to usurp the entire control of the militia, in derogation of the authority of the state, and to convert it by impressment into a standing army.

It may be here remarked, as a circumstance illustrative of the determination of the executive to establish an absolute control over all description of citizens, that the right of impressing seamen into the naval service is expressly asserted by the secretary of the navy in a late report.* This a practice,

* Extract from report of the secretary of the navy dated November 15, 1844.

There is another branch of the service which appears to me to merit the serious deliberation of the legislature, with regard to the establishment of some regular system, by which the voluntary enlistments for the navy may derive occasional reinforcement from the services of those seamen, who, pursuing their own private occupations, are exempt, by their itinerant habits, from public service of any kind. In my view there would be nothing incompatible with the free spirit of our institutions, or with the rights of individuals, if registers, with a particular descriptive record, were kept in the several districts, of all the seamen belonging to the United States, and provision made by law for classing and calling into the public service, in succession for reasonable stated periods, such portions or classes, as the public service might require, and if any individual, so called, should be absent at the time, &c.

which in a foreign government has been regarded with great abhorrence by the people, finds advocates among those who have been the loudest to condemn it.

The law authorising the enlistment of minors and apprentices into the armies of the United States, without the consent of parents and guardians, is also repugnant to the spirit of the constitution. By a construction of the power to raise armies, as applied by our present rulers, not only persons capable of contracting are liable to be impressed into the army, but those who are under legal disabilities to make contracts, are to be invested with this capacity, in order to enable them to annul at pleasure contracts made in their behalf by legal guardians. Such an interference with the municipal laws and rights of the several states, could never have been contemplated by the framers of the constitution. It impairs the salutary control and influence of the parent over his child—the master over his servant—the guardian over his ward—and thus destroys the most important relations in society, so that by the conscription of the father, and the seduction of the son, the power of the executive over all the effective male population of the United States is made complete.

Such are some of the odious features of the novel system proposed by the rulers of a free country, under the limited powers derived from the constitution. What portion of them will be embraced in acts finally to be passed, it is yet impossible to determine. It is, however, sufficiently alarming to perceive, that these projects emanated from the highest authority, nor should it be forgotten, that by the plan of the secretary of war, the classification of the militia embraced the principle of direct taxation upon the white population only; and that, in the house of representatives, a motion to apportion the militia among the white population exclusively, which would have been in its operation a direct tax, was strenuously urged and supported.

In this whole series of devices and measures for raising men, this convention discern a total disregard for the constitution, and a disposition to violate its provisions, demanding from the individual states a firm and decided opposition. An iron despotism can impose no harder servitude upon the citizen, than to force him from his home and his occupation, to wage offensive wars, undertaken to gratify the pride or passions of his master. The example of France has recently shown that a cabal of individuals assuming to act in the name of the people, may transform the great body of citizens into soldiers, and deliver them over to the hands of a single tyrant. No war, not held in just abhorrence by a people, can require the aid of such stratagems to recruit an army. Had the troops already raised, and in great numbers sacrificed upon the frontier of Canada, been employed for the defence of the country, and had the millions which have been squandered with shameless profusion, been appropriated to their payment, to the protection of the coast, and to the naval service, there would have been no occasion for unconstitutional expedients. Even at this late hour, let government leave to New-England the remainder of her resources, and she is ready and able to defend her territory, and to resign the glories and advantages of the border war, to those who are determined to persist in its prosecution.

That acts of congress in violation of the constitution are absolutely void, is an undeniable position.

next in succession should perform the tour of duty of the absentee, who should on his return be liable to serve his original tour, and his substitute be exempt from his succeeding regular tour of duty.

It does not, however, consist with the respect and forbearance due from a confederate state towards the general government, to fly to open resistance upon every infraction of the constitution. The mode and the energy of the opposition, should always conform to the nature of the violation, the intention of its authors, and the extent of the injury inflicted, the determination manifested to persist in it, and the danger of delay.† But in cases of deliberate, dangerous and palpable infractions of the constitution, affecting the sovereignty of a state, and liberties of the people; it is not only the right but the duty of such a state, to interpose its authority for their protection, in the manner best calculated to secure that end. When emergencies occur, which are either beyond the reach of the judicial tribunals, or too pressing to admit of the delay incident to their forms, states, which have no common umpire, must be their own judges, and execute their own decisions. It will thus be proper for the several states to await the ultimate disposal of the obnoxious measures recommended by the secretary of war, or pending before congress, and so to use their power according to the character these measures shall finally assume, as effectually to protect their own sovereignty, and the rights and liberties of their citizens.

The next subject which has occupied the attention of the convention, is the means of defence against the common enemy. This naturally leads to the inquiries, whether any expectation can be reasonably entertained, that adequate provision for the defence of the eastern states will be made by the national government? Whether the several states can, from their own resources, provide for self-defence and fulfil the requisitions which are to be expected for the national treasury? and, generally, what course of conduct ought to be adopted by these states, in relation to the great object of defence?

†It appears from the following extract from a speech of Mr. Madison, in the debates in the Virginia convention, that he had a prophetic view of circumstances which would induce a majority of states to support VIRGINIA against the carrying states. See also the speeches of Mr. Nicholas in that convention, and the essays in the Federalist, written by Mr. Madison.

Extract from debates in the Virginia convention—Richmond Ed. p. 224.

I will not sit down till I make one more observation on what fell from my honorable friend. He says, that the true difference between the states lies in this circumstance—that some are carrying states, and others productive, and that the operation of the new government will be, that there will be a plurality of the former to combine against the interest of the latter, and that consequently it will be dangerous to put it in their power to do so. I would join with him in sentiments if this were the case. Were this within the bounds of probability, I should be equally alarmed, but I think that those states which are contradistinguished as carrying states, from the non-importing states, will be but few. I suppose the southern states will be considered by all, as under the latter description. Some other states have been mentioned by an honorable member on the same side, which are not considered as carrying states. New-Jersey and Connecticut can by no means be enumerated among the carrying states. They receive their supplies through New-York. Here then is a plurality of non-importing states. I could add another if necessary. Delaware, though situated upon the waste, is upon the list of non-carrying states. I might say that a great part of New-Hampshire is so. I believe that a majority of the people of that state receive their supplies from Massachusetts, Rhode Island and Connecticut. Might I not add all those states which will be hereafter admitted into the union? These will be non-carrying states, and will support Virginia in case the carrying states will attempt to combine against the rest.

Without pausing at present to comment upon the causes of the war, it may be assumed as a truth, officially announced, that to achieve the conquest of Canadian territory, and to hold it as a pledge for peace, is the deliberate purpose of administration. This enterprize, commenced at a period when government possessed the advantage of selecting the time and occasion for making a sudden descent upon an unprepared enemy, now languishes in the third year of the war. It has been prosecuted with various fortune, and occasional brilliancy of exploit, but without any solid acquisition. The British armies have been recruited by veteran regiments. Their navy commands Ontario. The American ranks are thinned by the casualties of war. Recruits are discouraged by the unpopular character of the contest, and by the uncertainty of receiving their pay.

In the prosecution of this favorite warfare, administration have left the exposed and vulnerable parts of the country destitute of all efficient means of defence. The main body of the regular army has been marched to the frontier. The navy has been stripped of a great part of its sailors for the service of the lakes. Meanwhile the enemy scours the sea-coast, blockades our ports, ascends our bays and rivers, makes actual descent in various and distant places, holds some by force, and threatens all that are assailable, with fire and sword. The sea-board of four of the New-England states, following its curvatures, presents an extent of more than seven hundred miles, generally occupied by a compact population, and accessible by a naval force, exposing a mass of people and property to the devastation of the enemy, which bears a great proportion of the residue of the maritime frontier of the United States. This extensive shore has been exposed to frequent attacks, repeated contributions and constant alarms. The regular forces detached by the national government for its defence, are mere pretexts for placing officers of high rank in command. They are besides confined to a few places, and are too insignificant in number to be included in any computation.

These states have thus been left to adopt measures for their own defence. The militia have been constantly kept on the alert, and harassed by garrison duties, and other hardships, while the expenses, of which the national government decline the reimbursement, threatened to absorb all the resources of the states. The president of the United States has refused to consider the expense of the militia detached by the state authority, for the indispensable defence of the state, as chargeable to the Union, on the ground of a refusal by the executive of the state, to place them under the command of officers of the regular army. Detachments of militia placed at the disposal of the general government, have been dismissed either without pay, or with depreciated paper. The prospect of the ensuing campaign is not enlivened by the promise of any alleviation of these grievances. From authentic documents, extorted by necessity from those whose inclination might lead them to conceal the embarrassments of the government, it is apparent that the treasury is bankrupt, and its credit prostrate. So deplorable is the state of the finances, that those who feel for the honor and safety of the country, would be willing to conceal the melancholy spectacle, if those whose infatuation has produced this state of fiscal concerns had not found themselves compelled to unveil it to public view.

If the war be continued, there appears no room for reliance upon the national government for the supply of those means of defence, which must become indispensable to secure these states from desolation and ruin. Nor is it possible that the states can discharge this sacred duty from their own resources, and continue to sustain the burden of the national taxes. The administration, after a long perseverance in plans to baffle every effort of commercial enterprise, had fatally succeeded in their attempts at the epoch of the war. Commerce, the vital spring of New England's prosperity, was annihilated. Embargoes, restrictions, and the rapacity of revenue officers, had completed its destruction. The various objects for the employment of productive labor, in the branches of business dependent on commerce, have disappeared. The fisheries have shared its fate. Manufactures, which government has professed an intention to favor and to cherish, as an indemnity for the failure of these branches of business, are doomed to struggle in their infancy with taxes and obstructions, which cannot fail most seriously to affect their growth. The specie is withdrawn from circulation. The landed interest, the last to feel these burdens, must prepare to become their principal support, as all other sources of revenue must be exhausted. Under these circumstances, taxes of a description and amount unprecedented in this country, are in a train of imposition, the burden of which must fall with the heaviest pressure upon the states east of the Potomac. The amount of these taxes for the ensuing year, cannot be estimated at less than five millions of dollars upon the New England states, and the expenses of the last year for defence in Massachusetts alone, approaches to one million of dollars.

From these facts, it is almost superfluous to state the irresistible inference that these states have no capacity of defraying the expense requisite for their own protection, and, at the same time, of discharging the demands of the national treasury.

The last inquiry, what course of conduct ought to be adopted by the aggrieved states, is in a high degree momentous. When a great and brave people shall feel themselves deserted by their government, and reduced to the necessity either of submission to a foreign enemy, or of appropriating to their own use, those means of defence which are indispensable to self preservation, they cannot consent to wait passive spectators of approaching ruin, which it is in their power to avert, and to resign the last remnant of their industrious earnings, to be dissipated in support of measures destructive of the best interests of the nation.

This convention will not trust themselves to express their conviction of the catastrophe to which such a state of things inevitably tends.—Conscious of their high responsibility to God and their country, solicitous for the continuance of the Union, as well as the sovereignty of the states, unwilling to furnish obstacles to peace—resolute never to submit to a foreign enemy, and confiding in the Divine care and protection, they will, until the last hope shall be extinguished, endeavor to avert such consequences.

With this view they suggest an arrangement, which may at once be consistent with the honor and interest of the national government, and the security of these states. This it will not be difficult to conclude, if that government should be so disposed. By the terms of it these states might be allowed to assume their own defence, by the militia: a other troops. A reasonable portion also, of the taxes raised in each state might be paid into its treasury, and credited to the United States, but to be appropriated to the defence of such state, to be accounted for with the United States. No doubt is entertained that by such an arrangement, this portion of the country could be defended with greater effect, and in a mode more consistent with economy, and the public convenience, than any which has been practised.

Should an application for these purposes, made to congress by the state legislatures, be attended with success, and should peace upon just terms appear to be unattainable, the people would stand together for the common defence, until a change of administration, or of disposition in the enemy, should facilitate the occurrence of that auspicious event. It would be inexpedient for this convention to diminish the hope of a successful issue to such an application, by recommending upon supposition of a contrary event, ulterior proceedings.—Nor is it indeed within their province. In a state of things so solemn and trying as may then arise, the legislatures of the states, or conventions of the whole people, or delegates appointed by them for the express purpose in another convention, must act as such urgent circumstances may then require.

But the duty incumbent on this convention will not have been performed without exhibiting some general view of such measures as they may deem essential to secure the nation against a relapse into difficulties and dangers, should they by the blessings of Providence escape from their present condition without absolute ruin. To this end a concise retrospect of the state of this nation under the advantages of a wise administration, contrasted with the miserable abyss into which it is plunged by the profligacy and folly of political theorists, will lead to some practical conclusions. On this subject, it will be recollected, that the immediate influence of the federal constitution upon its first adoption, and for twelve succeeding years, upon the prosperity and happiness of the nation, seemed to countenance a belief in the transcendancy of perfection over all other human institutions. In the catalogue of blessings which have fallen to the lot of most favored nations, none could be enumerated from which our country was excluded.—A free constitution, administered by great and incorruptible statesmen, realized the fondest hopes of liberty and independence.—The progress of agriculture was stimulated by the certainty of value in the harvest—and commerce, after traversing every sea, returned with the riches of every clime. A revenue, secured by a sense of honor, collected without oppression, and paid without murmurs, melted away the national debt, and the chief concern of the public creditor arose from its too rapid diminution. The wars and commotions of the European nations, and the interruptions of their commercial intercourse afforded to those who had not promoted, but who would have rejoiced to alleviate their calamities, a fair and golden opportunity, by enriching themselves to lay a broad foundation for national wealth.

Although occasional vexations to commerce, arose from the furious collisions of the powers at war, yet the great and good men of that time conformed to the force of circumstances which they could not control, and preserved their country in security from the tempests which overwhelmed the old world, and threw the wreck of their fortunes on these shores. Respect abroad, prosperity at home, wise laws made by honored legislators, and prompt obedience yielded by a contented people, had silenced the enemies of republican institutions. The arts flourished—the sciences were cultivated—the comforts and convenience of life were universally diffused—and nothing remained for succeeding administrations, but to reap the advantages, and cherish the resources, flowing from the policy of their predecessors.

But no sooner was a new administration established in the hands of the party opposed to the Washington policy, than a fixed determination was perceived and avowed of changing a system which had already produced these substantial fruits. The consequence of this change, for a few years after its commencement, were not sufficient to counteract the prodigious impulse towards prosperity, which had been given to the nation. But a steady perseverance in the new plans of administration, at length developed their weakness and deformity, but not until a majority of the people had been deceived by flattery, and inflamed by passion, into blindness to their defects. Under the withering influence of this new system, the declension of the nation has been uniform and rapid. The richest advantages for securing the great objects of the constitution have been wontonly rejected. While Europe reposes from the convulsions that had shaken down her ancient institutions, she beholds with amazement this remote country, once so happy and so envied, involved in a ruinous war, and excluded from intercourse with the rest of the world.

To investigate and explain the means whereby this fatal reverse has been effected, would require a voluminous discussion. Nothing more can be attempted in this report, than a general allusion to the principal outlines of the policy which has produced this vicissitude. Among these may be enumerated:

First. A deliberate and extensive system for effecting a combination among certain states, by exciting local jealousies and ambition, so as to secure to popular leaders in one section of the union, the control of public affairs in perpetual succession.—To which primary object most other characteristics of the system may be reconciled.

Secondly. The political intolerance displayed and avowed, in excluding from office men of unexceptionable merit, for want of adherence to the executive creed.

Thirdly. The infraction of the judiciary authority and rights, by depriving judges of their offices in violation of the constitution.

Fourthly. The abolition of existing taxes, requisite to prepare the country for those changes to which nations are always exposed, with a view to the acquisition of popular favor.

Fifthly. The influence of patronage in the distribution of offices, which in these states has been almost invariably made among men the least entitled to such distinction, and who have sold themselves as ready instruments for distracting public opinion, and encouraging administration to hold in contempt the wishes and remonstrances of a people thus apparently divided.

Sixthly. The admission of new states into the union, formed at pleasure in the western region, has destroyed the balance of power which existed among the original states, and deeply affected their interest.

Seventhly. The easy admission of naturalized foreigners, to places of trust, honor or profit, operating as an inducement to the malcontent subjects of the old world to come to these states, in quest of executive patronage, and to repay it by an abject devotion to executive measures.

Eighthly. Hostility to Great Britain, and partially to the late government of France, adopted as coincident with popular prejudice, and subservient to the main object, party power. Connected with these must be ranked erroneous and distorted estimates of the power and resources of those nations, of the probable result of their controversies, and of our political relation to them respectively.

Lastly and principally. A visionary and superficial theory, in regard to commerce, accompanied by a real hatred but a feigned regard to its interests, and a ruinous perseverance in efforts to render it an instrument of coercion and war.

But it is not conceivable that the obloquy of any administration could, in so short a period, have so nearly consummated the work of national ruin, unless favored by defects in the constitution.

To enumerate all the improvements of which that instrument is susceptible, and to propose such amendments as might render it in all respects perfect, would be a task, which this convention has not thought proper to assume. They have confined their attention to such as experience has demonstrated to be essential, and even among these, some are considered entitled to more serious attention than others. They are suggested without any intentional disrespect to other states, and are meant to be such as all shall find an interest in promoting. Their object is to strengthen, and if possible to perpetuate, the union of the states, by removing the grounds of exciting jealousies, and providing for a fair and equal representation, and a limitation of powers, which have been misused.

The first amendment proposed, relates to the apportionment of representatives among the slaveholding states. This cannot be claimed as a right. Those states are entitled to the slave-representation by a constitutional compact. It is therefore merely a subject of agreement, which should be conducted upon principles of mutual interest and accommodation, and upon which no sensibility on either side should be permitted to exist. It has proved unjust and unequal in its operation. Had this effect been foreseen, the privilege would probably not have been demanded; certainly not conceded. Its tendency in future will be adverse to that harmony and mutual confidence, which are more conducive to the happiness and prosperity of every confederated state, than a mere preponderance of power, the prolific source of jealousies and controversy, can be to any one of them. The time may therefore arrive when a sense of magnanimity and justice will reconcile those states to acquiesce in a revision of this article, especially as a fair equivalent would result to them in the apportionment of taxes.

The next amendment relates to the admission of new states into the union.

This amendment is deemed to be highly important, and in fact indispensable. In proposing it, it is not intended to recognize the right of congress to admit new states without the original limits of the United States, nor is any idea entertained of disturbing the tranquility of any state already admitted into the union. The object is merely to restrain the constitutional power of congress in admitting new states. At the adoption of the constitution, a certain balance of power among the original parties was considered to exist, and there was at that time, and yet is among those parties a strong affinity between their great and general interests. By the admission of these states that balance has been materially affected, and unless the practice be modified, must ultimately be destroyed. The southern states will first avail themselves of their new confederates to govern the east, and finally the western states multiplied in number, and augmented in population, will control the interests of the whole. Thus for the sake of present power, the southern states will be common sufferers with the east, in the loss of permanent advantages. None of the old states can find an interest in creating prematurely an overwhelming western influence, which may hereafter discern (as it has heretofore) benefits to be derived to them by wars and commercial restrictions.

The next amendment proposed by the convention, relates to the powers of congress, in relation to embargo and the interdiction of commerce.

Whatever theories upon the subject of commerce, have hitherto divided the opinions of statesmen, experience has at last shown that it is a vital interest in the United States, and that its success is essential to the encouragement of agriculture and manufactures, and to the wealth, finances, defence and liberty of the nation. Its welfare can never interfere with the other great interests of the states, but must promote and uphold them. Still those who are immediately concerned in the prosecution of commerce, will of necessity be always a minority of the nation. They are, however, best qualified to manage and direct its course by the advantages of experience, and the sense of interest. But they are entirely unable to protect themselves against the sudden and injudicious decisions of bare majorities, and the mistaken or oppressive projects of those who are not actively concerned in its pursuits. Of consequence, this interest is always exposed to be harassed, interrupted, and entirely destroyed, upon pretence of securing other interest. Had the merchants of this nation been permitted, by their own government, to pursue an innocent and lawful commerce, how different would have been the state of the treasury and of public credit! How short-sighted and miserable is the policy which has annihilated this order of men, and doomed their ships to rot in the docks, their capital to waste unemployed, and their affections to be alienated from the government which was formed to protect them? What security for an ample and unfailing revenue can ever be had, comparable to that which once was realized in good faith, punctuality and sense of honor, which attached the mercantile class to the interests of the government! Without commerce, where can be found the aliment for a navy; and without a navy, what is to constitute the defence, and ornament, and glory of this nation! No union can be durably cemented, in which every great interest does not find itself reasonably secured against the encroachment and combinations of other interests. When, therefore, the past system of embargoes and commercial restrictions shall have been reviewed—when the fluctuation and inconsistency of public measures, betraying a want of information as well as feeling in the majority, shall have been considered, the reasonableness of some restrictions upon the power of a bare majority to repeat these oppressions, will appear to be obvious.

The next amendment proposes to restrict the power of making offensive war. In the consideration of this amendment, it is not necessary to inquire into the justice of the present war. But one sentiment now exists in relation to the expediency, and regret for its declaration is nearly universal. No indemnity can ever be attained for this terrible calamity, and its only palliation must be found in obstacles to its future recurrence. Rarely can the state of this country call for or justify offensive war. The genius of our institutions is unfavorable to its successful prosecution; the felicity of our situation exempts us from its necessity.—In this case, as in the former, those more immediately exposed to its effects are a minority of the nation. The commercial towns, the shores of our seas and rivers, contain the population, whose vital interests are most vulnerable by a foreign enemy. Agricult-ture, indeed, must feel at last; but this appeal to its sensibility comes too late. Again, the immense population which has swarmed into the west, remote from immediate danger, and which is constantly augmenting, will not be averse from the occasional disturbances of the Atlantic states. Thus interest may not frequently combine with passion and intrigue, to plunge the nation into needless wars, and compel it to become a military rather than a happy and flourishing people. These considerations which it would be easy to augment, call loudly for the limitation proposed in the amendment.

Another amendment, subordinate in importance, but still in a high degree expedient relates to the exclusion of foreigners, hereafter arriving in the United States from the capacity of holding offices of trust, honor, or profit.

That the stock of population already in these states, is amply sufficient to render this nation in due time sufficiently great and powerful, is not a controvertible question.—Nor will it be seriously pretended, that the national deficiency in wisdom, arts, science, arms, or virtue, needs to be replenished from foreign countries. Still, it is agreed, that a liberal policy should offer the rights of hospitality, and the choice of settlement, to those who are disposed to visit the country.—But why admit to a participation in the government, aliens who were no parties in the compact—who are ignorant of the nature of our institutions, and have no stake in the welfare of the country, but what is recent and transitory? It is surely a privilege sufficient to admit them after due probation to become citizens, for all but political purposes.—To extend it beyond these limits, is to encourage foreigners to come to these states as candidates for preferment. The convention forbear to express their opinion upon the inauspicious effects which have already resulted to the honor and peace of this nation, from this misplaced and indiscriminate liberality.

The last amendment respects the limitation of the office of president, to a single constitutional term, and his eligibility from the same state two terms in succession.

Upon this topic it is superfluous to dilate. The love of power is a principle in the human heart which too often impels to the use of all practicable means to prolong its duration. The office of president has charms and attractions which operate as powerful incentives to this passion. The first and most natural exertion of vast patronage is directed towards the security of a new election. The interest of the country, the welfare of the people, even honest fame and respect for the opinion of posterity are secondary considerations. All the engines of intrigue; all the means of corruption, are likely to be employed for this object. A president whose political career is limited to a single election, may find no other interest than will be promoted by making it glorious to himself and beneficial to his country. But the hope of re-election is prolific of temptations, under which these magnanimous motives are deprived of their principal force. The repeated election of president of the United States from any one state, affords inducements and means for intrigue, which tend to create an undue local influence, and establish the domination of particular states. The justice therefore, of securing to every state a fair and equal chance for the election of this officer from its own citizens is apparent, and this object will be essentially promoted by preventing an election from the same state twice in succession.

Such is the general view which this convention has thought proper to submit, of the situation of these states, of their dangers and their duties. Most of the subjects which it embraces have separately received an ample and luminous investigation, by the great and able assertors of the rights of their country, in the national legislature; and nothing more could be attempted on this occasion, than a digest of general principles, and of recommendations, suited to the present state of public affairs. The peculiar difficulty and delicacy of performing, even this undertaking, will be appreciated by all who think seriously upon the crisis. Negotiations for peace, are at this hour supposed to be pending, the issue of which must be deeply interesting to all. No measures should be adopted, which might unfavorably affect that issue; none which should embarrass the administration, if their professed desire for peace is sincere; and none, which on supposition of their sincerity, should afford them pretexts for prolonging the war, or relieving themselves from the responsibility of a dishonorable peace. It is also devoutly to be wished, that an occasion may be afforded to all friends of the country, of all parties, and in all places, to pause and consider the awful state to which pernicious counsels, and blind passions, have brought this people. The number of those who perceive, and who are ready to retrace errors, must it is believed be yet sufficient to redeem the nation. It is necessary to rally and unite them by the assurance that no hostility to the constitution is meditated, and to obtain their aid in placing it under guardians, who alone can save it from destruction. Should this fortunate change be effected, the hope of happiness and honor may once more dispel the surrounding gloom. Our nation may yet be great, our union durable. But should this prospect be utterly hopeless, the time will not have been lost, which shall have ripened a general sentiment of the necessity of more mighty efforts to rescue from ruin, at least some portion of our beloved country.

THEREFORE BE IT—

Resolved, That it be and hereby is recommended to the legislatures of the several states represented in this convention, to adopt all such measures as may be necessary effectually to protect the citizens of said states from the operation and effects of all acts which have been or may be passed by the congress of the United States, which shall contain provisions subjecting the militia or other citizens to forcible drafts, conscriptions or impressments not authorised by the constitution of the United States.

Resolved, That it be and is hereby recommended to the said legislatures, to authorize an immediate and earnest application to be made to the government of the United States, requesting their consent to some arrangement, whereby the said states may, separately or in concert, be empowered to assume upon themselves the defence of their territory against the enemy; and a reasonable portion of the taxes, collected within said states, may be paid into the respective treasuries thereof, and appropriated to the payment of the balance due said states, and to the future defence of the same. The amount so paid into the said treasuries to be credited, and the disbursements made as aforesaid to be charged to the United States.

Resolved, That it be and hereby is recommended to the legislatures of the aforesaid states, to pass laws (where it has not already been done) authorising the governors or commanders in chief of their militia to make detachments from the same, or to form voluntary corps, as shall be most convenient and conformable to their constitutions, and to cause the same to be well armed, equipped, disciplined, and held in readiness for service; and upon the request of the governor of either of the other states, to employ the whole of such detachment or corps as well as the regular forces of the state, or such part thereof as may be required and can be spared consistently with the safety of the state, in assisting the state making such request to repel any invasion thereof, which shall be made or attempted by the public enemy.

Resolved, That the following amendments of the constitution of the United States, be recommended to the states represented as aforesaid, to be proposed by them for adoption by the state legislatures, and in such cases as may be deemed expedient, by a convention chosen by the people of each state.

And it is further recommended, that the said states shall persevere in their efforts to obtain such amendments, until the same shall be effected.

First, Representatives and direct taxes shall be apportioned among the several states which may be included within this union, according to their respective numbers of free persons, including those bound to serve for a term of years, and excluding Indians not taxed and all other persons.

Second, No new state shall be admitted into the union by congress, in virtue of the power granted by the constitution, without the concurrence of two thirds of both houses.

Third, Congress shall not have power to lay an embargo, on the ships or vessels of the citizens of the United States, in the ports or harbors thereof, for more than sixty days.

Fourth, Congress shall not have power, without the concurrence of two-thirds of both houses, to interdict the commercial intercourse between the United States and any foreign nation or the dependencies thereof.

Fifth, Congress shall not make nor declare war, or authorize acts of hostility against any foreign nation without the concurrence of two thirds of both houses, except such acts of hostility be in defence of the territories of the United States when actually invaded.

Sixth, No person who shall hereafter be naturalized, shall be eligible as a member of the senate or house of representatives of the United States, nor capable of holding any civil office under the authority of the United States.

Seventh, The same person shall not be elected president of the United States a second time; nor shall the president be elected from the same state two terms in succession.

Resolved, That if the application of these states to the government of the United States, recommended in a foregoing resolution, should be unsuccessful, and peace should not be concluded, and the defence of these states should be neglected, as it has been since the commencement of the war, it will, in the opinion of this convention, be expedient for the legislatures of the several states to appoint delegates to another convention, to meet at Boston in the state of Massachusetts, on the third Thursday of June next, with such powers and instructions as the exigency of a crisis so momentous may require.

Resolved, That the hon. George Cabot, the hon. Chauncey Goodrich, and the hon. Daniel Lyman, or any two of them, be authorized to call another meeting of this convention, to be holden in Boston, at any time before new delegates shall be chosen, as recommended in the above resolution, if in their judgment the situation of the country shall urgently require it.

Proceedings of Congress.

IN SENATE.

Thursday, January 5. The direct tax bill was passed without amendment, by the following vote: YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Bibb, Bledsoe, Brown, Chase, Condit, Daggett, Fromentin, Gaillard, German, Giles, Hunter, Kerr, King, Lacombe, Morrow, Roberts, Smith, Tait, Taylor, Turner, Walker, Wharton—23.

NAYS—Messrs. Dana, Gore, Horsey, Lambert, Mason, Varnum, Wells—7.

The senate agreed to a conference with the house on the disagreeing votes of the two houses on the furniture tax bill; and asked a conference of the house on the disagreeing votes on the manufacture tax bill; of which Messrs. Taylor, Bledsoe and Daggett were appointed managers.

The bill supplementary to the act for settling the Yazoo claims, was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, [and passed the next day.]

Mr. Bledsoe submitted for consideration a motion "that the committee on naval affairs be instructed to enquire into the expediency of establishing a naval school—[agreed to next day.]

Friday, Jan. 6. Mr. Lacombe, from the committee on the subject, reported a bill making an appropriation for repairing and rebuilding the public buildings within the city of Washington; which was read and passed to a second reading.

The bill from the house to authorize the president of the United States to accept the services of certain volunteer corps, having been so amended, as to authorize the acceptance into service of state corps, and otherwise essentially changed in its provisions, was ordered to a third reading, by an unanimous vote.

The bill from the house to provide for the widows and orphans of militia and volunteers, who shall die or be killed in the service of the United States, was further considered, and, on motion of Mr. Varnum, postponed to the second Monday in March next.

Saturday, Jan. 7. The bill to authorize the acceptance of the state troops and volunteers was passed.

Mr. Taylor from the committee of conferences on the disagreeing votes of the two houses, on the bill for taxing household furniture, &c. made a report thereon: which being under consideration—

Mr. Giles moved that the further proceedings on said bill be postponed to the second Monday in March next—(in other words, rejected.)

The question on which motion was decided as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Daggett, Dana, Giles, Gore, Hunter, Mason, Smith, Wells—8.

NAYS—Messrs. Anderson, Bibb, Bledsoe, Brown, Chase, Condit, Fromentin, Gaillard, German, Lacombe, Lambert, Morrow, Roberts, Robinson, Tait, Taylor, Thompson, Turner, Varnum, Walker, Wharton—21.

The report was then agreed to, and, having been before agreed to by the house, the bill wants only the signature of the president to become a law.

The bill to authorize the president of the United States, to cause to be built, equipped and employed, one or more floating batteries, for the defence of the waters of the United States, was further considered, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, [and passed next day.]

Monday, Jan. 9. The amendments of the house to the senate's bill to incorporate the subscribers to the bank of the United States of America, were received, read, and referred to a select committee, consisting of Messrs. Smith, Bibb, Anderson, Giles and Varnum.

Wednesday, Jan. 11. Mr. Barbour, senator from Virginia (late governor) in the place of Mr. Brent, deceased, appeared and took his seat.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Thursday, Jan. 5.—A message was received from the senate, renouncing their recession from all their amendments to the bill laying duties on certain manufactures, except so much as proposes to lay a duty of 8 per cent. on all umbrellas and parasols above the value of 2 dolls.

Mr. Fisk of N. Y. stated that the principal difficulty with the committee of ways and means, in assenting to this amendment, had been a doubt of the constitutional power of the senate, to propose new taxes. As this was a question which he believed had never been decided; and as the tax was in itself unimportant, he moved that the house insist on its disagreement to its amendment.

Which motion was agreed to.

The house also determined to insist on disagreement to a part of the amendments of the senate, to the furniture tax bill, and to a conference on that bill.

The house resumed the consideration of the report of the committee of the whole, on the bill for preventing intercourse with the enemy. [This is a bill containing ample and energetic provisions, for preventing the treasonable intercourse, which has recently prevailed to so great an extent on our northern borders, and elsewhere.] The few amendments made in committee of the whole having been agreed to—

Messrs. Grosvenor, King (of Mass.) Stockton and Wilson, moved various amendments, all which were negatived. After which, it appearing, about this time, owing to the retirement of a number of members of the house, that a quorum was not present, a motion was made for the call of the house.

Mr. Grosvenor contended that one day's notice was necessary to a call of the house; the chair (Mr. Nelson, in the absence of the speaker from indisposition, occupying the chair) decided such notice was not necessary; Mr. Grosvenor appealed from this decision, which the house affirmed.

The call of the house then took place, when it appeared that the following members were present:

YEAS—Messrs. Alexander, Alston, Anderson, Archer, Avery, Barbour, Bard, Barnett, Bines, Bowen, Butler, Caldwell, Calhoun, Cannon, Chappel, Clark, Clendenin, Clifton, Comstock, Conrad, Crawford, Creighton, Crouch, Cuthbert, Dana, Davis of Pa. Decha, Duval, Earle, Fisk, of Vt. Fisk, of N. Y. Forney, Gholson, Gourdin, Griffin, Grosvenor, Hale, [Hall, Harris, Hawes, Hawkins, Hopkins, of Ky. Hubbard, Humphreys, Hulbert, Ingham, Irving, Jackson of Vir. Johnson of Va. Johnson of Ky. Kent of Md. Kerr, Kershaw, Kilbourn, King of Mass. King, of N. C. Leferts, Lovett, Lyle, McCoy, McKim, Miller, Moore, Nelson, Newton, Ormsby Parker, Pickers, Pleasants, John Reed, Rea of Penn. Rhea of Tenn. Rich, Ringgold, Roane, Robertson, Sage, Seybert, Sharp, Smith, of Pa. Strong, Sturges, Tannehill, Taylor, Udree, Vose, Ward of N. J. Wilson of Mass. Wilson, of Pa. Wood, Yancey—92.

The doors of the House were then closed, according to the rules of the house, and ingress and egress forbidden, but not before two or three other members had come in.

Some difficulty arose as to the course now proper to be pursued as to compelling the attendance of absentees, &c. At length, on motion of Mr. Yancey, it was ordered that all further proceedings on the call be suspended; and

The bill which had been ordered to be engrossed for a third reading without a division—a sufficient number not rising to support the motion of Mr. Miller for the yeas and nays.

The house then adjourned, it being some time after night-fall.

Friday, Jan. 6. Mr. McKee, from the committee to whom the same was referred, reported a bill to establish a national bank.

Mr. McKee explained, briefly, the nature and amount of the amendments now proposed to the bill. The first principle introduced into the bill, he said, was a reduction of the capital stock from fifty to thirty millions; such capital to be composed of five millions in specie, fifteen millions in treasury notes, ten millions in stock of the United States created since the declaration of war. The capital to be subscribable in shares of one hundred instead of five hundred each. The payments of the subscription to be so apportioned that two-fifths of the amount of the capital should be paid in at the time of subscribing. This would bring at once into the bank, 1,666,000 dollars in specie, and the residue in treasury notes and stock, amounting to twelve millions in the whole. There was every reason to believe that this payment could be made, at the time of subscription, to the full amount proposed. If so, the bank could forthwith go into operation, and its capital would not remain inactive, as a part of it must do if a less amount were payable at the time of subscription. The principle requiring the bank to make a loan of thirty millions to the government to be stricken out, and the provision respecting the suspension of payments in specie, which appeared to be inseparably connected with the compulsory loan, to be also stricken out. The immediate aid which the plan would afford to the government, in addition to the establishment of a circulating medium of undoubted credit, would be in the issue and free circulation of treasury notes, and the relief to the stock market by the abstraction from it of ten millions to be subscribed into the stock of the bank. The bank thus to be established was predicated on the idea of a specie bank, on which principle alone must forever rest a sound circulating medium.—There was no danger, as had been frequently observed, but, without a requisition to that effect in its charter, the bank would, for its own interest, afford to the government every assistance and accommodation in its power. A right was also reserved to the government to subscribe, on its own behalf and for its benefit, whenever congress shall authorize it by law, five millions to the stock of the bank, payable in certificates of stock bearing an interest of four per centum. This stock it might sell at great advantage; even during the present year, if the bank went successfully into operation.

The amendments to the first section having been stated, and the question being proposed to the house on that amendment which reduces the proposed capital from fifty to thirty millions of dollars.

The question being taken, after nearly two hours debate, on the first amendment reported by the select committee, was decided as follows:

The other amendments were fearfully agreed to, and the bill ordered to a third reading to-morrow without opposition.

Saturday, January 7.—Further progress was made in the bill to prevent traitorous intercourse with the enemy—it was laid upon the table to make way for the bank bill, which came up and the question being stated, "shall this bill pass?" several members gave their reasons why they should vote for or against the bill—the yeas and nays were as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alexander, Alston, Anderson, Barnett, Bayly of Va. So the bill was passed, and the amendments sent to the senate for their concurrence.

Monday, January 9.—Mr. Sage presented the petition of Joshua Penny of Long-Island, stating that he was taken from his bed in the night time by an armed British force and carried on board a British ship of war, where he received the most inhuman treatment, and was confined as a prisoner of war for nine months, though he had not borne arms during the present war, and praying congress to take his case into consideration, and give him some remuneration by employment in the public service—Referred to the committee of claims.

Mr. Wm. Reed, of Mass. from the committee on the subject of naval reform, made a report, accompanied by sundry letters from distinguished naval officers, concurring in recommending the adoption of two bills now reported. These bills, viz. a bill to "alter and amend the several acts for establishing the navy department, by adding thereto a Board of Commissioners," and a bill "directing the manner of contracts and purchases in the navy department, and for promoting economy therein," were twice read and committed.

The bill to prevent traitorous intercourse with the enemy, being taken up, Mr. Farrow having assigned his reasons why he should vote against the bill, though friendly to its object, the question was taken without further debate, and the bill passed as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alexander, Alston, Anderson, Avery, Barbour, Bard, Barnett, Bayly, of Va. So the bill was passed, and sent to the senate for concurrence.

Tuesday, Jan. 10. A variety of minor business was done, and the house agreed to the amendments proposed by the senate to the bill laying duties on certain manufactures—for it 97; against 53. The chief question before the house was, whether the senate, in the shape of an amendment, had a right to propose new objects of taxation.

Wednesday, January 11. The house was chiefly occupied this day with private petitions and business of little general importance—except that it agreed to the amendments of the senate to the volunteer bill; and spent some on the bill for quieting and adjusting claims to land in the Mississippi territory.

Thursday, January 12. This being the day recommended by the president for general fasting, humiliation and prayer, neither house met.

Events of the War.

MISCELLANEOUS.

NEW-ORLEANS.—We anxiously look towards this city, filled with hopes and wounded by fears for its fate. On the events that have happened there, great interests depend, not to the individuals, or to the immense tract of country immediately concerned in the welfare of this mighty depot, but only to all the United States.

On the 12th December, intelligence reached New-Orleans, that the much-talked-of expedition from the West-Indies (or a part of it) consisting of from 35 to 40 vessels, had appeared off Ship Island, in the bay of St. Louis, approaching towards lake Ponchartrain, with an undoubted design of making a "demonstration" on the city on that side. The troops on board were supposed to amount to 6000 men, among were some black soldiers. On the 15th they attacked, in about 40 barges, each armed with a piece of cannon, and having about fifty men, our flotilla belonging to the lake, consisting of five gun boats and a small schooner; all which were finally beaten after a resistance worthy the character of our tars, who desperately maintained the unequal contest for one hour and fifty minutes. The schooner was run ashore and blown up by her own crew, who escaped, but the five gun-boats were captured.—The enemy's loss is supposed to have been excessive—no less than thirteen of their barges being said to have sunk! This flotilla was the whole of the naval force we had on that side, and its capture gave them free entrance into lake Ponchartrain, except the resistance they might meet with from a small fort commanding the passage of the Rigolette, which it was not supposed, would seriously obstruct their progress. At the mouth of the bayou St. Jean, which leads towards New-Orleans from the lake, there is also a fort, but it does not seem to be much calculated upon. The nature of the country between the lake and the city, presents, however, very formidable obstacles to an invading army, being almost a complete swamp, the very nesting place of alligators. But what has been the result we know not how to believe. The force actually on the spot on the 17th—(the date of a letter received by the editor, and of the latest date that has been received from thence) does not appear to have exceeded 4000 men, about 1000 of whom were regulars; but general Coffee's brigade, 2000, was close at hand, and it is said would reach the city the next day—other of the Tennessee and Kentucky troops were looked for; and if they arrived within 3 or 4 days might probably assist in the defence of the place—the detachment that left fort Musac on the 28th Nov. could not have been very far off. General Jackson, however, it seems was full of hope and confidence; he had established the most perfect order, and the people seem generally to have looked for a happy result. Amen.

For the object, no doubt, of diverting our forces, a second attack was made upon Fort Bowyer, Mobile Point. The firing was continued when the reporter came away. Col. Lawrence, glorious for his former defence of this place, had the command—and the issue, at least, will not be dishonorable.

It appears, also, that the British agents have been tampering with the indians on the Red River and to the south of it—not contented with the destruction they have already heaped on the heads of this wretched race. Why does not Christina Britain suffer these poor people to enjoy the small comforts their situation affords? why lead them, without cause, to take up the tomahawk, soon to be buried in their own heads, for woman and children murdered? The matter is of a character so savage that we know not of language to express our abhorrence of it—it is the opposite of every thing that is honest, honorable or just—and will give to infamy the name of Englishmen.

The fleet near New Orleans, was the same that we had in the Chesapeake, last September. And admiral Cochrane, disappointed of dining in Baltimore, is reported to have said he would eat his Christmas dinner in New Orleans, and stay there some time.—We trust the knight will be drubbed. At your last accounts from the enemy he must have been about 40 miles from the city—the lake cannot be navigated by vessels drawing more than from 6 to 8 feet water. The next mail will give us the fate of this important place. No force was attempting to approach by way of the Mississippi. The Herald sloop of war was off the bar.

The following extract of a letter from an officer in the regular army, whose integrity is unquestionable, to his friend in Washington city, contains some interesting particulars:

“NEW ORLEANS, Dec. 16.

“On my return here yesterday from fort St. Philip, where I have been for the last three weeks, I found the whole city in a state of confusion, owing to the enemy’s having made their appearance in considerable force between the Balize and Mobile Point. We, last evening, received the unfortunate news of all our gun boats, stationed in the lake, having been captured by the enemy, after a most glorious defence having been made by lieutenant Jones, against innumerable boats from the enemy’s fleet; but one of our armed vessels, a small schooner, escaped falling into the hands of the enemy. After beating off a number of barges and gigs, she made good her retreat to the bay of St. Louis, where her commander blew her up, with all the naval stores there, and arrived safely in New Orleans; he has furnished us with the above account. The action with the gun-boats took place at Joseph’s Islands, about 40 miles from here; so that we expect the enemy to approach New Orleans in three or four days. Notwithstanding our force is very small (as we cannot bring 1000 regulars into the field) we are ready to meet the enemy at any time they may come; and I hope, and have no doubt, that we shall give them a handsome reception. General Jackson is here and in good health; we all have the utmost confidence in him. He has this day proclaimed martial law in the city and its vicinity. The Orleans militia are few innumber. General Coffee is at Baton Rouge with 1800 men from Tennessee; he will be here in two days.—The late quota from Tennessee and Kentucky have not arrived, and no intelligence of their being on the way, so that they will not be here in time. An express reached the general to-day from Mobile Point, which states that the vessels off there, large and small, are upwards of 40, and that they are hourly increasing. It is also ascertained, that it is the same force that made the attack on Baltimore, refitted at Jamaica and Bermuda, and not lord Hill, as was at first supposed. Admiral Cochrane has sent us word that he not only intends eating his Christmas dinner in New Orleans, but to spend the carnival here.

“Last evening, a flag of truce was sent to the enemy by commodore Patterson, with a surgeon to attend the wounded of our gun-boats.”

ADJUTANT GENERAL'S OFFICE.

NEW ORLEANS, Dec. 16, 1814.

Head-Quarters, 7th Military District.

GENERAL ORDERS.

To the citizens of New Orleans.—The major general commanding has with astonishment and regret learned that great consternation and alarm pervade your city.

It is true the enemy is on our coast and threatens an invasion of our territory, but it is equally true, with union, energy, and the approbation of heaven, we will beat him at every point his temerity may induce him to set foot upon our soil. The general with still greater astonishment, has heard that British emissaries have been permitted to propagate seditious reports amongst you, that the threatened invasion is with a view of restoring the country to Spain, from a supposition that some of you would be willing to return to your ancient government—believe no such incredible tales—your government is at peace with Spain—it is the vital enemy of your country, the common enemy of mankind, the highway robber of the world, that threatens you, and has sent his hirelings amongst you with this false report to put you off your guard, that you may fall an easy prey to him. Then look to your liberties, your property, the chastity of your wives and daughters. Take a retrospect of the conduct of the British army at Hampton and other places where it has entered our country—and every bosom which glows with patriotism and virtue, will be inspired with indignation and pant for the arrival of the hour when we shall meet and revenge these outrages against the laws of civilization and humanity.

The general calls upon the inhabitants of the city, to trace this unfounded report to its source and bring the propagator to condign punishment. The rules and articles of war annex the punishment of death to any person holding secret correspondence with the enemy, creating false alarm or supplying him with provision, and the general announces his unalterable determination rigidly to execute the martial law in all cases which may come within his province.

The safety of the district intrusted to the protection of the general must and will be maintained with the best blood of the country, and he is confident all good citizens will be found at their posts with their arms in their hands, determined to dispute every inch of ground with the enemy, that unanimity will pervade the country generally. But should the general be disappointed in this expectation he will separate our enemies from our friends. Those who are not for us are against us, and will be dealt with accordingly.

By command,

THOS. L. BUTLER, Aid-de-camp

Adjutant-general's office, New-Orleans, December 25.
Head-Quarters, 7th military district.
Extract of general orders.

Major-general Andrew Jackson, commanding the 7th United States military district, declares the city and environs of New Orleans under strict martial law, and orders that in future the following rules be rigidly enforced, viz. Every individual entering the city will report at the adjutant-general's office, and on failure to be arrested and held for examination.

No persons shall be permitted to leave the city without a permission in writing signed by the general or one of his staff.

No vessels, boats or other crafts, will be permitted to leave New Orleans or Bayou St. John, without a passport in writing from the general or one of his staff, or the commander of the naval forces of the United States on this station.

The street lamps shall be extinguished at the hour of nine at night, after which time persons of every description found in the streets, or not at their respective homes, without permission in writing, as aforesaid, and not having the countersign shall be apprehended as spies and held for examination.

By command,

ROBERT BUTLER, Adj. Gen.

Adjutant and inspector general's office, 6th Jan. 1815.

GENERAL ORDER.—All surgeons on furlough, as well those of militia in the service of the United States, as the medical staff of the army, will forthwith repair to their respective hospitals, regiments, corps and stations.

The troops are reported sickly at many posts, and no neglect will be suffered in the medical staff.

Generals commanding districts, and officers exercising separate commands will be particularly attentive to this sacred duty. They will cause all complaints to be promptly investigated.—Defaults will be punished in an exemplary manner.

Good and convenient Hospitals must be provided, furnished and supplied. To ensure this, the requisitions of the superintending surgeons will be respected and enforced on the quarter-masters, commissioners, apothecaries and contractors. Neglect in either of these will be reported to the war department.

Whenever volunteers or militia are discharged from the service of the United States, the sick will be provided for in the army hospitals, and a competent number of their own surgeons will be retained to attend them.

The medical staff must be constantly at their posts.

By order of the secretary of war,

D. PARKER, Adj. and insp. gen.

FOREIGN NEWS.—We have London dates to the 3d of November. Much is said about carrying on the war against America "on the grandest scale." Who is to be commander does not seem fixed upon, but we hear nothing more of the greatly-talked-of lord Hill. The Statira frigate, with sir E. Pakenham and several officers of rank, sailed from Portsmouth for America, Nov. 1. About 3000 men had sailed from Plymouth with the same destination—other detachments are spoken of. A London paper of November 3, says, "Great exertions are making to send out to India, all the troops that can be spared from the increased exigencies of the war in America; and not a single disposable corps in the country will be left unsent to one of these destinations or the other. A rumor prevailed that sir George Prevost, with his principal officers, were to return home.

The British have found out that our powder is a great deal better than theirs. They have made many discoveries since June, 1812, and may yet learn more curious things:

London, October 28.—It is reported, in some well informed political circles, that a select committee will be moved during the ensuing session of the parliament, to investigate the state of the navy, both in its civil and military branches, and in its entire internal economy, also with a principal view to counteract the causes of American seduction of our seamen; let us hope this interesting subject will meet all that close attention and research which its great importance demands, and particularly in the present political state of the world, when in addition to the rising trans-atlantic navy, such marked and direct jealousy of our maritime ascendancy is evidently evincing itself in every cabinet of the continent of Europe, and when, under our very eyes, the various maritime powers of the globe, are at this moment ardently straining every nerve to re-establish their marine, in order to dispute with us the trident of the ocean, and to force on us their own construction of public maritime law.

TRADE TO AMELIA.—London, Nov. 1.—The letters from Liverpool yesterday, announcing the seizure of seven ships laden with cotton, from Amelia island have produced a strong sensation. The value of these cargoes may be estimated at about 140,000*£. It was said a few days since that an order in council had directed one ship, before seized, to be given up; this statement is not correct. The council declined on its own authority following up the proceedings in the court of exchequer; but the officer who seized the property was not prevented from pursuing his right in the prize court, and the consignees of the goods were held to bail to answer his claim. The seven ships in question are precisely in the same situation. The officer is to proceed in his own name, and is to defray the expenses of the prosecution; thus the government will be exonerated from such charges, and the trial will be conducted in the admiralty court instead of the exchequer. We are told that the trade with the United States, under the like circumstances, has been progressively increasing, in defiance of the blockade, and that no less than 1,000,000£*. sterling has been paid to the Americans in violation or evasion of such blockade. In addition, it is said that sails and other articles necessary for the equipment of shipping, have been sent from Russia, through the channel of Amelia Island, in return for the produce obtained from it.

REMOVAL. The Spencer 74, is said to have entered the Delaware some days ago, displaying a white flag at her fore-top, and sent a boat ashore, with a similar flag flying, and that the officer who landed informed that they had received information at sea from a brig 13 days out from England bound to Halifax, that the preliminaries of peace had been agreed upon by the American and British commissioners at Ghent.

The boat returned to the Spencer, (anchored at the Brown,) where she remained at the date of the letters, with the white ensign at her foremost.

We have heard nothing of this business since. It may be so—but, the Spencer, we are told, wanted provisions.

REMOVAL II. Several persons who have been on board the squadron off New London, and recently returned, report a variety of observations of the officers as to information received by a vessel, which had just joined them, stating that the Constitution had fallen in with and sunk the Maidstone frigate. Others say that the Maidstone was understood to have made her escape, after receiving a broadside or two and to have arrived at Halifax. This vessel rates 36 guns. We chiefly fear that the Constitution has not fired "a broadside or two" at her; convinced of that, we should put her down as gone to "Dan's Locker."

MR. KING—From the National Intelligencer.—A debate of some interest took place on its passage; [of the bill to lay a direct tax of six millions] in the course of which, we were much gratified at the accidental opportunity of hearing some honorable sentiments uttered on the occasion by Mr. King of N. Y. Much as he deprecated the state of war in which the nation was placed, he said he should contribute his vote, by all constitutional means, to make it effective, by affording to the executive men and money to carry it on. It might be and no doubt was true, that blame was in a degree imputable to the executive department, as well for the fiscal as the military conduct of the war; but it behoved congress, he justly remarked, to examine how far they were culpable of omissions to furnish the means to enable the executive to act. It was their duty to raise armies, to provide the ways and means to support them. It was well worthy of consideration, he said, how far the omission or delay to perform these duties had disabled the executive from performing his duty in the most efficient manner.

COL. MITCHELL and LIEUT. COL. TOWSON, both of the U. S. artillery, on Saturday last partook of a splendid entertainment got up in honor of them by the citizens of Baltimore, at Barney's Inn. About 160 gentlemen attended, and among the invited guests, were major gen. Scott, brig. gen. Stricker, lieut. col. Armistead, and all the principal military and naval officers in the city. Edward Johnson, esq. mayor, presided, assisted by the gentlemen composing the committee of arrangement, five democrats and five federalists—all republicans. The toasts, after dinner, were American; and our gallant heroes, on land or at sea, were gratefully remembered.

COM. PERRY—The citizens of Newport have presented to com. PERRY, an elegant silver vase, of the largest size, surmounted by an eagle, and embellished with appropriate emblematic figures, and appropriate inscriptions.

FORT BOWYER—The following account of the British disaster at Fort Bowyer, is copied from a Barbadoes paper of Nov. 21—"His majesty's ship Hermes, C. W. Percy, with a gun-brig and four smaller vessels, have recently made an unsuccessful attack upon fort Bowyer, at Mobile, on the gulf of Mexico, east from New Orleans. The Hermes anchored opposite the fort and opened a cannonade, which was returned by the fort, and continued with much activity for several hours, until at length, the cables of the Hermes were shot away, and she drifted in a disabled state, stern on shore, about 700 yards below the fort, and a short time afterwards blew up—and out of 170 on board at the commencement of the contest, captain Percy, with 20 of his crew, only, escaped the explosion. The brig and the other four vessels after the disaster, of their commodore, made sail and went out into the gulf with a light breeze. Reinforcements were expected, and the attack was to be renewed.

CAPT. BLAKELEY—The legislature of N. Carolina have voted that a superb SWORD, appropriately adorned, be presented to capt. JOHNSON BLAKELEY, of the Wasp sloop of war, for the destruction of two of the enemy's vessels of equal force—which deeds, says the resolution, "reflected honor upon North Carolina in being performed by one of her sons."

CONSCRIPTION—British plan.—For the navy—to seize upon any suspected of having ever been at sea; if he resists to knock him down, and handcuff him, throw him into a tender; carry him off when convenient, and keep him as long as they can prevent him from escaping or dying.

For the militia.—I. "The militia is composed of a regiment from each county, composed of a certain number of companies, in proportion to the size and population of the counties respectively."

II. "As a regiment is not so numerous as to comprise all the males, from 21 to 50, each parish ballots for its assigned number; and those who are drawn, must either find a substitute or serve, when called on, for five years."

III. "There is a lord-lieutenant for each county, who is commanding officer of the militia, and appoints the officers."

PENNSYLVANIA.—Message to the legislature—"The revolution was achieved by our fathers when the means of the colonies collectively were scarcely equal to the present resources of our state, then eminently conspicuous for the aid she afforded in money, donations in lands and otherwise, to those of her sons who served in the Pennsylvania line during that ever-glorious conflict. To these monuments of patriotism we are wont to appeal with laudable pride, but should appeal in vain, if now, with means vastly more abundant, and those means untouched, we should hesitate to sustain and preserve the invaluable blessings we enjoy, now they are threatened to be wrested from us by that same foe who could not then prevent their establishment.—These considerations, and justice to our militia lately in service of the United States, would dictate to a patriotic legislature the authorizing a loan, from the several banks that have been incorporated under the act of the 21st March, 1814, of a sum equal to a payment of the balances due them from the United States, and the providing for similar or other occurrences that may possibly arise from the present embarrassed state of the finances of that government.

I would suggest also the providing by law for the punishment, by sentence of a court martial, if the offender be subject to militia duty, and summarily before a civil tribunal, if not so subject, of any person that shall in future encourage disobedience in the militia ordered into service by the constituted authorities of the United States or of this state.

SIMON SNYDER.

Harrisburgh, January 3, 1815.

Copy of a letter from the governor of the state of South Carolina to the secretary of the treasury, dated Executive Department, Columbia, Dec. 21.

SIR—On the 21st inst. I received letter from major-general Pinckney, covering several others the purport of which was to inform me that the funds of the general government at his disposal were exhausted, and that the troops, now in service for the defence of this state, could not be subsisted without money, and suggesting the propriety of my recommending to the legislature the expediency of an appropriation in relief of the finances of the United States at this moment. I have the pleasure to inform you that 260,000 dollars have been put at the disposition of the government by the legislature last evening. This disposition of the state manifests the continued good will and faithfulness which our citizens feel towards the administration—in return for which I cannot but crave their special care of its defence. I hope, it is unnecessary to add, that my individual and official efforts will not be wanting in aiding the government whenever in my power.

Respectfully yours, &c.

DAVID R. WILLIAMS.

Copy of a letter from the comptroller-general of South Carolina, to the secretary of the treasury, dated

State of South Carolina, Office of comptroller-general, Dec. 21.

SIR—In compliance with an act of the legislature of this state, just passed, I do myself the honor of informing you, that they have directed me to cause to be passed to the credit of the treasurer of the United States, in the bank of South-Carolina, subject to his immediate draft, the sum of 250,000 dollars; the sum at which they estimate this states' quota of the direct tax, about to be laid by congress.

You will perceive in this act of the legislature a sincere wish to assist the United States. If the sums thus appropriated to meet the direct tax should exceed this state's contingent, some future arrangement may be made to reimburse the state the excess. If it should fall short, I am authorised, whenever the same shall be ascertained, to apply a further sum to the credit of the United States.

I have the honor to be, with great respect, your obedient humble servant,

THOMAS LEE, compt.
gen. &c. of the state of S. C.

MILITARY.

A fine company of U. S. riflemen left their encampment near Rogersville, Ten. on the 29th ult. for Hagerstown, Md. we presume on their way to the northern frontier.

The court martial met at Utica the 3d inst. and adjourned to the 8th, to suit gen. Wilkinson's convenience, who was not prepared for the trial.

It is stated that gen. D. Rottenburg has issued a proclamation interdicting all communication with the states. From this it is inferred, that an expedition was on foot.

Seven hundred regulars, five hundred riflemen and two hundred infantry, recruited in North and South Carolina, have reached Richmond on their way to the northern army in the spring; but to remain for the present about Fredericksburg, subject to the orders of major-general Scott.

Plattsburg Dec. 24.—It is reported we understand by a deserter who came in night before last, that the British are two or three thousand strong at Isle Aux Noix, and have a large number of sleighs and about 80 or 90 pieces of cannon.

Also, That they have other large forces near that place, and confirms the report that they are about fitting out an expedition of some kind.

A gentleman arrived in the Albany stage last evening says, that upwards of 600 ship carpenters and artificers had passed that place for the lakes.

Adjutant and inspector general's office,
December 26 1814.

GENERAL ORDERS. Major Macpherson, of the light artillery, is charged with the superintendence of the recruiting service—all returns and communications relative thereto, will hereafter be addressed to major Macpherson, superintendant of the recruiting service, city of Washington.

It is expected that every recruiting officer will be at his post.

Circular letters of instruction will be addressed to the officers superintending the recruiting service, for each regiment or corps, detailing their various duties, and the duties of their subordinate officers, the arrangement of depots, distribution of rendezvous, and every thing appertaining to the government of their conduct.

These instructions will be communicated as soon as the laws depending before congress shall have passed, and, in the interim, all existing regulations, not interfering with this order, will be strictly observed.

The department of war calls for the most vigilant attention of all officers engaged in the recruiting service—while meritorious conduct in the discharge of these highly responsible duties will receive honorary testimony from the department, every species of neglect will meet with severe reprehension.

By order of the secretary of war,

D. PARKER, adj. and insp. gen.

NAVAL.

The mail-boat from Hampton for Norfolk, was captured on the 1st instant, by several of the enemy's barges. Two or three persons made their escape in a canoe, bringing off the mail. There were several passengers—the women and children were immediately returned, but the males were made prisoners. In the boat were several negroes, which, strange as it may appear, they sent up a few days afterwards, saying they had left it to their choice to stay with them or return to their masters—and they preferred the latter. Finally all the persons in the boat were released except the master and a soldier who happened to be on board. We rejoice at this evidence of returning civilization.

The enemy's barges were pursued by those of the Constellation, almost under the guns of their ships—and there might have been a fair fight, if the British had thought it advisable to have made a party to it.

A little while ago.—"History is philosophy, teaching by example." It is pleasant and useful frequently to look back, and bring to fresh recollection things that are past—it enables us sometimes the better to judge of passing events, and, at others, may give us a glimpse at futurity.

Who has not heard of sir John Jervis's TERRIBLE fight off Cape St. Vincent? The facts are briefly these—on the 13th of February, 1797, admiral Jervis, with fifteen sail of the line, fell in with and attacked and defeated a Spanish fleet of twenty-seven sail of the line, viz. one of 130; seven of 112; one of 80, and nineteen of 74 guns. The manœuvring and fighting lasted nearly the whole day, and ended in the capture of two Spanish ships of 112 guns, though one of them was called Salvador del Mundo (the SAVIOR OF THE WORLD!); one of 80, and one of 74. In this hard fight sir John lost only 73 men killed and 227 wounded. He received the thanks of parliament for the glorious victory, was created earl of St. Vincent, and received a pension, &c. &c.

The times are much changed on the ocean since that day. An American privateer—the Armstrong—hemmed up in port, it seems, can kill more Englishmen in two or three hours than a Spanish fleet of 27 sail of the line could do in a whole day: and that if one of our frigates (the unhappy Chesapeake excepted) had the good luck to get along side of a vessel of the enemy, they might lose half as many men in seventeen minutes, of Decatur's time, as sir John lost in this terrible fight with the Spaniards. The Prince of Newbichael privateer also killed 62 of them, 11 less than this great victory cost them. Now, suppose an American fleet of 27 sail of the line were to meet a British fleet of 15 sail, who thinks that we should lose four ships at an expence to the enemy of only 73 lives!!—Indeed, from the instructions given to the commander of the Pique frigate to run away from the Constitution, we rather suspect if lord St. Vincent, or any other lord they have got, were to attack our "sea dogs" with such an inequality of force, that he would soon be un-lorded. The New Castle and Acasta frigates, carrying together 108 guns, have gone off in hopes of fighting, in company, the Constitution of 48 guns! O! "the wooden walls of old England!"

CHRONICLE.

"The back woods." In a Cincinnati paper of Dec 13, we observe the following notice, in succession: a copy of an oration delivered before the "school of literature and the arts" to be published—a notice to the "United brethren of the German church" of a meeting for worship—of a concert and ball—relating to the establishment of a theatre—and terms of advertising in the three Cincinnati papers.

It is understood that Richard Bache has been appointed postmaster at Philadelphia, vice Michael Leib, removed. This change is noticed in the Register because the appointment of Mr. L. had excited much conversation in Pennsylvania and some other places.

It is said that Poland is to be added to the dominions of Russia—that Bonaparte is to be transferred from Elba to England—that Castlereagh is about to return from Vienna, to meet parliament; nothing said of what is doing in the congress at that place.

The king of France has appointed twenty censors of the press. Many difficulties appear to occur in settling the claims of the emigrants, original possessors of a great part of the real estate of France. The state of Spain remains unsettled. The princes of Italy seem dissatisfied with Murat's possesson of Naples. The French military establishment appears very large. The congress at Vienna had done little, if any business, at the last dates.

West-India markets.—The brig Speed, that arrived at Boston some days ago from the Havana, sold her potatoes at eight dollars a bushel, and her fish at twenty dollars per quintal.

A respectable female of the island of St. Bartholomew, having gone from thence to the island of St. Martins, for the benefit of her health, being afflicted with a complaint which soon proved fatal. After her death much difficulty was experienced in obtaining plank necessary to make her a coffin—one person alone was found possessed of some, which could not be bought or obtained; until the friends of the deceased agreed to furnish (within a limited time from St. Barts) as much plank as should be used for that purpose—after which stipulation, the boards were furnished, otherwise this unfortunate female must have been interred without a coffin.

France and England. Among the articles worthy of observation in Cobbett's paper, of the 17th of October, is that which relates to the vast emigration from England to France, since the restoration of the Bourbons. In corroboration, by the last advices we learn that it was calculated not less than 50,000 persons, many of them of the class of gentry whose income amounted from 100 to £1,000 per annum had left the country. It is known that a man with £200 a year, can live as handsomely and luxuriously in France, as in England for £600. In France, a loaf can be got for 4d. which will cost 1s. in England—beef may be had for 2d. per lb. a fowl for 4d. and a turkey for 2s. In France, a bottle of the best wine may be got for 1s. which costs 5s. in England; every thing else in proportion. The climate of France also is infinitely preferable to that of England, and the habitual cheerfulness and sauity of the French people in general, is another inducement to men who are disgusted and exhausted by the long list of government taxes, tithes, and poor rates.

In short, in the month of September last, it was calculated that a drain of five millions of ready money had already been made on the English nation, to supply the wants and expences of the emigrants; a sum greater than the expence of lord Wellington's army during the war!

To this vast drain is to be added, that nearly all the foreigners who had taken refuge in England during the continental troubles, have left that country; and drawn all their monies from the banks and funds—And this accounts for the great depression of public stocks and omnium.——American.

The Jesuits.—The bull issued by Paul III, in 1540, establishing the order of Jesuits, limited their number to 60. This limitation was soon after removed. In 1608, the numbers had increased to 10,581. In 1679, their numbers were 17,655, including 7,877 priests; in 1710 they amounted to 19,928. In 1717 they had 714 colleges and other establishments, more than 200 missions, 161 seminaries, 19,876 members, comprising 10,055 priests. The affairs of the order were conducted by one general, 87 provincials, 350 priors, &c.

THE ENEMY.—In our late Montreal papers, (says the N. Y. Evening Post) from which we have made some further extracts to-day, we perceive an advertisement of the deputy commissary of the British army in Canada, offering to contract for eighteen thousand cords of wood, to be delivered into the barracks at the following places: It serves to shew the different encampments of the British soldiery in Lower Canada during the ensuing winter, and will enable the reader to form some idea of the force at each of these military posts. *N. OUTRAGE.—From the New-Hampshire Patriot.—On the night of the 25th of November, a bandit of Canadians, aided by their associates on this side of the line, went to the dwelling-house of Mr. Samuel Hugh of Canaan, Vt. and after a scene of unfeeling cruelty which exceeds in barbarity the outrages of their ferocious savage "allies"—took him from his bed, tore him from his weeping wife and screaming children, tied him on his horse, and after robbing his desk of his money, collected his whole stock of cattle and drove him and them off to Canada. On the return of this gang of ruffians, robbers and smugglers to Canada, they robbed the farms of the hon. Micajah Ingham and Daniel Goss, esq. of all their stock of cattle and drove them also to Canada. The only pretence to this unparalleled and insufferable outrage is that Mr. Hugh has sinned past forgiveness against Canadians and smugglers by a very zealous and faithful discharge of the duties of an inspector of the customs; and that judge Ingham and Mr. Goss are decided and influential supporters of their government. Mr. Hugh is still detained a prisoner in Canada.

To cover the disgrace of the Beindeer, Avon, &c. the British have reduced the rates of their sloops of war two guns, though possibly adding two more to their complement. John Bull must be cheated. We repeat the story because it is a "good one." When they took the Guerriere from the French they called her by the guns she carried, a "44 gun frigate," and added five guns to her and called her a "thirty eight."

The Democratic Press informs us, that capt. Elliott is to command the "steam frigate building at Baltimore."

New-England Convention.

NO. IV.

[Since this article was written, the Hartford Convention has adjourned sine die. Their proceedings are before our readers; and we shall say nothing of them at this time, except that they are very different from the spirit which got up the meeting; as shall be elucidated by a variety of choice extracts from the journal papers, speeches and proceedings, having laid by a charming collection of them for record.

I hope that the length of this article may not deter any from an examination of its contents; for it brings to view many important facts, which some have found it convenient to forget.]

“Out of thine own mouth will I condemn thee.”

PROPOSITION THE FIRST. The “friends of commerce,” alias the “friends of peace,” (as certain men exclusively call themselves) under the unwarrantable acts of Great Britain, were the real authors of the war.

PROPOSITION THE SECOND. The “friends of commerce” and of “peace,” as aforesaid, under the malignity of Great Britain, are the cause of the continuance of the war.

These are broad propositions; but, I trust, I shall be able to demonstrate them to the satisfaction of every man that will read and think for himself. Unfortunately, there are too few of us that endeavor to think for ourselves.

PROPOSITION THE FIRST.

The following are the “generations” of the war.—

The memorials of the merchants and traders of Boston, Salem, Newburyport, New-Haven, New-York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, &c. to congress, in the winter of the year 1805-6, begat the non-importation law.—

The non-importation law begat the embargo.—

The embargo, feloniously violated and pusillanimously abandoned, begat the non-intercourse law.—

The non-intercourse law, weakly enforced, begat war.

Those “generations” were partially assisted by the attack upon the Chesapeake, the murder of Pearce, the blockade of New-York, and other like things of an irritating nature.

But to a correct understanding of the consistency of the “friends of commerce and peace,” it is necessary to give a brief history of the European orders and decrees that affected our trade and trampled upon our rights, as a neutral and independent nation. We shall say nothing about the impressment of seamen—at present, but merely speak of those things that touched the pockets of our merchants. I recollect it was said of some one famous for his love of the good things of this life, that the “way to his heart was down his throat”—and many people have begun to judge the patriotism of our merchants by the effect that a measure may have on their profits. I do not exactly say that this is the scale by which I judge them, generally, and certainly not individually; but I do say, that such a notion is becoming very prevalent among the people at large.

The orders and decrees that have immediate relation to the matters before us, are these:

A principle was established by Great Britain in the summer of 1805, (pray mind the dates, reader) that [to use the language of the Salem memorial to congress] a neutral was not competent to carry on in near any trade which he was not accustomed to do in time of peace—a principle “which (to continue the language of the said memorial) if admitted, must eventually prostrate our trade, and leave it at the discretion of the belligerents.” The cause and effect of this regulation were simply these—by the laws of France, before the revolution, the produce of the French colonies could not be imported into French ports except in French vessels. [I believe that such laws exist in all countries that have colonies, and especially in G. Britain.] But war between England and France deprived the latter of a direct intercourse with her colonies, and cut off a supply of their productions in French vessels; and her ports, at home and abroad, were thrown open to neutrals. It was not contended that a neutral vessel might receive her cargo at a French colony and proceed direct from thence to a port in France, or vice versa; but our merchants interpreted the law of nations to be—that an American vessel might proceed from a port of the United States to a French colony—there obtain a cargo and return home with the same; and that after the said cargo was landed and the duties thereon paid or secured, it [the cargo] might be legally carried to France, if France would receive it, or any where else there might be a market for it, in American ships, the whole being neutral or friendly property. In this manner a great business had been done—our exports of foreign produce rose from nothing, in a very few years, to 60 millions per annum; our tonnage, and the whole business of our merchants, had received a proportionate increase, and every sea was whitened by our canvas, employed in the carrying trade—mark, by “carrying trade” I mean, not the carrying of our own productions to market, but the carrying of the productions of other countries, from place to place. Well—this state of things greatly interfered with the business of the British merchants, especially in West India goods, on the continent of Europe, for which we were the chief carriers; and their jealousies were excited as their interest was touched. To relieve them, the government took the stand complained of, and, to quote the Salem memorial again, “she licensed her own subjects in a trade which she declared fraudulent in others.” These words are true, reader; I pray you to remember them, that you may duly esteem the justice of the British government, and the magnanimity of our traders. The whole affair “in a nut shell” was this—our merchants said that they had a right to carry a bag of French coffee to a French port, from a place in the United States, in an American vessel, provided the said French coffee belonged to an American citizen—mark me!—its all about a bag of French coffee. But the British said this was a violation of the law of nations, and therefore, licensed their own vessels to pursue the very same trade!

Very well—because Great Britain would not permit them to carry said bag of French coffee to a port in France, they memorialized congress in very strong terms: the following quotations for some of these memorials, will amuse and instruct our readers—

The Boston memorial says—

“There is great cause to apprehend, that the British government mean to set up as a principle, that she has a right to interdict all commerce by neutrals, to the ports of her enemies, which ports had not been opened previously to the commencement of hostilities:—that if she permits a trade with them in any degree, she has a right to prescribe the limits of it."

"A tacit submission to pretensions thus lofty and comprehensive, but which your memorialists trust are most of them untenable, would, they conceive, be an abandonment of rights openly recognized, and a dereliction of the most important commercial interests of our country."

"Reason, and the most powerful considerations of equity, join in as a duty on the United States to oppose these pretensions."

"For if the right [of commerce "in innocent articles"] be not both claimed and admitted, scarcely any of the European powers can in future be engaged in warfare, without making the United States, in opposition both to her efforts and wishes, either a victim or a party in the contest."

"The most tenacious advocates for the rights of belligerents admit, that during war, neutrals have a right to enjoy in the utmost latitude, the trade to which they have been accustomed in time of peace. Now if a belligerent has the right to blockade an extended sea coast, and to exclude neutrals from, perhaps, fifty different ports, (as was the case with the French ports in the channel during the last war,) how can the neutral enjoy his usual peace trade in its greatest latitude, unless this deprivation is balanced by another trade, which is open to him during the war? Your memorialists believe these principles to be unsound in point of principle, offensive in practice, and nugatory in effect."

"In all events, fully relying that the subject of our difference with Great Britain will receive the due consideration of government; and that such measures will in consequence be promptly adopted as will tend to DISMEMBARRASS OUR COMMERCE—ASSERT OUR RIGHTS—AND SUPPORT THE DIGNITY OF THE UNITED STATES."

"Your memorialists have the honor to remain, in behalf of their constituents and themselves, most respectfully,

Boston, January 20, 1806.

[This memorial, at full length, may be found in the Weekly Register, vol. V. page 164, and several of the extracts that follow, have been also inserted in the REGISTER.]

The merchants of New-York, on the same occasion said—

"We are compelled to consider the late decisions of the British tribunals as preliminary steps towards a system for controlling the importations and exportations of colonial productions, and thereby annihilating the most lucrative branches of our foreign commerce."

"If Great Britain permits commerce between her subjects and the colonies of her enemies, may we not, with the consent of those colonies, participate in the same commerce? If our commerce with the enemies of Great Britain may now be confined to the system established in time of peace, may we not apprehend that the principle will be retaliated in respect to our commerce with the colonies of Great Britain? In that case, what can ensue but war, pillage and devastation?"

"These are not imaginary suppositions; they illustrate the most important principles of our commerce; they evince the necessity of a circuitous trade, to enable us to realize the great value of exports of our own native productions, by which, alone, we acquire the power to liquidate the balance against us in our commerce with Great Britain; they demonstrate, that the position against which we contend, is not a rule of the law of nations: the law of nations contains no rule, which is unequal and unjust."

"It is, however, with much surprise, that we have recently discovered that the very circumstances upon which our hopes of security were reposed, have been urged as arguments to justify an invasion of our rights; and that having totally suppressed the external commerce of her enemies, Great Britain is now compelled to appropriate to herself that of her friends."

"In the list of our complaints we cannot forbear to enumerate the humiliating and oppressive conduct of ships of war in the vicinity of our coasts and harbours. We respect the principle and emulate the conduct of Great Britain, in regard to her own jurisdiction; and we wish merely to claim for ourselves the same measure of justice, which she exacts from others."

"This view of the subject, while it excites our anxiety, furnishes, also, a resource for our hopes; we wish only for justice, and believing that a commercial nation which disregards justice, thereby undermines the citadel of her power; we rely on the effect of mutual interests and wishes in promoting a cordial explanation and fair adjustment of every cause of misunderstanding; in particular, we rely on the government of our country, that OUR RIGHTS WILL NOT BE ABANDONED, and that no argument in favor of an usurpation will ever be derived from our acquiescence."

"Your memorialists conclude with remarking, that they deem the present situation of public affairs to be peculiarly critical and perilous; and such as requires all the prudence, the wisdom and the energy of the government, SUPPORTED BY THE CO-OPERATION OF ALL GOOD CITIZENS. By mutual exertions, under the benign influence of Providence upon this hitherto favored nation, we hope the clouds which threaten to obscure its prosperity may be dispelled, AND WE PLEDGE OUR UNITED SUPPORT in favor of all measures adopted to vindicate and secure the just rights of our country."

This memorial, signed on behalf of the merchants, by forty nine of the wealthiest and most respectable traders of the city, of all parties—many of them were, and yet are, the leading "federalists" of the place.

The Philadelphia merchants said—

"A jealousy of our enterprise and prosperity has excited a design of checking the commercial growth of our country, the fruit of which has been an attempt to innovate upon ancient and approved principles, and introduce unheard of articles and provisions into the code of public law."

"We moreover foresee in the prevalence of the principles, and in the continuance of the practices alluded to, nothing but the ruin of individuals, the destruction of their commerce, and the degradation of their country. Could the judgment or even the charity of your memorialists see, in the new doctrines of the British court, nothing but the revival and enforcement of an ancient and established principle which friendship had relaxed, or favor permitted to slumber, they might regret the departed good, but could impute no injustice to the hand that withdrew it. They are struck, however, with the novelty of these doctrines; their unequivocal hostility to neutral interests and rights; their inconsistency with former declarations of their ministry, and decisions of their courts; and with the extraordinary time and manner of their annunciation."

"The effect of this novel principle upon neutral interests is of the most serious and alarming character. It goes to nothing short of the destruction of neutral commerce; and from the well known neutral situation and character of the United States, to nothing short of inflicting a most deep and deadly wound upon their trade."

"The time and manner of announcing it accords with the principle itself. At a moment when mercantile enterprise, confiding in the explanations on this point given by the British ministry to our ambassador, was strained to the utmost, a new decision of the court of appeals is announced, and every sail is stretched to collect the unwary Americans, who are unsuspectingly confiding in what was the law of nations."

"In the principles they have here submitted to your consideration, they feel all the confidence of justice, and all the tenacity of truth. To surrender them, they conceive, would degrade from the national character and independence of the United States. From the justice of the government they hope for their avowal; from the spirit of government they hope for their defence; and from the blessing of heaven they hope for their establishment."

"To preserve peace with all nations, is admitted without reserve, to be both the interest and the policy of the United States. They therefore presume to suggest, that every measure not inconsistent with the honor of the nation, by which the great objects of redress and security may be attained, should first be used. If such measures prove ineffectual, WHATEVER MAY BE THE SACRIFICE ON THEIR PART, IT WILL BE MET WITH SUBMISSION. But whatever measures may be pursued by their government, your memorialists express the firmest faith, that every caution will be used to preserve private property and mercantile credit from violation."

This memorial is signed by twenty merchants of different politics, among whom are Thomas Fitzsimons and Robert Wain, at different times "federal" members of congress from that city.

The Baltimore traders said—

"It would not be desired that the state of things, which Great Britain has herself prescribed, and which use and habit had rendered familiar and intelligible to all, should be disturbed by oppressive innovations; far less that these innovations should by a tyrannical retrospection be made to justify the seizure and confiscation of their property, committed to the high seas, under the protection of the existing rule, and without warning of the intended change. In this their just hope, your memorialists have been fatally disappointed. Their vessels and effects, to a large amount, have lately been captured by the commissioned cruisers of Great Britain, upon the foundation of new principles, suddenly invented and applied to this habitual traffic, and suggested and promulgated, for the first time, by sentences of condemnation; by which, unavoidable ignorance has been considered as criminal, and an honorable confidence in the justice of a friendly nation pursued with penalty and forfeiture."

"Your memorialists will not here stop to enquire upon what ground of law or reason the same act is held to be legal, when commenced with one intention, and illegal when undertaken with another. But they object, in the strongest terms, against this exaltation of legality, because of its inevitable tendency to injustice; because of its peculiar capacity to embarrass with seizure, and ruin with confiscation, the whole of our trade with Europe in the surplus of our colonial importations."

"The reasons upon which Great Britain assumes to herself a right to interdict to the independent nations of the earth, a commercial intercourse with the colonies of her enemies (out of the relaxation of which pretended right has arisen the distinction in her courts, between an American trade from the colonies to the United States, and from the same colonies to Europe) will, we are confidently persuaded, be repelled with firmness and effect, by our government."

"She forbids us from transporting in our vessels, as in peace we could, the property of her enemies; enforces against us a rigorous list of contraband; dams up the great channels of our ordinary trade; abridges, trammels and obstructs what she permits us to prosecute; and then refers us to our accustomed traffic in time of peace for the criterion of our commercial rights, in order to justify the consummation of that ruin, with which our lawful commerce is menaced by her maxims and her conduct."

"This principle, therefore, cannot be a sound one. It wants uniformity and consistency; is partial, unequal, and delusive. It makes every thing bend to the rights of war; while it affects to look back to, and to recognize, the state of things in peace, as the foundation and the measure of the rights of neutrals."

"The pernicious qualities of this doctrine are enhanced and aggravated, as from its nature might be expected, by the fact that Great Britain gives no notice of the time when, or the circumstances in which, she means to apply, and enforce it. Her orders of the 6th November, 1793, by which the seas were swept of our vessels and effects, were, for the first time, announced by the ships of war and privateers, by which they were carried into execution."

"The late decisions of her courts, which are in the true spirit of this doctrine, and are calculated to restore it in practice, to that high tone of severity, which milder decisions had almost concealed from the world, came upon us by surprise; and the captures, of which the Dutch complained, in the seven years war, were preceded by no warnings. Thus is this principle most rapacious and oppressive in all its bearings. Harsh and mysterious in itself, it has always been, and ever must be used to betray neutral merchants into a trade, supposed to be lawful, and then to give them up to pillage, and to ruin."

"Your memorialists feel themselves bound to state that, according to authentic information lately received, the government of Great Britain does, at this moment, grant licenses to neutral vessels taking in a proportion of their cargoes there, to proceed on trading voyages to the colonies of Spain, from which she would exclude us; upon the condition, that the return cargoes shall be carried to Great Britain, to swell the gains of her merchants, and to give her a monopoly of the commerce of the world. This great belligerent right, then, upon which so much has been supposed to depend, sinks into an article of barter."

"They show that, in the hands of a great maritime state, it is not, in its ostensible character of a weapon of hostility, that it is prized; but rather as one of the means of establishing an unbounded monopoly, by which every enterprise calculated to promote national wealth and power, shall be made to begin and end in Great Britain alone."

"The solemn renunciation of the principle in question, in the face of the whole world, by her highest tribunal in matters of prize, reiterated in a succession of decrees, down to the year 1786, and afterwards, is powerfully confirmed by the acquiescence of Great Britain, during the first, most important, and active period of the late war, in the free and unlimited prosecution, by neutrals, of the whole colony trade of France. She did indeed, at last, prohibit the trade, by an instruction, unprecedented in the annals of maritime depredations; but the revival of her discarded rule, was characterised with such circumstances of iniquity and violence, as rather to heighten, by the effect of contrast, the veneration of mankind for the past justice of her tribunals. The world has not forgotten the instruction to which we allude, or the enormities by which its true character was developed. Produced in mystery at a moment when universal confidence in the integrity of her government had brought upon the ocean, a prey of vast value and importance; sent abroad to the distant naval stations, with such studied secrecy that it would almost seem to have been intended to make an experiment, how far law and honor could be outraged by a nation precluded for respecting both, the heralds by whom it was first announced, were the commanders of her commissioned cruisers, who at the same instant carried it into effect, with every circumstance of aggravation, if, of such an act there can be an aggravation. Upon such conduct there was but one sentiment. It was condemned by reason and justice. It was condemned by that law which flows from, and is founded upon them. It was condemned and will forever continue to be condemned, by the universal voice of the civilized world."

Signed by twenty-six merchants on behalf of the rest, thirteen of whom were "federalists"

The chamber of commerce of New-Haven, (Conn.) said—

"Your memorialists cannot behold, without surprise and regret, a powerful and respectable nation, bonding the principles of the common law of nations, to answer political purposes, and introducing a versatile policy into the solemn adjudications of her courts. We hold it to be extremely important that all nations should combine against such innovations of their rights; and in particular that the United States, whose geographical position gives them the best chance of maintaining neutrality, during wars in Europe, should FIRMLY RESIST every encroachment upon the rights of neutral commerce."

"With these impressions of the necessity of measures for defending our commercial rights, which shall be firm, but temperate; and bold, yet marked with a spirit of conciliation, your memorialists cordially unite with their fellow citizens of other commercial towns, in expressing their sentiments freely to the legislative and executive authorities of their country; with assurances of their disposition to give aid and support to EVERY MEASURE of government calculated to accomplish this important object."

Signed by order,

HENRY DAGGETT, president of the chamber of commerce, New-Haven, Feb. 7th, 1806."

The merchants of Newburyport declared that—

"Having sustained these losses and injuries in the prosecution of our lawful commerce, and in the exercise of our just rights, we rely with confidence on the wisdom, firmness, and justice of our government, to obtain for us that compensation, and to grant us that protection, which A REGARD TO THE HONOR OF OUR COUNTRY, no less than the rights of our citizens must dictate and require."

Signed by seven merchants.

The Salem traders went into the matter very zealously—their memorial is long and argumentative. They explain the principle at length; and severely reprehend it as a "new interpolation of an old rule" they say—

"On all occasions the United States have exhibited towards her an amicable interest, and a just, it may be added, a generous policy; it, therefore, we had favours to ask or receive, our claims have been peculiarly strong upon her; because we have been emphatically the sinews of her opulence. But it is believed that the United States never asked of any nation more than justice, and are willing to be bound by the established rules of commerce."

"It is somewhat singular, that a belligerent should invade a trade with itself, which it declares fraudulent with its enemies; and should lift the arm of power to crush the neutral, whose conduct is criminal only when it ceases to be partial."

"They deny that the rule is, or ever has made, a part of public law, or acquired by usage or prescription, any authority among nations."

"They conceive that it is not within the authority of any nation to legislate for the rest; and that the law of nations being founded on the tacit convention of the nations that observe it, can be binding only on those nations who have adopted it."

"It is not the least singularity, attending the conduct of the present war, that Great Britain has licensed her subjects in a trade which she declares fraudulent in others; that she admits them and invites to supply her enemy with means of resistance, when she declares confiscation is the penalty of neutral intercourse. Were the rule ever so just in itself, it certainly demands relaxation, when the belligerent partakes the profit and enmities at the breach. If its foundation be the unlawfulness of affording assistance to a distressed enemy; surely it ought not to be enforced when that assistance is an authorised object of speculation with the disinterested belligerent."

"Your memorialists are sorry that other instances of hostile conduct have been manifested by Great Britain less direct in their nature, but not less derogatory from our sovereignty, than those above enumerated. THE IMPRISONMENT OF OUR SEAMEN, notwithstanding clear proofs of citizenship, the violation of our jurisdiction by captures at the mouths of our harbours, and insulting treatment of our ships on the ocean, are subjects worthy of the serious consideration of our national councils; and will, we have no doubt, receive an early, prompt, and decisive attention. They wish to take no part in the contests which now convulse the world, but acting with impartiality towards all parties, to reap the fruits of a just neutrality. If, however, compensation cannot effect the purpose of justice, and an APPEAL TO ARMS be the last and necessary protection of honor, they feel no disposition to decline the common danger, or shrink from the common contributions."

"Relying on the wisdom and firmness of the general government in this behalf, they feel no hesitation to PLEDGE THEIR LIVES and PROPERTIES in support of the measures which may be adopted to vindicate the public rights, and redress the public wrongs."

Recollect, reader, that all this fallacious fight—[all] these solemn pledges to support the government, except in the case of the Salem memorial, where the impressment of seamen is mentioned, was about the right of carrying a bag of FRENCH coffee, from the United States, to a French port—AND NOTHING ELSE.

But these regulations falling short of the views of the cabinet, or not answering the hopes of the merchants; or, perhaps, a little staggered by the unanimous voice of America—another scheme was resorted to. On the 16th of May, 1806, they declared the whole coast from the Elbe to Brest in a "state of blockade." This was a bold stroke that had no parallel in the history of nations, that I ever heard of; and I do not believe the like had happened before, simply because no precedent was urged in behalf of it, in congress—if my recollection serves me correctly. Ports and places had theretofore been legally blockaded, by stationing near them a competent force—but here was a whole coast several hundred miles in extent affected to be under a blockade by four or five frigates; which, I think, was the whole force employed on the occasion. This order shocked our merchants not a little, and the outcry was great. If I had room for them, I would present my readers with some precious extracts from the commerce-loving newspapers of the day, as violent against Great Britain as any thing that has lately appeared at Pecton in her favor. This procedure not only deprived us of the profitable part of the carrying trade, but shut up the great markets for our own productions, in Germany, Holland and France; and thus blockade was so "rigidly enforced" that the mere fact of clearing out for a port on the coast so prohibited, was sufficient to condemn the property. Vessels, just off the stocks, were made good prizes of within sight of our shores, for violating the blockade off Amsterdam, though they had never been nearer it than 3000 miles!

This order in council of May 16, 1806, was followed by Napoleon Bonaparte's strange decree issued at Berlin, Nov. 21, of the same year. After recounting the violations of neutral rights by Great Britain, saying "that she does not admit the rights of nations as universally admitted by all civilized people," and mentioning the cases, he retaliates by declaring "the British islands in a state of blockade," though he had hardly a ship on the ocean!—and forbids all communication, direct or indirect, by neutral vessels or otherwise, between those islands and France. This, as a municipal regulation, he had certainly a right to do. But to the United States the decree was as a dead letter, for a long time. The explanation given by the minister Decres was satisfactory, and nothing more was made of it than the mere prohibition of the entry of a vessel into a French port that had recently visited a British port. Ten vessels in the whole, perhaps, were not condemned under it, and several of these were smugglers.—It was innocent to us, and had no effect, worth mentioning, on the honest trade of our country.

Six days after the date of this decree at Berlin (observe, at Berlin) and a very little time after a copy of it was received in England, there issued the "retaliatory" British order of January 7, 1807—[note the date] prohibiting all trade between the port of one belligerent and the port of another. Of this, as of the other orders in council, we were not warned; and our property was plundered on voyages which, at their commencement, were legal and just, even according to the doctrine of the British prize courts! Immense sacrifices were suffered—all was alarm and confusion; our business with Europe, lately so extensive, had dwindled so much in importance, that hundreds of our vessels were laid up to wait for better times. To this was superadded, some time after, a proclamation by the British king making it the duty of his officers to impress all they chose to suspect of being suspicious British subjects. The British, to their credit be it said, had modesty enough to allow that their orders could be justified only on the principle of retaliating on the Berlin decree—much more than was exhibited in congress in this very respect. But the injustice of making our property a prey because Bonaparte had done wrong, at least three months before it could have been known whether we would resist his pretensions or not, was purely piratical and faithfully English!

The irritation of the public mind in America had also been excited by various murders and outrages on our coast—such as, the attack on the Chesapeake frigate, the slaughter of Pierce in the harbor of New-York, with the blockade of that port, and many other like things, too "tedious to mention." A war was looked for—the old soldier grasped his revolutionary sword, and prepared to defend those rights that its prowess had purchased.

This decree of January 7, 1807, was justified only as being retaliatory. Let this be marked. Now, the Berlin decree, which the British pretended gave rise to it, had done them no harm. At war with France, they could not affect a right to trade with that country—neutrals, only, were to suffer, if suffering should flow from it. But so much was Britain concerned in the business of neutrals that, before they had even heard of the decree much less had had opportunity to demand an explanation of its principle or repel its practice, she issued an active order that plundered us, unconscious of offence, of millions on millions of property! "Magnanimous Great Britain!"—Now the fact is, that the American ship Horizon, of which so much was said at the time—(a solitary case)—if condemned under the Berlin decree, was not condemned until four months after the date of these orders in council, said to be retaliatory on that decree; and this decree never affected the British in any manner whatever for a great length of time. In March, 1808, many distinguished British merchants were examined before the house of commons touching the orders in council; who deposed it as a "notorious fact that no condemnation of an American vessel had taken place under that decree!" that insurance on American vessels was then the same as it had been before the said decree was issued; and, in general, that trade was not affected by its operations. These things are noticed to show the hollowness of the pretence that the Berlin decree authorized or justified the order of Jan. 7. It done England no more injury than the foolish title that George Guelf had of "king of France," did to France—both were empty things, like the king's own head.

[We might here mention the mission of Mr. ose, and a great variety of things that belong to the history of these times, with the letter of Champany, the reception of the intelligence that Great Britain would certainly issue orders in council of the nature of those that appeared in November following, &c. which resulted in the embargo, &c. but the detail is too long, and, though it may be interesting, does not immediately apply to the matters before us.]

We now come to a consideration of the famous orders in council of November 11, 1807, the substance of which was understood by our government before the embargo was laid.

These orders, nine in number, several of which are explanatory, are too long for insertion, but their substance may be given in a few words: in the language of a distinguished foreigner,* by them—

"All trade directly from America to every port and country in Europe at war with Great Britain, or from which the British flag is excluded, is prohibited. In this general prohibition every part of Europe, with the exception of Sweden, is included, and no distinction whatever is made between the domestic produce of America, and that of the colonies re-exported from thence."

"With the above exception, all articles, whether of domestic or colonial produce exported by America to Europe, must be landed in this country from whence it is intended to permit their re-exportation under such regulations as may hereafter be determined. By these regulations† it is understood, that duties are to be imposed on all articles, so re-exported." &c. &c.

These orders were again justified as a further retaliation on the Berlin decree, though under that decree no condemnation had taken place, no rise of insurance been effected. It is true, we had "submitted" to the decree, as the British ministry said, so far as to disregard a thing which, on our demand, had been explained to be harmless, as it was. But the real design was, that Great Britain might herself supply the "monster Bonaparte" with the articles he wanted. It was a "burning shame" that any body else than an Englishman, the enemy of Napoleon, should trade with him! and they licensed their own ships, with known forged papers, as American vessels, to carry on the very trade they prohibited to us. Here is British "MORALITY" and "RELIGION." It is a fact, and the most impudent of the "British party in America" will not deny it, though they go much further than even the parasites who lick up the crumbs that fall from lord Castlereagh's table would do, that real American vessels were refused an entry into ports of the continent, which British vessels, with forged American papers, and similar cargoes, were permitted to enter! There is no other than a fool or a madman will say this was not so—how great then was the lie, that these orders in council were retaliatory on the decree of Napoleon? It was a MAMMOTH LIE—A LIE WORTHY OF THE BRITISH CANNON. I speak plainly, and know what I say. The object of these orders was to monopolize the trade of the world to Great Britain, and make it pass through her ports, as we shall shew below—a mere money-making business, bottomed on the idea, that the supremacy of Britain at sea gave her a right to regulate all things that passed upon it, as was openly avowed by her writers. Her merchants had immense quantities of East and West India goods—they could not dispose of them on the continent while its ports were open to our trade, for we could undersell them—and, to distress “the tyrant of Europe,” they annihilated our trade with him, and supplied him, themselves, with the articles we would have sent him! Let the fact be remembered—that while American vessels were prohibited, by the British orders in council, from proceeding to a port of Europe, FOREIGN American papers were publicly advertised for sale in the London newspapers, whereby a British vessel might proceed to the very ports from which we were excluded! I want these things impressed on the mind, and have, therefore, urged them over and over.

* A. Baring, Esq. member of parliament.

† It will be seen hereafter that these "regulations" were carried into effect, and heavy "duties" imposed.

But to carry on the great trade they hoped for, they wanted (to use the words of Mr. Baring) “the concurrence of one man,” and that man was Bona parte; who, by the Bayonne decree, defeated their expectations.

It would take up more room than I can afford for the purpose to go into a detail of all the things that belong to these orders in council, of November 11, 1807. Suffice it to say, that on the 28th of March, 1808, the British parliament passed an act, which, however, is so important, and belongs so much to the history of our differences with Great Britain, that I feel compelled to publish the following abstract of it; with a few remarks I made upon it nearly six years ago—

* Extract of the act of parliament passed 28th March, 1808, giving effect to the orders in council of the 11th November, 1807.

“The duties specified in the annexed tables are to be paid on all goods at the exportation, with the following exceptions:

“1. All goods the produce, growth or manufacture of British colonies, or imported by the East India company, or under a license of this company.

“2. All goods (not manufactured) the produce of a country in amity with his majesty, imported in British vessels, or such belonging to such country, (except coffee, sugar, cinnamon, cocoa nuts, hides, tallow, oil, cotton yarn, and Persian bark.)

“3. All goods by vessels which sailed before the periods fixed of notice of the orders in council having been received, (viz: in North America and in the West Indies, the 20th January) and proceeding to a port in amity with his majesty. N. B. cotton yarn and Persian bark must, in all cases, be landed here, the exportation being entirely prohibited.

“4. Goods imported under license, dated prior to the 11th November, or in vessels cleared at the ports they are imported from before the periods fixed, and which are ware-housed for exportation only.

“5. Goods imported from any free port in British W. I. colonies, before the 1st June, 1808, or from any other port under license of his majesty’s governors, dated prior to the 1st January, and ware-housed only for exportation.

“6. Prize goods bought in before the 28th March, 1808.

“7. Goods imported from St. Domingo, (in return for goods shipped) under license, before the 5th February; these subsequent are only liable to half the duties.

All East India goods must be ware-housed in London only, but if it is proved that a vessel arriving at an out port has only such quantity of East India goods on board as must not exceed one-fourth of the value of her cargo, she may land there the goods, and either carry the East India goods to London, or transship them by some other vessel.

Goods rated according to the value, must pay the duty upon the real value at the time of shipping.

Goods ware-housed under bond must be exported within fifteen months, or the home consumption duties must be paid thereon: (if not prohibited) in default thereof they may be sold to defray the duties and charges, and the proceeds to be paid to the owners. If not so valuable as to produce the duties and charges, they may either be destroyed or re-exported to the country they were imported from: provided such country is then in amity with his majesty.

Goods allowed to be bonded.

A letter from Rathbone, Hughes & Duncan, of Liverpool, says—

“These duties to attach to the cargoes of all vessels bound from the United States to these ports on the continent which are under the influence of France, and arrive in this country, in compliance with the orders in council of the 11th November, provided such cargoes be re-exported in the same or other vessels.”

According to the preceding duties it has been calculated that the port of Baltimore would pay an annual TRIBUTE to the British government of nearly one million five hundred thousand dollars!!!

But this is not all. It seems the articles we are to receive from the ports of the continent must also pay a DUTY even yet less taxable, to his Britannic majesty! As, for instance, the article cin pays one shilling and three pence sterling per gallon, and with the tonnage and other charges, on a ship of a moderate size, will amount to about 1 1/2 pence sterling—equal to 6,600 dollars, allowing her to carry only about 60 pipes.*

Nor is even this all. Every vessel thus compelled against the consent of her owner to visit a British port, must additionally pay a duty on her tonnage, &c. &c. which with other charges, for a middle-sized ship, will amount to not less than seven hundred, and peckins sometimes even exceed two thousand dollars.

By calculation we shall find the truth—let us now see what a cargo of cotton, of tobacco, of flour and of fish would have to pay for his majesty’s license.

A cargo of cotton of 1000 bales, of 3 lbs. each, which is about the common weight, paying 4d sterling, per lb. in England, would amount to the precise sum of 500 0 dollars. The same cargo of cotton at 1 1/2 cents per lb. the average price for fine Louisiana cotton, will not cost at N. w. Orleans 43 0 dollars. Thus the exporter would have to pay 6 1/2 dollars in London, as a duty for liberty to proceed to the continent, more than the original cost—to this may be added the various other charges of tonnage, &c. amounting to about 200 dollars more.

A cargo of tobacco may be said to consist of 400 hogsheds—for the sake of round numbers, we will suppose each hogshed only to weigh 1000 lbs. and the account stands thus—

10,000 lbs. tobacco, at 11-12d sterling per pound, is 2,500 pounds sterling, or	Dolls. 11,100 00
Tonnage, at 12s. per ton, on 420 tons is 240 pounds sterling, or	1,065 60
Light money and about fifty other charges and attendant expenses, will amount to	800 00

Amount of tribute 12,965 60

* Some gin that had paid this tribute, was burnt at Baltimore.

A ship will carry about from 3,000 to 3,500 barrels of flour; say for the sake of calculation, 3,000 cwt.

60,000 cwt., at 5s. sterling per cwt. comes to 1,500 pounds.
Dolls. 6,666 00
or 1,365 60

Tonnage and charges, as above

Amount of tribute 8,525 60
A ship load of fish would cost about 3,500 or 4,000 dollars, including the duties and charges.

Of the 8,000 hogsheads we generally exported, about 12,000 were consumed in the British islands—the rest went to the continent—put them as before, at 100lbs. each, and what is the amount of tribute on this single article?

63,000 hds. tobacco, weighing each 100 lbs. is 68,000,000, at 1 1/2d sterling per pound, is 425,000 pounds, or
Dolls. 1,998,000 00
170 ships, tonnage, &c. 2000 dollars each 340,000 00

Amount of tribute on tobacco 2,338,000 00

The above may be sufficient to shew the nature of the orders in council. Can they be submitted to? Can Americans bear these grievous impositions? Can the sons of the men, who, in 1775 resisted a pitiful duty of three pence per pound on tea, because they would not consent to pay taxes or tribute without the approbation of their own legislature, NOW agree to pay to Great Britain twice as much, annually, as the whole amount of the United States' revenue, supposing trade might be able to bear it, and there were no interruptions from France? Forbid it Heaven! Spirit of independence! shield thy country from such baseness and degradation!

Then followed the outrageous Milan Decree of Bonaparte, dated Dec. 17, 1807, in retaliation of the orders in council of Nov. 11, of the same year, by which all vessels, "submitting to the orders in council, were to be made good prizes of." Denationalizing all that submitted thereto—as flagrant and unlawful a proceeding as any that preceded it on the part of the British; and it was extensively hurtful.

This narration is not given with a view to the merits or demerits of the rulers of Britain or France; but to shew the conscience and consistency of our own people. We have seen that the right of carrying a bag of French coffee to a French port was thought worthy of being defended by war, in 1806—and know that the same men abandoned the right of carrying their own productions to market, a little while afterwards. Instead of a manly assertion of their indubitable rights in 1810, 11 and 12 as in 1806, they calmly sat down to calculate, with pen and ink, the value of the trade that Great Britain had pleased to allow them the "gracious" liberty to have, and were willing to pay the tribute! They had provoked the government into a system of measures, and compelled it to take a stand from which it would not recede, and then abandoned it! A man of spirit may long wink at or look over imposition; but the instant he attempts to resist it, he is solemnly bound to remove the injury, and will do it at the risk of his life. But in private life, what should we say of those of his neighbors who urged him on to the stand that he took—and, when he had taken it, if they did not directly "aid and comfort" his opponent, done every thing in their power to render his efforts for redress unavailing?

The corresponding outrages of France with those of Great Britain are of no importance in considering the merits of this matter—and if they were, the following fact might shew us of what sort of stuff the "friends of commerce" is made: when the declaration of war was before congress, col. Johnson of Kentucky (I believe) moved that it should be declared against both France and England, as both had injured us. For 14's, if I recollect rightly, about 50 members voted; and two of them only were "federalists."

Such were the generations of the war, (further assisted by the refusal to ratify Driskine's arrangement—the history of which it would be well to notice if we had room, more fully to shew the consistency of the same gentlemen) and I think that all reasonable men will agree with me that the war began with the merchants, and was declared for them.—its origin was in the carrying of a bag of French coffee to France, and went on, from little to more, until it reached the ultimate end of forbearance. It was purely a war for commerce; say, for the carrying trade—but I do not believe the child is born that will live to see another war brought about in the same way! Many will teach their children, when they shall hear the groans of the merchants of the east for property plundered, to point to the Hartford Convention, and call to remembrance the horrible fact—that those dealers, when the United States was engaged in war on their account, done all that they could to bankrupt the nation, and bring about its "unconditional submission" to England—and "to laugh at their calamity and mock when their fear cometh." Never will the agriculturalists and manufacturers of the United States involve themselves again for the carrying trade; of no more national importance than a drop to the contents of a bucket—an unite, an atom, in the great business of the country, not equal in profit to the value of the yarn stockings† knit by old women of evenings! But it was this that provoked the jealousy of the enemy, and brought about the war.

The "second proposition" shall be considered in a future number.

One word more on the carrying trade. As it was nothing before the general war in Europe, so will it be nothing while a general peace exists on that continent. It is the policy and duty of every government to encourage its own commerce, as we have done, by discriminating duties, or in some other way. And in any event, of war or of peace (except the destruction of the British navy) that trade is best to the United States. If Europe is at peace, as before stated, there will be no room for it—if wars exist, England must be a party, and will regulate it by her orders in council. The merchants may, therefore, bid it farewell.

Legislature of Maryland.

By the house of delegates of Maryland, Jan. 2, 1815.

Amidst the impending sufferings and multiplied disorders of war, brought upon the American people by their misplaced and abused confidence in the wisdom and virtue of their rulers, there has been no evil of a more alarming and fatal tendency in the contemplation of this house, than the inordinate grasp of power, and undisguised spirit of encroachment on the sovereign rights of the states, and the personal liberties of the citizen, so repeatedly and unequivocally manifested in the acts of the general government.

Under this impression, and in the maintenance of those rights and privileges, it was considered as a prompt and paramount duty on the part of this house, to evince a faithful and firm determination of purpose, the moment that intelligence was recently received of the progress of a bill in both branches of the national legislature whose palpable object it was

* The impressment of seamen excepted.

† This is not said jokingly, but seriously and with what I esteem due circumspection. The highest export we had of foreign goods was about of the value of sixty millions of dollars in one year; 10 per cent. on this, which, taking into view the losses sustained, I cannot believe was realized in the whole, would make a profit of six millions of dollars—the stockings knit in the United States I estimate at 10 million pairs a year; which, at 75 cents, gives a value of seven millions and a half of dollars.

For many facts that bear on this matter—refer to page 273, of the present volume of the WEEKLY REGISTER.

to convert the free militia of these United States into train bands and cohorts of an odious despotic force. This decision was rendered the more indignant, by a view of the gross sophistry, and arbitrary pretensions, promulgated in the report of the secretary of war, at the commencement of the session, designed to reconcile the repugnant sentiment of the free people of this land, to the principle of the several schemes and projects of invasion on their birth-rights and liberties, as suggested in that report, for the acquiescence of congress.

To the sensibility of this house thus seriously awaked by the threatened pressure of a system, so immediately calculated to make "confusion worse confounded," and to produce a direct collision of authority between the national government and the sovereignty of the individual states, it is therefore now a matter of lively gratification to learn, that the passage of the proposed bill has been eventually arrested in the senate of the United States; and the gratification is enhanced by the circumstance, that this happy issue has been effected, at the instance of an illustrious statesman and jurist, whose opinion, worthy as it is on all subjects of the most attentive consideration, is entitled to peculiar regard on any question touching a construction of the powers imparted by the federal constitution, because it is the opinion of a surviving member of the convention of sages and patriots, by whom that constitution was planned, and originally recommended for adoption.

Wherefore, in order more fully to display the solemn interest which the occasion has inspired throughout the community of this state, and more especially for the purpose of rendering a just meed of public applause for eminent service in the defence of public liberty.

Resolved, That the thanks of this house, in behalf of the freemen of Maryland, be and they are hereby presented to the honorable Rufus King, of the senate of the United States, for the seasonable and successful interposition of his experienced wisdom and elevated influence of character, in averting the meditated operation of a measure, hostile to the immunities of constitutional freedom, offensive to the pure genius of independence, and fraught with consequences baleful and appalling to the social order, tranquility and well being of this united republic.

And this house would accompany the respectful tribute, which is thus specially offered, with a general expression of the grateful sense which it also entertains of the distinguished merit of the other members of the minority, who so steadfastly and ably co-operated, at every renewal of the struggle, in both branches of congress, in combatting against the insidious introduction of an authoritative conscript establishment, more specious in the form of its approach, but not essentially different from that, whose intense oppression has just vanished from the continent of Europe, with its guilty author, the bloodstained usurper of France.

Ordered, That the honorable the speaker of this house be requested to transmit to the honorable Rufus King an authenticated copy of the present proceeding.

The following letter was received by the speaker of the house of delegates from the honorable Rufus King in answer to the resolutions of the house approbatory of his conduct in opposing the militia bill.

Washington, Jan. 8, 1815.

Sir—I have had the honor to receive your letter of the 6th inst. transmitting to me a copy of the resolution of the house of delegates of the state of Maryland, of the same date. Permit me, sir, through you, to express to the house of delegates the high sense I entertain of the honor of their approbation of my conduct as a member of the senate, in opposing the bill which required of the militia of the several states, to furnish recruits for the regular army, under the penalty of being themselves drafted to serve in the prosecution of the war.

At the same time that I offer my acknowledgments to the house of delegates, I am bound in justice to others, to disclaim any particular merit on this occasion; the failure of the bill must be ascribed to the strenuous and able opposition which it received in both houses of congress, sustained, as this opposition has been, by the voice of the country.

I ask your indulgence to add, that while I have resisted the progress of a bill, professing to have for its object to provide for the common defence, by means, which the constitution does not in my judgment authorise; I have thought myself obliged, by a faithful regard for the general safety, at a period of great public difficulty, without reference to the past, to vote for supplies of men and money, and for other important measures within the pale of the constitution, which are thought necessary to revive the public credit; to protect the several states against invasion, and to defend and save from dismemberment the territory and sovereignty of the nation; objects to the attainment of which no effort that can be made by freemen will be deemed too great.

With distinguished consideration, I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servant,

RUFUS KING.

Hon. Henry H. Chapman, speaker of the house of delegates of Maryland.

Major-General Proctor.

From the Quebec Mercury.

Charges exhibited against major General Henry Proctor, lieutenant-colonel of the 41st regiment of foot, viz.

First Charge. That the said major general Proctor being entrusted with the command of the right division of the army serving in the Canadas, and the retreat of the said division from the Western parts of Upper-Canada, having become unavoidable from the loss of the fleet on Lake Erie, on the 10th Sept. 1813, did not immediately after the loss of the said fleet was known by him, make the military arrangements best calculated for promptly effecting such retreat, and unnecessarily delayed to commence the same until the evening of the 27th of the said month in which day the enemy had landed in considerable force within a short distance of Sandwich, the headquarters of the said division; such conduct on the part of the said maj. gen. Proctor, endangering the safety of the troops under his command, by exposing them to be attacked by a force far superior to them, being contrary to his duty as an officer, prejudicial to good order, and military discipline, and contrary to the articles of war.

Second charge. That the said major gen. Proctor, after commencing the retreat of the said division on the said 27th September; though he had reason to believe that the enemy would immediately follow it with very superior numbers and endeavor to harass and impede its march, did not use due expedition, or take proper measures for conducting the said retreat, having incumbered the said division with large quantities of useless baggage, having unnecessarily halted the troops for several whole days, and having omitted to destroy the bridges over which the enemy would be obliged to pass, thereby affording them the opportunity to come up with the said division: such conduct betraying great professional incapacity on the part of the said major-gen. Proctor, being contrary to his duty as an officer, prejudicial to good order and military discipline, and contrary to the articles of war.

Third charge. That the said maj. gen. Proctor, did not take the necessary measures for affording security to the boats, waggons and carts, laden with the ammunition, stores and provisions required for the troops on their retreat, and allowed the said boats, waggons, and carts, on the fourth and fifth of October 1813, to remain in the rear of the said division, whereby the whole or the greater part of the said ammunition, stores and provisions either fell into the enemy's hands or were destroyed to prevent their capture, and the troops were without provisions for a whole day previous to their being attacked on the said fifth of October; such conduct on the part of the said major general Proctor being contrary to his duty as an officer, prejudicial to good order and military discipline, and contrary to the articles of war.

Fourth charge. That the said major-general Proctor having assured the Indian chiefs in council at Amherstburgh, as an inducement to them and the warriors to accompany the said division in its retreat, that on their arrival at Chatham they should find the forks of the Thames fortified, did nevertheless neglect to fortify the same, that he also neglected to occupy the heights above the Moravian village, although he had previously removed the ordnance, with the exception of one six pounder to that position, where, by throwing up works, he might have awaited the attack of the enemy and engaged them to great advantage, and that after the intelligence had reached him of the approach of the enemy on the morning of the said 5th of October, he halted the said division notwithstanding it was within two miles of the said village, and formed it in a situation highly unfavorable for receiving the attack which afterwards took place; such conduct manifesting great professional incapacity on the part of the said major general Proctor, being contrary to his duty as an officer, prejudicial to good order and military discipline, and contrary to the articles of war.

Fifth charge. That the said major-gen. Proctor did not on the said 5th of October, either prior to or subsequent to the attack by the enemy on the said division, on that day make the military dispositions best adapted to meet or to resist the said attack, and that during the action and after the troops had given way, he did not make any effectual attempt in his own person or otherwise to rally or encourage them, or to co-operate with and support the Indians who were engaged with the enemy on the right. The said maj. general Proctor having quitted the field soon after the action commenced; such conduct on the part of the said major general Proctor betraying great professional incapacity, tending to the defeat and dishonor of his majesty's arms, to the sacrifice of the division of the army committed to his charge, being in violation of his duty, unbecoming and disgraceful to his character as an officer, prejudicial to good order and military discipline, and contrary to the articles of war.

Hartford Convention.

STATEMENTS,

Prepared and published by order of the convention of delegates, held at Hartford, December 15, 1814, and printed by their order.

SCHEDULE (A)

Shewing the ascertained expences of the war, prior to July 1, 1814.

From September 30, 1812, to September 30, 1813,	18,484,750 49
From September, 30, 1813, to December 31, 1813,	5,887,747 00
From January 1, to July 1, 1814,	11,210,238 00

Ascertained expence of the land forces from January 1, 1812, to July 1, 1814. $43,047,550 29

Navy department, from January 1, to September 30, 1812, about six months of peace and three months of war; the sum of $2,638,612 95
From Sept. 30, 1812, to Sept. 30, 1813,	6,420,707 20
From Sept. 30, to Dec. 31, 1813,	1,248,145 10
From Jan. 1, to July 1, 1814	4,012,899 90
	14,320,365 15

Ascertained war expences to July 1, 1814, $57,367,915 44

To which must be added large sums not ascertained, and also disbursements made by individual states, these must be more than 3,000,000 00

$60,367,915 44

Note. The military and naval expences of the United States from January 1, 1812, to June 18, 1812, when war was declared, are included in the above account, and were partly on account of the peace establishment, and in part preparations for war. So that this enormous expenditure was incurred in the military and naval departments alone, in two years of small warfare, and in six months that preceded it.

SCHEDULE (B)

Shewing the receipts at the treasury of the United States from January 1, 1812, to July 1, 1814, including about six months of peace and about two years of war, to wit—

From Jan. 1 to Oct. 1, 1812, from the proceeds of the customs, the sales of land, &c. being three-fourths of the revenue yearly,	$8,101,210 18
The balance in the treasury charged this account	3,947,818 36
On the eleven million loan under the act of March 14, 1812,	5,847,212 50

87,637,617 30

Deduct cash in the treasury July 1, 1814, 4,722,659 32

$82,914,957 98

Deduct payments made at the treasury in the same period from January 1, 1812, to July 1, 1814, to wit—

The civil list, indian department,
&c. $4,697,872 32

Interest and principal of the public debt, 21,101,417 72

Left for war purposes in this period $57,107,777 94

Note. Thus while the war cost above 60 millions of dollars, and the land forces 46 millions of the sum, there was but a small British army employed against the United States, and in this period, disgrace generally attended the American arms by land.

SCHEDULE (C)

Shewing the great increase of the revenue of the United States from the adoption of the constitution to the adoption of the restrictive system—and while commerce continued free, and the great diminution of those revenues since that system was resorted to —they were as follows, as by treasury statements.

Prior to 1792, $4,418,913

In 1792, 3,661,932

1793, 4,714,423

1794, 5,128,432

1795, 5,954,534

1798, 7,829,575

1799, 7,475,773

1800, 10,777,709

1802, 13,668,223

1803, 11,064,067

1804, 11,828,307

1805, 13,560,663
1806, 15,559,931
1807, 16,398,019
1808, 17,060,661
1809, 7,773,473
1810, 9,384,214
1811, 14,423,529
9 mo. of 1812, 6,927,706

$215,786,783

Note. As bonds were given for the duties, as they usually become payable the next year—the duties payable in any year, were, generally, collected on the importations of the preceding year, as the 17,060,661 dollars received in 1808, were the duties on the great importations of 1807, a few small sums excepted.

Note, also. All these revenues arose from commerce, except 16,262,651 dollars.

It will be observed that all the sources of revenue, exclusive of impost and tonnage duties did not on an average, amount to quite one million of dollars a year—so that the impost and tonnage duties, the four years preceding the long embargo, amounted to about 58 millions of dollars, or to 14,500,000 dollars a year. And if there had been no embargos or restrictions on commerce, these would have increased, at least not decreased, till the war was commenced. That commenced four years and a half after the embargo was laid. It will be seen that all the revenue amounted, in four years, before the embargo, to 62,679,274 dollars, and deducting for other sources of revenue one million a year, there will remain 58,579,274 dollars, received from impost and tonnage duties—whereas in the three years and nine months after the embargo was laid, all the revenues, as above, amounted only to 38,508,922 dolls. or at the rate of 40,817,990 dolls. in four years—but in these four years were included not only the ordinary million a year, but the two millions direct tax of 1798, and the new internal duties of these four years, whence was collected at least two million and a half—hence deduct 6,500,000 dollars from 40,817,990 dollars, leaves, received from impost and tonnage duties, 34,317,990 dollars, 24,261,384 less than was received in the four years preceding the embargo; that is, about six millions a year, or above twenty seven millions for the four years and a half, the restrictive system existed before the war—hence this sum was clearly lost by this system. See schedule F.

Note, also.—The said 16,262,651 dollars was received thus: from internal revenue, 6,460,003 dolls.
—direct tax, 1,757,240 dollars—sales of land, 6,161,283 02—postage of letters, &c. 667,343 dolls.
—miscellaneous, 1,216,775 dollars.

Therefore, it is clear that if there had been no restrictive system or war, the old debt of the United States would have been, before this time, paid, or nearly paid.

SCHEDULE (D.)

Shewing the state of the army of the United States, previous to July 1, 1814. It was thus—effectives 27,010, aggregate 31,539—stationed as follows:

In the first military district, at Boston, Portsmouth, Portland and Eastport, aggregate number 655

2 Mil. Dis. at New-London, &c. 714

3 do. at New-York, 2,116

4 do. at Fort Mifflin, &c. 368

5 do. at Baltimore, Norfolk, 2,244

6 do. at N. & S. Carolina & Georgia, 2,244

7 do. at N. Orleans, Mobile, &c. 2,378

Stationed on the sea board	10,659
8 Mil. Dis. at Detroit, Sandwich, &c.	2,472
9 do. division of the right,	11,795
at Buffalo, Sackett's Harbor, &c.	6,613
	18,408
On the Canada line	20,880

Total—31,539

Recruits enlisted from January 27, 1814, to September 30, 1814, as by the return of the inspector general, were 13,898, to wit:—

In February 1814,	980
March ..	2,357
April ..	2,561
May ..	2,138
June ..	1,445
July ..	1,486
August ..	1,687
Sept. ..	1,304

Note.—An army of 31,539, early in the year 1814, was no doubt a much larger army than the United States kept up the two first years of the war—and, if properly employed, 31,000 regular troops were certainly adequate to oppose any force Great Britain, in those years, employed against the United States—31,000 men, according to the estimation of the war and treasury department, should not have cost more than twelve millions a year, or twenty four millions in the two years; whereas the land forces did cost forty-six millions and more, in the wasteful manner in which the war was conducted.

Note, also—when it is considered that the United States had on the 1st of July, 1814, a regular army of 31,530, and enlisted in eight months, from February 1, to October 1, 1814, 13,898 men, for what possible pretence can the national government have recourse to conscription, and measures destructive of the liberties of the people, to fill the ranks of the army, the course of enlistment amply prove, that if the army be well paid and supported, and according to contracts, there can be no occasion to resort to such violent measures.

Note, also—of the 10,659 regular troops on the sea board, only 1,369 were stationed in New-England.

SCHEDULE (E.)

Though the operations of the war in 1781 and 1782 were great, especially in the southern states, yet it cost America far less than 15 millions a year, as will appear by the public documents. In 1782 congress made an estimate for an army of 25,000 men. This estimate which proved to be correct, was a little over $8,000,000. The individual states' expences will be found not to have exceeded four millions a year, and navy expences were trifling.—In 1781 the expences were about three millions more than in 1782—Prices were about the same then as now.

The following is an abstract of the expenditures of the United States from the adoption of the constitution to October 1, 1812, taken from the treasury reports:

Prior	In	1803	4,062,824
to 1792	$1,718,129	1804	4,052,858
In 1792	1,766,677	1805	6,357,234
1793	1,707,848	1806	6,080,209
1794	3,500,348	1807	4,984,572
1795	4,350,596	1808	6,504,338
1796	2,531,930	1809	7,414,672
1797	2,833,590	1810	6,311,082
1798	4,623,223	1811	5,592,604
1799	6,480,166	9 months of
1800	7,411,369	1812	11,760,292
1801	4,981,669
1802	3,737,079		$108,102,221

Note.—These expenditures do not include the interest and principal of the public debts.

Never after the peace of 1783, till 1812, did the expenditures of the United States amount to seven millions and a half in any year.

In 1781 Cornwallis was taken, and it is ascertained that over 26,000 British troops were sent into the four southern states in less than two years in 1780 and 1781. The United States were obliged to keep up large forces in the middle and northern states; and the militia drafts were often made in those two years. During the long period from March 4, 1789, to Oct. 1, 1812, the whole military expenditures of the U. S. were but 44,066,746 65 including Indian wars, war with France, and with the Barbary powers, the Pennsylvania insurrections, and several millions expended in the present war before October, 1812.—Much less than two millions of dollars a year. And the navy expenditures during the same long period were but 29,889,660 78. About one million and a quarter a year.

Further—An examination of the public documents will show that the eight years war of the revolution did not cost more than 205,000,000 of specie dollars. More than half that sum was expended in the three first years, when paper money was abundant, and the American and British armies most numerous; a period in which we withstood the forces of the enemy alone, in a manner so honorable to our arms.

SCHEDULE (F.)

This schedule brings into one view the great loss of revenue occasioned by the restrictive system, and the enormous waste of public monies in the two first years of this war—the particulars whereof are stated in the preceding schedules.

1. 27 millions of dollars, at least were lost by restrictions on commerce, for four years and a half before the war was declared or commenced, as in schedule C. $27,000,000

2. War expences, as stated in Schedule A. to the amount of 60,367,915 dollars at least, were incurred in this war before July 1, 1814—whereas on any scale of expences of any wars, ever carried on in this country, heretofore, the war expences from January 1812, to July 1, 1814, ought not to have exceeded 27 millions, if indeed they could equal that sum. There then was clearly a wasteful and improvident expenditure of public monies, in the war and navy departments, in this short period of more than 33 millions of dollars, 33,000,000

Revenue and public monies lost by foolish restrictions, and in a profligate management of the war, 60,000,000

Schedule E. also shows how moderate our military expences were prior to the present war.

Note.—Had this large sum been saved, as it might have been with perfect ease by a wise and economical administration, the credit of the United States, at this moment, would have been unimpaired—and the very heavy direct and internal taxes now laid on the people to supply the place of this sum, so lost and wasted, might have been avoided.

In fact, examine the expenditures of all former wars in this country, the force brought against it in the two first years of this war, and every cause of necessary expenditure, and it will appear that not so much as 27 millions ought to have been expended in the military and naval departments in the period in question.

This statement shews that about three fourths of the domestic exports of the U. S. are the produce of agriculture, and for four years prior to the embargo, exceeded on an average, 33 millions a year. It will readily be seen what great losses there must have been in regard to these articles, when the regular exportation of them has been capriciously interrupted for 7 years past, by embargoes, restrictions and war, the same as to the produce of the forest, and that of the sea, the latter amounting, on an average, for four years next before the embargo, to above 3 millions of dollars a year, has been by restrictions and war, wholly destroyed. And the shipping employed formerly in acquiring these productions of the sea, is nearly rotten at the wharves, and the seamen engaged in this branch of business, very important in a public view, are scattered and gone.

The domestic articles in the four years next before the restrictive system, were 50 millions more, than the same articles exported in the four years under it and before the war.

The tabular statements, &c. which belong to the proceedings of the Hartford convention, are given entire in the preceding pages. Of these we promised an examination and elucidation as we "proceeded in our essays regarding that assembly."—But the following, from the Boston Patriot, is so exactly in point, and so fully demonstrates a fact we have repeatedly urged, that we are induced to give it immediate insertion.

In speaking of a certain report adopted by the legislature of Massachusetts, (see page 183) we said, that certain persons had "specially acquired the faculty of uttering gross falsehood in the words of truth." This observation has all its force to many parts and points of the proceedings of the "illustrious assembly," or "GRAND NIVAN," as the Boston papers have called the caucus. The second part of schedule H. is expressly calculated to mislead the vulgar and unthinking, in other respects than those exposed in the extract below.—The exports of Massachusetts in 1806, are given at 21,199,243 dollars, and in 1813 at 1,513,000—to shew the immense decrease of the commerce of that state. Now, though both these items may be correct, the contrast shews a statement as different from truth as light is from darkness. The first shews the gross amount of all the articles exported—the latter, the value of the domestic products only. There is a sort of cunning in this that cannot be too severely reprehended. Why not place both on the same principle, that the most simple might comprehend the whole truth! But in the abbreviation, "Dom. Arts." is the salvo!

It is true, the value of the foreign articles exported from Massachusetts in 1813 would not have greatly swelled the amount—for by our nature as a belligerent, the carrying trade was lost to us and to that state (and if it is never regained by either, the people at large will not be very sorry, for it was the original cause of the war)—but the following would more fairly and honestly shew the real state of things—

Exports of native produce in 1806
(as shewn below)	$2,979,764
ditto 1813	1,513,000
Difference only	1,466,764

Therefore, Massachusetts, by the war, has lost about one-half of her natural commerce—that is, the commerce which that state, separated from the rest, might have had. For the carrying trade they had to the eastward, we have clearly shewn, depended and was built upon the agriculture of the middle, south and west.

From the Boston Patriot.—Annexed to the Hartford convention manifesto, is a long calculation in figures, intending to hold up Massachusetts as a wonderful commercial state, with great resources.—The exports of Massachusetts in 1806, are there stated to be $21,199,243; and in the way it is stated, it is intended to convey the idea that Massachusetts really exported that enormous amount of her own products. We therefore proceed to shew in what this amount really consisted, viz.

Amount of foreign articles exported
from Massachusetts, in 1806,	$14,577,547
Amount of domestic do.	6,621,696

Total, as above, $21,199,243

To give a comprehensive view of what portion of the amount under the head of domestic exports of Massachusetts, really consisted of the produce of New-England, we state it as a fact, that out of the whole amount of the domestic exports of Boston in 1809, which was $4,009,029, there was of this amount, in rice, cotton, flour, tobacco, staves, and naval stores, (the produce of the southern states) the enormous amount of $2,294,109; leaving but $1,714,929 for the net amount of New-England products exported in that year from Boston. It therefore appears that 55 per cent. of all that portion of the exports of Boston under the head of domestic articles, are in fact the produce of the southern states. Of course the domestic exports of Massachusetts should stand thus:

Domestic exports, in 1806	$6,621,596
Deduct 55 per cent. for southern produce, included in the above,	3,641,932

Net export of New-England produce? in 1806, from all Massachusetts, $2,979,764

Yet the Hartford convention committee have the audacity as well as the folly to represent to the public, that Massachusetts really exported, of her own products, $21,199,243.

more effectual protection of the north western frontier, by granting donations of land to actual settlers thereon.—The bill was twice read and committed.

The speaker laid before the house a report from the post-master general, on the several petitions remonstrating against the transportation and opening the mail on the Sabbath, which have been referred to him. [The report is an able one, adverse to the prayer of the petitions.—We shall hereafter publish it.] The report was read and referred to the post office committee.

The bill supplementary to the act for the settlement of the Yazoo claims being demanded, was ordered to be read a third time.

Wednesday, Jan. 18.—Mr. Yancey made a report, from the committee of claims, on the petition of Joshua Penny, (the pilot who was taken from Long Island) stating, that, although the committee deprecate and abhor such cruel and unheard of conduct on the part of the enemy, the case cannot be distinguished from the mass of similar sufferings inflicted by the enemy, and therefore recommending that the petition be not granted.—Concurred in.

Mr. Kilbourn offered for consideration the following resolutions:

Resolved, That the committee of ways and means be instructed to enquire into the expediency of laying and collecting an income tax from such people of the United States as have capital vested in public or any kind of stock, or in private loans, or in any other way yielding profits to the owner; and on those who are engaged in professional or other employments, producing an annual income, exceeding a certain amount, which the said committee may think proper to fix; it being intended that this enquiry shall extend only to such capital and employments as are not taxed by any existing laws.

Resolved, That the said committee be instructed to enquire into the expediency of increasing the tax upon the income, or dividends, of the capital vested in the several banking institutions within the United States, on which a tax is now imposed by law of congress.

The house refused to consider the resolutions—for it 60, against it, 66.

The house then resumed the consideration of the message from the senate announcing their amendments to the amendments of this house to the bill to incorporate the subscribers of the bank of the United States of America.

The first amendment having been stated, which proposes to make the capital of the bank thirty-five millions instead of thirty millions—

There was a great deal of talking about it, pro and con, and finally, the amendment was voted down, 80 for and 87 against it.

The other material amendments were also disagreed to, after debate.

Among others, was the amendment going to reinstate the payment-in-specie-suspending section, on which the vote was as follows:

For reinstating it	80
Against it	85

So the house refused to reinstate that section.

The house after agreeing to some trivial amendments, determined to insist on those of their amendments to which the senate has disagreed; and the house adjourned.

MISCELLANEOUS.

NEW-ORLEANS.—The entire failure of the mail from New-Orleans, leaves us in painful uncertainty as to the fate of that interesting city. Such failures frequently happen in the winter season, but that it should have occurred just now is peculiarly mortifying. In the mean time, supposition takes the place of fact, and the safety or fall of that place is spoken of as the wishes or fears of the people lead them to hope or expect.

Our last accounts were of the 17th ult. Since then we have nothing from New-Orleans—but the following is interesting and important.

Extract of a letter from a citizen of Ohio, at Baton Rouge, to a member of congress.

DECEMBER 18.

"All is confusion and preparation to go to the scene of action. An express has just arrived, stating that the British forces are landing 18 miles from New-Orleans, to take that place.* Gen. Coffee, with the mounted Tennesseans, passed here yesterday in high spirits. Gen. Carroll, with the Kentuckians and other Tennesseans, about three thousand strong, passed here this morning in boats, and will be at New-Orleans in 18 or 24 hours. Gen. Jackson and his forces were yesterday, at 11 o'clock, at the city. The militia general, Thomas, has just received an order, by express, that the militia must turn out en masse and proceed on."

"2 o'clock. The mail not being yet gone, I have just time to say, that every additional information confirms the above. The volunteers are turning out lively."

An express arrived at Milledgeville on the 5th instant to his excellency governor Early, with the following intelligence:

From general Winchester to general M^cIntosh.

Mobile, 20th December, 1814.

"The enemy has assembled his fleet at Ship Island, consisting of 120 or 130 of all descriptions, and his land force is stated to be from six to eight thousand. On the 15th inst. he captured five gun-boats, near the entrance of the pass of St. Joseph, and on the same day 150 boats and barges full of men were seen standing a course which indicated an intention of attacking New-Orleans.

"If he succeeds or not in that project, this place will be his next aim as the key to indian influence. Therefore, permit me to repeat my solicitations for a reinforcement of one or two regiments, to be hastened forward by forced marches. A few days gained by celerity of movement, may insure victory, when without it the conflict may be doubtful."

General M^cIntosh to governor Early.

Within 15 miles of Chatahooche, 1st January.

"No exertions on my part shall be wanting to press forward with all the activity that I can, to endeavor to be in time to afford my best efforts to save our country from the polluting foot of a cruel and oppressive foe.

"I have received information which I believe to be correct, that major Blue received intelligence of the Red Sticks, or hostile Creeks who flew from Pensacola at the approach of general Jackson's army, being situated on an island which they had recourse to as a temporary safety from pursuit.

"The mode of his acquiring this information was from two of his Choctaw indians, being sent out to endeavor to get some information of their situation, who spoke the Creek language.

"They met with two of them who had crossed over to the main land in boats to kill cattle. The Choctaws appeared friendly until they acquired the necessary intelligence; they then killed and scalped the Indians and returned to major Blue, who immediately took advantage of those boats, and passed his command over on the island in the course of the night, killed and captured the whole, except 8 or 9, that made their escape in another boat they had."

* This, we presume, is not correct—our letters of the 17th make no mention of it.

¶ Various letters from New-Orleans of the 16th are published, but we gather from them no particulars worthy of note, that were not stated in our last paper; except that they appear to concur in believing the city is safe. The people were arming with great alacrity—order prevailed, and Jackson was all life, activity and animation.

¶ A letter from Rhea C. H. (Ten.) says it stated "that a vessel of war escorting transports had attempted to land their troops fourteen miles east of Mobile Point, (Fort Bowyer) but was repulsed by the American forces in that quarter."

"* For ourselves we believe that the Tennessee and Kentucky troops must have arrived at New Orleans before an attack could have been made; and, of course, we calculate that if the enemy attempted the place, he has been beaten.

NATIONAL BANK. The bill to establish a national bank is still bandied about, like a shuttlecock, between the two houses of congress, and will probably fall to the ground in its flight from one to the other. Such a bank is proper or it is inexpedient—the people think that time enough has been spent to ascertain its quality; and it is earnestly to be wished that it should either be passed or rejected. It does not become the nature of this work, or the rule of conduct that its editor has prescribed to himself, to express the general idea that prevails in the society he mixes with, as to the talkings and notions of the representatives of the people, at a time when action is so much required; much less to show how the minority governs.

If, however, the bank is to be established with a requisition that it shall redeem its notes with specie, much will the day of its institution be lamented! In the present state of affairs, it would act as a mere collector of the precious metals for the British, and certainly become bankrupt in less than six months.—It is an indubitable fact, that persons are employed in the United States to drain us of every specie dollar,* and I have very little doubt, if the war lasts, and this bank is constituted as proposed by the house of representatives, that silver and gold will be purchased at a premium of 50 per cent. How can Great Britain more cheaply prosecute the war, than by undermining our credit, in draining off the basis of it? Who does not believe there are many among us that would gladly co-operate to ruin the finances of the nation, and thereby compel us to make peace on any terms, especially, if they themselves made a profit by it? He who recollects the efforts and sacrifices, of paper, made by William Pitt in (I believe) 1797, to draw specie from Germany, may calculate where the more prodigal Castlereagh will stop to exhaust the United States. Can it be supposed that an American congress, fearful that his lordship would not soon enough accomplish his object, shall establish an institution to consummate his plan?—Can we suspect that any voted on the bank bill with a sole view to this purpose?

If the bank has specie for its basis, its notes will soon receive the confidence of the people; and, the large sums to be collected in taxes and duties will force their circulation, if force should be required, to the necessary amount. The bank of England has not paid specie for many years, and probably never will—but a national bank here, with six millions snug in its vaults, would the very day that peace should be made, commence payment in specie; and, by the altered state of things, be enabled to redeem all its notes with that fidelity and promptitude which has generally distinguished such institutions in this country.

ACTUAL BLOCKADE. Liverpool, Oct. 30.—A government vessel laden with gun powder, was chased into Wexford a few days since, by an American privateer, which has prevented several vessels from sailing for that port.

[The preceding article is inserted in Lloyd's lists, of Nov. 4. Queerer things than this will appear before the first of May.]

PLATTSBURG, &c.—Major-general Mooers, of the New-York militia, and major-general Strong, of Vermont, have ordered their divisions to hold themselves in instant readiness to meet the enemy, expected to make a second incursion. From what we see, if the attempt is made it is probable that the British may again be foiled and get a sound drubbing into the bargain; to which they are very welcome.

DIVISION ORDERS.—Plattsburg, Jan. 5, 1815.—The general has received information that the enemy is making preparations for a winter campaign, and it is possible he may attempt the reduction of this post, or the destruction of our flotilla at Whitehall. The general therefore directs the officers and soldiers of the division under his command, to be completely equipped and hold themselves in readiness to assemble at a moment's warning, at any point to which they may be called, and expel the enemy, should he again invade our territory. The general also directs all those of his division who reside near the line, to be particularly attentive to the movements of the enemy, and to give the earliest information to him, or the commanding officer at this post, of any step which would indicate an invasion of the United States. And the general again particularly enjoins it on all those able to bear arms on the borders of lake Champlain and its vicinity, to be in perfect readiness, and promptly to take the field, should their country require their services.

The general regrets the necessity which compels him to call upon those officers commanding brigades, who have not made their annual returns, to do it without delay.

By order of major-general Mooers.

R. H. WALWORTH, aide-de-camp.

NAVAL.

From 50 to 70 private armed vessels have sailed from the United States within a few weeks last past, and they are still "tumbling" out from all quarters, though gov. Gore, in a speech to the legislature of Massachusetts said, "it was owing to the FORBEARANCE and CLEMENCY of the British that we are permitted to have a ship on the ocean."

We have also the pleasure to notice many valuable arrivals.

On the 8th instant no less than twelve vessels entered the rigidly blockaded port of Charleston, S. C. viz. 1 from the West Indies; 1 from Massachusetts; 2 from New York; 1 from Philadelphia; and the rest from Savannah, Georgetown, &c.

A letter from New York, published in the Balti-

* Mr. Bibb stated in the senate, a few days ago, that one of the departments of the government had already obtained possession of a contract for furnishing the enemy with an amount of specie equal probably to that now in the country, entered into by a certain individual or individuals and an agent or agents of the British government.

The effect that this, or similar contracts, have already had, has done more injury to the United States, than the "Great Lord," with all the army he had in Spain, could have done.

more Federal Gazette, of Monday last, says—"We are surprised to find government fitting out small craft and letting the President, Hornet and Peacock remain rotting in port. The new secretary of the navy I hope will order things better."

Now, the very day that this was written the "rotting" frigate went to sea, accompanied by several small armed vessels.

A Spanish schooner lately sailed from Newport, with a cargo of corn and live stock on deck!

The British frigate Psyche, to carry 56 guns, was launched at Kingston, on the 25th ult. This vessel came out in frame from England last summer. Great activity in building also exists at Sackett's Harbor, with a view to a command of the lake next summer.

There is no truth in the report of the affair between the Constitution and Maidstone.

TREASURY NOTES, says a Richmond paper of Jan. 10, are rising fast in our market. They were sold yesterday, not merely at their nominal value, but with the interest added.

PEACE RUMORS. The commander of the British government schooner Dominica, with despatches for admiral Hotham, of the Spencer 74, reported that a packet had arrived from Halifax; that the mails were not opened when he sailed—but he said, "we expect peace with America immediately."

A letter from Canandaigua, (N. Y.) to a gentleman in Albany, dated January 3, says—"We have no news here, except that some British deserters have come in, and swear that before they decamped, a proclamation or general order was read to the troops, stating, that preliminaries of peace had been signed by the American and British plenipotentiaries."

FOREIGN NEWS. By the arrival of a "flyer," from Lisbon with a rich cargo at Philadelphia, we have London dates of November 15—but the papers do not appear to mention any thing of importance, as to peace or war. The following remarks from the Morning Chronicle, on the president's message at the meeting of congress, has some interest—

"The message of the president will be read with serious attention. The free and confident language with which he speaks of the barbarous system of warfare which we are waging against defenceless towns, and buildings proper only for civil purposes, proves the state of public feeling in America to be strongly and generally roused against us. When we look back to the high rank in point of martial character which we held in April last, by the glorious achievement of our army in the peninsula, and when, by a sort of miracle, our perseverance in the contest with Bonaparte, against the judgment of the allied sovereigns, was crowned with success, we feel mortified and degraded, on viewing the station which we now hold in the eyes of Europe. The conduct of our government in the little miserable war with the United States, has tarnished the glory we obtained. The Lilliputian navy and the raw militia of America, have triumphed over our feeble, ill-advised and ill-directed efforts. On the ocean, and even on our own coasts, we have been insulted with impunity, through the total ignorance of our marine department; and on the American shores, the impolitic and unjustifiable devastation committed, on houses, which were truly regarded as monuments of the arts, has united all parties against us in the states, and has roused the indignation of the enlightened and civilized part of Europe. What advantage to the real objects of the war could we propose to ourselves by this petty depredation? If it were even true that the Americans set the first example of violence and plunder, is it honorable in a great nation to act from the principle of revenge?

"But the most lamentable, and the weakest part of the conduct of ministers is, that having set up pretensions to a new boundary, which was sure to inflame the hostility of the Americans, and to draw forth all their resources against us, we made inadequate exertions to enforce the claims we set up, but suffered the whole year to pass over with petty expeditions, and with reinforcements sent in dribbles, while all remonstrances from our friends in Canada were disregarded, our brave troops left in helpless inferiority, with an impotent indecisive commander, and the very possessions that we hold endangered by the protraction of the contest.

"These things, we trust, will come next week with becoming force from the mouths of our representatives, and will be the subject of a strict enquiry into the conduct of the ministers."

The London papers—the public prints of the "world's metropolis"—the enlightened "glorious London"—have been stuffed for several months past, with column after column, respecting an old hag, or fool, called Johanna Southcott—that was about to bring forth the real Messiah, by a "miraculous visitation!" "The time has gone by" when the creature was to have been delivered; but in an address of some length, she advises the "believers in her visitation" to hold fast to their faith, for the thing may yet happen! Our readers will hardly believe that this miserable wretch has been almost worshipped by thousands of the British populace, and that grave and reverend gentlemen have so far attended to the affair as to make solemn reports as to the pregnancy, or probable pregnancy of the beldam.

TENNESSEE.—It is impossible to render due credit to the people of Tennessee, for the promptitude with which they have marched on all occasions to meet the enemy. Only think of it—one-third of the whole militia of the state, at one time, under arms—not to defend the spot they reside on, but ready to go any where to avenge the injured republic, and meet and punish the barbarian foe! It appears an established fact, that during the late heavy requisitions almost as many offered themselves as substitutes as the whole number called for. A youth to whom a man applied for his place, in reply stated that he "would not take twenty-five dollars for it!" Aye, and these Tennesseans are men that will fight. Had the same spirit universally prevailed, the British territories on this continent would long since have been confined to the frozen regions about Baffin's bay. The east may be a place of wisdom, but patriotic strength is in the west.

ANTI-TRAITORS. The selectmen of Poultney, (Vt.) have advertised a meeting, and an enrolment of volunteers is to be made in that town, to meet the sleighs our traitors furnish, if the enemy dare to engage in a winter invasion, and to Macomb or Burgoyne them, before they reach Whitehall.

May Heaven favor the design and inspire our towns, extensively to follow the laudable example of Poultney.

AMELIA.—On the 29th ult. there arrived at Amelia a French ship from Nantz with a cargo of wine, a Swedish ship from Bristol, Eng. with a cargo of sundries, and a Russian ship from Liverpool with a cargo of salt.

POSTSCRIPT.

From the proceedings of the senate on Thursday it appears probable that the alterations of the Bank bill as made by the house of representatives, will be agreed to.

PROPOSITION THE SECOND. The "friends of commerce" and of "peace," as aforesaid, under the malignity of Great Britain, are the cause of the continuance of the war.

PROPOSITION THE SECOND.

Having, in my opinion, fully established the first proposition, I shall proceed to a brief consideration of the second.

It is universally known that the causes for which we declared war are no obstruction to peace. The practice of blockade and of impressment having ceased by the general pacification of Europe, our government is content to leave the principle as it was—referring its settlement to some future arrangement, or the common opinion of the civilized world—or, in reserving the right again to resist both, or either, if repeated, hereafter. Great Britain may pretend to what she pleases. The papal title of her king, "Defender of the [Roman Catholic] faith," affects not the catholics one way or another; though it does not seem becoming that his own priests should "pray lustily" for the downfall of that faith which he proudly announces himself to be the "defender" of; and the king may, if he pleases, with a gun boat stationed in the Luke of the Woods, declare he has a right to blockade all the "coasts, rivers, harbors, outlets and inlets" of the Atlantic, Pacific and Indian Oceans, and to impress all of us, men, women and children, on land or on water, provided only he keeps his "hands off," abstaining from the practice. We will not quarrel for words: But never can we acknowledge those things as his "right." His pretensions will stand for just as much as they are worth, and time will ascertain their boundaries and fix their landmarks. Nevertheless, I take it for granted, that there is not one man in the United States, that affects the character of an American, who is prepared, boldly and above-board, to admit that the practice of Great Britain, in respect to those things, is legal, and should be submitted to. The "illustrious assembly" lately in "grand divan" at Hartford, would have unanimously resisted such an admission. The first goes to the full and complete regulation of all the foreign trade of the United States; and the latter to an extinction of the means of carrying on that part of it G. B. might feel it her interest to leave us, besides making us absolute slaves. It is true, the orders in council have been withdrawn; but with a proviso to renew them at discretion.

Having, as before observed, and for the reasons stated, proffered peace on the terms that we stood upon before the war was declared, we have no further business in hostility than such as is PURELY DEFENSIVE; while that of Great Britain is to humble or subdue us. The war, on our part, has become a contest for life, liberty and property—on the part of our enemy, of revenge or ambition. No matter for what cause it was waged—such is the principle of its duration; and one might have thought that such a tale of things would have united the whole people to repulse the enemy. But alas! it certainly appears that the more outrageous he is, the more impudent are the jacobins to distract the measures of government and enkindle the spirit of party. A bold faced pensioner some time ago said, that "peace, with out a change of rulers, would be a curse;" and it appears probable that this may be a rule of action to the jacobins—who, to use the strong language of a friend, "would rather send themselves and their country to the infernal regions, where they would have a chance of promotion, than remain here in peace, without power." And, indeed, upon a careful investigation of the nature of the war, as it now stands, I cannot discover any other principle by which they work. They tell us, they want peace and commerce. So do we all. Let them tell us what we shall offer to Great Britain to get these blessings! I defy the most impudent of them, ("the gentleman who wrote the Analysis," excepted—famous in Henry's disclosures) to say he would go further than our government has gone in the work of conciliation. When I hear a man clamor for peace, ardently desired by all—I ask him, how he would proceed to obtain it—what he would do that our ministers at Ghent are not authorized to do? I have put these questions to several, and never got an answer but once; when the jacobin said, he would get it by changing the president. I put to him the little monosyllable "How?" and he was silent. But this is a favorite idea with G. Britain; and it is not wonderful that her partisans here have sometimes the baseness to think of sacrificing the right of suffrage to satisfy her demands. The fact is, that our form of government is offensive, and they would wish it changed. The very men that would depose Mr. Madison, as the price of peace, are the people that, of all others, abused those of the Spaniards as traitors to God and their country, who sided with Joseph Bonaparte; put on the throne to secure peace between France and Spain. I am not, perhaps, the most ardent admirer of Mr. Madison—I have thought that other men might be found better fitted for the times in which we live, (though I know that many of the faults attributed to him, justly belong to congress; whose half-way measures at the last, and disgraceful waste of time in the present session, had nearly brought the country to ruin.)—Yet were he to me the most offensive of beings, I would not sacrifice the freedom of choice in the people, or violate the provisions of the constitution, to "depose him," (as the "legitimate" phrase is)—and, though I might vote against him myself, I can hardly conceive any danger that I would not encounter to support him in his legal authority, against the dictation, or power of a foreign nation. Infamous, indeed, must he be, that would suffer insolent foreigners to settle domestic political differences.

The war then, on our part, is entirely defensive—and the enemy wages it with a degree of barbarity unknown to the history of modern times. He allies himself with the savages—he allies himself with negro slaves—he would desolate the frontiers with the tomahawk, and give up the interior to all the horrors that exterminated the white population of St. Domingo. He avows his object, to "destroy all places assailable," and has performed the part of a Goth, a perfect finished Goth, at many. He despises the rules and practices of a civilized nation, and brings us back to the usages of Zangis Khan and Autia. What then are we to do? Are we to encourage him by divisions among ourselves—to hold out the hope of a separation of the states and a civil war—to refuse to bring forth the resources of the country against him—to make a sort of indirect bargain with him that he may do what he pleases with certain parts of the United States, provided he shall not touch other parts? I did think that in a defensive war—a struggle for all that is valuable—that all parties would have united. But it is not so—every measure calculated to replenish the treasury or raise men, is opposed, as though it were determined to strike the “star spangled banner” and exalt the bloody cross. Look at the votes and proceedings of congress—and mark the late spirit (now, perhaps, “slaid” for a time) that existed in Massachusetts, and see with what unity of action every thing has been done to harrass and embarrass the government. Our loans have failed; and our soldiers have wanted their pay, because those who had the greater part of the monied capital covenanted with each other to refuse its aid to the country. They had a right, equally, to do this; and perhaps, also, by all the artifices of trade or power that that money gave them, to oppress others not of their “stamp” and depress the national credit—but history will shock posterity by detailing the lengths to which they went to bankrupt the republic; really more able to pay its debts than any nation in Christendom, as they very well know.

With a perfect knowledge of these transactions, how could Great Britain be better encouraged to persevere in the war, to “cripple us for fifty years,” as ruffian Cockburn declared she intended? Divide et impera is the everlasting principle of arbitrary power: Look at Britain’s conduct in the East-Indies. What is the fate of those mad native princes that leagued with her against other native powers? All are swallowed up in one common vassalage! The English have tanked of the inordinate ambition of Napoleon Bonaparte—Villainous hypocrites!—all that Bonaparte attempted in Europe was but a type of what they themselves had done in Asia, where they boast of from sixty to eighty millions of slaves. What the “detestable Napoleon” did was angelic, compared with their deeds in India—his most finished crimes stood forth as virtues, when contrasted with the stupendous ruin of that country and its people.—Bonaparte paid reverence to Mahomet in Egypt—but Great Britain derives a revenue from HUMAN SACRIFICES offered to an idol called Juggernaut! Such are the monsters that set themselves up as the preservers of the religion, the liberty and the morals of the world!—Reader, these are solemn and serious truths; and no man will dare to deny them.

“In union there is strength,” and were our people united the war would immediately end; or, be prosecuted with different success.

If the negotiations at Ghent shall not have very considerably advanced before the news of the “Hartford convention” reaches the cabinet of London, I am clearly of opinion, that they will be suspended, or snuffed off, until the proceedings are known; for nothing is more evident than that the war is prosecuted for REVENGE or AMBITION; and what, under heaven, is so well calculated to aid it, as the ideas that were held out as to the objects of that assembly—“to withhold the resources of the N. E. States and make a separate peace?” It is indubitable that she regards us with envy and hate. Our manufactures and commerce, the glory of our little navy and the steady valor of our army, excite horrid sensations in her bosom. She beholds, in easy perspective, the wool such snatched from beneath her lord high chancellor, and the trident grasped from the hand of her seaman. “WESTWARD the course of empire takes its way,” and she is quite as jealous of the prosperity of the United States, as the “new Englander,” are of the progressive population and rich products of the states beyond the mountains; and the old and new England jacobins appear perfectly to agree in this—that a man should not consult his own happiness, or interest, as to the place of his location!

While this convention was getting up, and every thing appeared so full of fight — THE SOIL OF MASSACHUSETTS WAS UNRESISTINGLY TRODDEN BY A FOREIGN ENEMY.

To conclude—why does the war continue? It is not the fault of our government—we demand no extravagant thing. I answer the question, and say—it lasts because Great Britain depends on the exertions of her “party” in this country to destroy our resources, and compel “unconditional submission.”

Thus the war began, and is continued, by our divisions.

Cotton Spinning.

[COMMUNICATED.]

It is a great and, at this moment, an interesting question to the United States—and particularly to those engaged in the manufacture of cotton—can the manufacture of cotton be carried on in the United States when peace shall take place?—The following observations having a bearing on this question, are collected principally from “Emporium of arts and sciences,” no. 2. vol. 4.

In the years 1809 and 10 Great Britain imported 981,397 bags—the average of these two years is 490,698 bags.

In another page of that work the imports for 1809 are stated in pounds at 98,436,810.

Taking this last mentioned sum, we find by the same work that 41,477,520 lbs. of cotton were received from “N. America” (United States, it is presumed) which is only 6,357,865 pounds short of the half of the whole quantity imported in that year; and as the imports from the United States were 88,126 bags more in 1810 than in 1809, we may readily suppose that in time of peace Great Britain received one half her supply of cotton-wool from hence—the remainder was made up by less than one fourth of the whole quantity from British possessions, the remaining one fourth was foreign.

From 1781 to 1788, the averaged price of cotton-wool in Great Britain is stated at	2 2 5-8
From 1788 to 1796 the average price was	1 6
The average to 1801, rose to	2 7 1-2
to 1807 it declined and the average was	2
Of 1808 and 9 no average could be made on account of the fluctuation.
Of 1810 the average as near as could be calculated was about	1 10

Making the average for 22 years, 45 cents per lb. From 1781 to 1788, it appears that the British government levied no duties on cotton-wool—but from that time to 1810 the duties and charges continued to increase, so that, in that year, the mercantile charges are stated at 5d. 1-2 per lb. and the duties at 2d. making 7d. 1-2 sterling or 12 1-2 cents per lb. and reducing the averaged price as above stated to 32 1-2 cts per lb. nett to the grower of cotton, (supposing exchange at par, or taking the averaged sales from 1807 to 10) 30 1-2 cents per lb. On an average of 3 years, previous to 1808, the British plantation charges on raising one pound of cotton and getting it ready for market, were calculated at 7d. 1-2 per lb. sterling, but since that time (owing in part to the "American decrees") the plantation charges are admitted as a "broad and uncontrovertible fact" to have advanced 50 per cent. making the expence of raising and preparing 1 lb. of cotton, in the British West Indies, d 10 1-2 sterling on 18 cents—leaving to the planters there 12 1-2 cents nett for their labor. Since 1808 the price of provisions &c. in the West Indies must have experienced a further advance; but a peace with the United States may restore them to the average of 1805, 6, 7.

From what is above stated we find that the mercantile charges and duties on a pound of cotton, from the West Indies to England, is about 12 1-2 per lb. since that date an additional duty of about 1-2d. per lb. has been laid on American cotton, making something more than thirteen cents per pound—(the reader will recollect we are speaking of times anterior to the American declaration of war) and the averaged sales having been proved to be about 45 cents, would leave to the American planter 32 cents, including the expence of getting it to the port of shipment.

The work we have heretofore quoted, states the averaged product of an acre of land in the West Indies at 200 lb. nett of cotton wool—taking this as a rule for the American planter, 200 lb. wool, at 32 cents. per lb. is 64 dollars per acre; from which the charges of cultivation are to be taken, which we have no data to calculate.

From what we have said above, it appears that the charges on shipping one pound of cotton wool to Great Britain was about 13 cts. per lb. including duties on its arrival (before the war,) from which deduct the supposed cost of transportation from the cotton growing to our manufacturing states at 1 cent. per lb. gives the American manufacturer an advantage over the British manufacturer of 12 cents per lb. Supposing one pound of twist of an averaged number will now sell in the United States at 100 cts.

And that it will require 21 oz. for this quantity—the British manufacturer will pay for the cotton. 56

Shipping charges and duties on the twist the same as on the cotton imported, 13 1-2 cts. per lb. supposed 17 1-2

Duty on arrival in America 30 per cent. and admitting the twist invoiced at 60 cts. per pound (to avoid heavy duties) 18

91 1-2

Leaving for the British manufacturer per lb. 8 1-2

100

The American manufacturer pays for 21 ounces of cotton at 33 cents per lb. 44 cts.

Expence of transportation and sales 7 1-2 per cent. 7 1-2

Leaving for the American manufacturer 48 1-2

Or, 40 cents per lb. more than the British spinner.

Let us suppose further, 21 oz. cotton costs in Great Britain, as stated above 56 cts.

Shipping to the North of Europe the same as from the West Indies, and mercantile profit 5 1-2 per pound—for 1-3 lb. is 7 1-4d. duty 2 3-4d. is 10d. sterling, 18 74 cts.

To the American manufacturer one and one third pound cotton at 33 cents. 44 cts.
Shipping to the North of Europe say 8
Insurance 5 per cent. 4
Sales and remittance 7 1-2 per cent. 6

57

Difference per pound in favor of the American manufacturer 17

74

And further, supposing the one pound of twist sells in the North of Europe at 100

The American manufacturer has per lb. 43

The British manufacturer 26 cts

The above calculations are made on a supposition that there would be no greater difference in the price of cotton in England and America, than what would result from the charges and duties. But it is believed that heretofore this has not been the case; as the planter will prefer selling at a lower rate where payment is obtained more readily and the credit and risk less. If any difference of this kind will exist, it must be in favor of the American manufacturer. "Such is the state of the British cotton planter—that of his North American rival is much superior. Situate in the midst of the necessities of life, he depends on himself or his neighbors for support—he purchases his land at a cheaper rate" and has his "negroes at an inferior expence." This in the language of the British writer—it was not his business to speak of cotton spinning, or it is presumed he would have found the American manufacturer as enviously situated in comparison of the British manufacturer, as the American cotton planter in regard to his British rival.

Lexington, Kentucky.

This town, which promises to be the great inland city of the western world, is situated in the centre of an extensive plain of the richest land. It is the seat of a great commerce, and has many flourishing manufactures. The population is already between six and seven thousand souls. Its buildings are generally of handsome brick, neatly erected. The streets are paved with limestone and the footways with brick. The public buildings are an Episcopal church, a Presbyterian meeting-house, a Methodist meeting, two for the Seceders and one Roman chapel; also a court-house and theatre, all of brick. The market is as plentiful and good as any in the United States. There are two banks in the town. Mechanics of all descriptions receive nearly double the price for their labor that they get to the eastward, and the expence of living is not more than one half. They are greatly wanted to keep pace with the rapid improvement and increase of manufactories in the place. There are six steam mills in operation here—one on Evans's plan for manufacturing grain; one on the same for making paper; one on Watt and Bolton's for spinning cotton; one on the same for grinding grain; another for a large woolen manufactory—and a sixth, erected by a citizen of the town on a plan of his own, for various purposes. Cotton is to be had in any quantity at 6 or 7 cents above the New-Orleans price; and common wool is 50 cents, part blended Merino from 75 to 125, full-blooded Merino 130 to 200 cents per lb.; hemp is 80 dollars per ton flat, 15 dollars per hundred. There is a fine opening for a linen manufactory by steam. There are four cotton makers in the place, who do business extensively and employ many hands. The farms in the neighborhood are well cultivated, and the farmers are generally rich and opulent, and many of them have coaches and carriages, made at Lexington, that cost one thousand dollars. Nothing seems wanting but artists, of all classes, especially smiths, carpenters and joiners, brick makers and layers, painters and glaziers, cotton and wool machine makers, fullers and clothiers, upholsterers, &c. It is with delight we notice the great prosperity and rapidly rising importance of the future metropolis of the west; where town lots sell nearly as high as in Boston, New-York, Philadelphia or Baltimore, which shews that it is not a place in the wilderness, as some people suppose it to be!

Naval Establishment.

The following is the report which Mr. W. Reed, of Massachusetts, introducing into the house of representatives, the two bills for the appointment of a navy board, and for regulating navy contracts:—

The committee to whom was referred the resolution adopted by the house on the 18th of March last, directing an enquiry, whether any, and if any, what means of retrenchment and economy, and of reform in the general management, and of extension and efficacy, in the naval establishment, may be practicable and expedient, report:

That having considered the several important subjects referred to them, they do not deem it useful to exhibit to the house a detail of the various abuses which have prevailed in the naval establishment. Such a detail, though it might lead to the detection of individual delinquents, would not afford redress for former abuses, or prevent their repetition. For it was obvious to your committee, that these abuses were either sanctioned by the forms of law, or for the want of adequate provisions and penalties in the law must remain unpunished. After having examined and availed themselves of the labors of their predecessors, in their investigations, made under the directions of this house, and referred to this committee, they have concluded that it is unnecessary and unprofitable, further to extend the investigation, and that it would be more satisfactory to the house, and more promotive of the object of their appointment, to limit their efforts to "a reform in the general management of this establishment," under a full conviction that the experience of this war has already satisfied the most scrupulous, of the ability of this country to create and equip a naval force competent, not only to the defence of our extensive maritime frontier, but also for the great annoyance of a foreign enemy; and that such a force is now equally demanded by every section of our country, as indispensable for its security. The committee have likewise deemed it unnecessary to go into an argument, to show the propriety of bestowing upon this branch of our national force that measure of increase and support which its brilliant exploits on the ocean and on the lakes, and its efficiency in annoying the trade of the enemy, during this war, under all the abuses to which it has been exposed, have shown, should only be limited by our means.

The opinion that has existed from the first establishment of this department, and been declared successively by almost every secretary, that the duties incumbent on them were greater and more diversified than the most capable and laborious could discharge, with honor to himself, and justice to the nation, led the committee to an examination of the system, as now established, and the abuses that resulted from it. In prosecution of this examination, especially on that part which applies to the detail of service, they have principally relied on the information derived from the intelligent and experienced officers of the navy, whom they have always found ready and desirous of giving all the information in their power. By the information obtained from this and other sources, the committee are convinced that most, if not all the abuses complained of, are attributable to three distinct causes:

First. The excessive and laborious duties of the secretary:

Second. The want of sufficient checks upon, and the consequent irresponsibility of, subordinate agents:

Third. The great latitude allowed commanders, in altering, repairing and furnishing their ships.

It is presumed to be unnecessary to offer to the house any further evidence of this statement than is contained in the following extract from the report of the late secretary of the navy, made to the senate of the United States on the 15th of November last:

4th page. "But regulations however correct and adequate to the end, become nugatory, or worse, unless the authority and the means are co-extensive and competent to enforce the execution, or punish the violation thereof. This may account for the non-existence of many wholesome regulations in the civil administration of the navy of the United States, and for the imperfect execution of those which exist: breaches of the latter too frequently escape with impunity, from the impossibility of the head of the department taking cognizance of all the multifarious concerns of the establishment."

Great and obvious as the defects in this establishment are by all confessed to be, the committee have felt no little anxiety as to the best mode of correcting them. Desirous equally of avoiding the opposite errors, of rashly changing from one system to another, without an attempt to correct known abuses, or loading it with formal but inefficient appendages, which more frequently incumber than relieve or give energy to its operation; and concurring in the opinion expressed by the late secretary, in the report before referred to, that a board composed of intelligent and experienced officers, in aid of the executive of this department, would most effectually accomplish this object, and if properly organized, avoid the dangers from too great innovation on one hand, and inefficiency on the other, they directed a copy of his report to be forwarded to every captain in the navy of the United States, with the annexed circular marked A. From the answers thereto, which invariably approve the general design, it was thought unnecessary to publish more than those which contained particular observations upon the plan submitted. These are annexed, number 1 to 8.

From these materials, collected from intelligent and practical sources, the committee have endeavored to digest a plan, which they unanimously believe, if adopted, will immediately correct many of the abuses complained of, and lay the foundation of an improved system for the management of this department. They therefore beg leave to recommend the adoption of the two bills accompanying this report.

Treasury Report.

Treasury Department, Jan. 17, 1815.

SIR—I have deemed it hitherto my duty to wait, with deference and respect, for a decision upon the measures which I had the honor to suggest to the committee of ways and means on the 17th October last. But the rapid approach to the termination of the session of congress induces me again to trespass upon your attention, earlier, perhaps, than is consistent with a satisfactory view of the situation of the treasury, as some important plans are still under legislative discussion. I have now, however, the honor to submit to the consideration of the committee of ways and means the following additional statements and propositions:

STATEMENTS.

I. Statement of the situation of the treasury at the close of the year 1814.

1. The charges on the treasury for 1814.

It appears, that at the close of the year 1813, there was a general balance of the appropriations for that year, remaining unsatisfied, and subject to be called for at the treasury in the year 1814, amounting to about $8,131,313 03, and composed of the following items:

Of the appropriations for the civil department, about	$390,499 07
Of the appropriation for the military department	2,666,230 33
Of the appropriation for the naval department	3,611,240 75
Of the appropriation for the diplomatic department	253,846 62
Of the appropriation for miscellaneous services	1,209,496 26
	8,131,313 03

The annual appropriations for the year 1814, amounted to the sum of $8,003,691 28

The sum necessary to meet the engagements, in relation to the public debt, was about 11,560,586 39

The gross charge on the treasury for the year 1814, was 57,694,590 70

2. The ways and means of the treasury for 1814.

The gross charge upon the treasury for the year 1814, amounting to 57,694,590 70, included, as above stated, the balance of the appropriations of 1813, remaining unsatisfied, at the close of that year. It is, therefore, proper to place to the credit of the treasury, the outstanding revenue and resources, at the commencement of the year 1814, and these consisted of the following items:

Of cash in the treasury on the 1st of January, 1814	5,196,482
Of revenue received at the treasury in the 1st quarter of 1814	4,286,062 28
Of revenue received in the 2d quarter	2,822,108 05
Of revenue received in the 3d quarter	2,313,183 02
Of revenue received in the 4th quarter by estimate	1,920,000
	11,311,353 53
Of the proceeds of loans contracted for in 1813, and paid in 1814	3,592,665
Of the proceeds of treasury notes issued under the act of 1813, and received in 1814	1,070,000
	4,662,665

Of the amount of the loan authorised by the act of the 24th

March, 1814,	25,000,000
Of the amount of the loan authorised by the act of the 15th of Nov. 1814,	3,000,000
	28,000,000

Of the amount of treasury notes authorised to be issued by the act of the 4th of March, 1814,	5,000,000
Of the amount of treasury notes authorised to be issued by the act of December 26, 1814	3,000,000
	8,000,000

From this statement, therefore, it appears, that the charges on the treasury for 1814, amounted to	57,694,590 70
That the ways and means of the treasury for 1814, amounted to	57,170,500 53
	$524,090 17

And this excess of charges on the treasury amounting to 524,090 17-100 dollars, beyond the ways and means, actually appropriated, will be payable out of the revenue, uncollected on the 31st of December, 1814. But independent of the general view thus taken of the existing charges on the treasury, and of the ways and means designated by law, for the service of 1814, it is necessary to present a statement of the actual receipts and disbursements for that year.

The actual receipts at the treasury, during the year 1814, amounted to the sum of $40,007,661 53, and consisted of the following items:

The cash in the treasury on the 1st of January, 1814, amounted, as above stated, to	$5,196,482
The revenue received at the treasury, during the year 1814, amounted, as above stated, to	11,311,353 53
The cash received at the treasury, in the year 1814, on account of the loans and issues of treasury notes authorized in 1813, amounted, as above stated, to	4,662,665
The cash received at the treasury on account of the loans authorized in 1814, amounted, in the second quarter, to	6,087,011
In the third quarter, to	2,815,060
In the fourth quarter, by estimate, to	2,707,810
	11,609,881

The cash received at the treasury on account of the issues of treasury notes, authorized in 1814, amounted, in the 2d quarter, to	1,392,100
In the third quarter, to	1,603,900
In the fourth quarter, to	4,231,280
	7,227,280

40,007,661 53

The actual disbursements at the treasury, during 1814, (taking a part of the fourth quarter by estimate) amounted to the sum of $38,273,619 28, and consisted of the following payments:

For the civil department	133,327 97
For miscellaneous services,	1,207,492 30
For the diplomatic department;	206,306 52
For the military department,	20,510,238
For the naval department,	7,312,899 90
For the public debt,	8,103,354 59
	38,273,619 28

The estimated balance of cash in the treasury, on the 31st of December, 1814, being 1,734,042 25

To these views, however, 1st, of the general charges on the treasury, and of the ways and means designated by law for the service of 1814; and 2nd, of the actual receipts and disbursements, at the treasury, during that year, it is proper to add a statement of the result, showing the condition of the treasury at the end of 1814, in relation to the unsatisfied demands, and to the unexpended ways and means.

The unsatisfied demands on the treasury at the close of 1814, amounted to $19,420,971 42, and consisted of the balances of appropriations for the following objects:

For the civil department,	519,967 11
For miscellaneous services,	1,285,682 36
For the diplomatic department,	230,940 10
For the military department,	9,438,898 33
For the naval department,	4,468,251 72
For the public debt	3,457,231 80
	19,420,971 42

The unexpended amount of the ways and means provided for 1814, was $23,396,881 25, and consisted of the following items:

Cash in the treasury on the 1st of January, 1814, estimated at	1,734,042 25
Revenue uncollected and outstanding, estimated at	4,500,000
Authority to borrow money and to issue treasury notes, not executed, or not yet productive, under acts of the 4th and 24th of March, 1814	8,162,839
Stock sent to Europe	3,000,000
Under act of November 15, 1814,	3,000,000
Under act of Dec. 26, 1814,	3,000,000
	23,396,881 25

The surplus of ways and means, in reference to the service of 1814, including revenue and the unex-

cutted authority to borrow, and to issue treasury notes, is, therefore, 3,975,909 83

The conclusion from this statement of the situation of the treasury at the close of 1814, under the different views which have been presented, would seem to establish, that the ways and means provided for the service of that year were considerably more than the demands on the treasury would require. But it must always be recollected that the demands are positive and urgent; while a great portion of the ways and means rests upon a precarious foundation. Thus:

The unsatisfied demands on the treasury for the service of 1814, positive and urgent in their nature, amount to	19,420,971 42
The cash in the treasury and the outstanding revenue, only amount to	6,234,042 25
	13,186,929 17

And, consequently, the payment of the difference, amounting to $13,186,929 17, for the service of 1814, must depend on the success of raising money by loan, or by issues of treasury notes, under the unexecuted authority constituting the remaining ways and means designated for the same year.

II. Statement of the situation of the treasury for the year 1815.

1. The charges upon the treasury for the year 1815, as already ascertained.

The estimates for the annual appropriations amount to $40,538,889 39, consisting of the following items:

For civil, diplomatic and miscellaneous expenses	1,979,289 39
For the military department	30,342,238
For the naval department	8,217,362
	40,538,889 39

The public debt will call for a sum of $15,493,145 30, to answer the following claims:

For interest and reimbursements of stocks existing before the war	3,452,775 46
For interest on the funded debt created since the war	2,922,816 72
For the interest on loans to be effected in 1815, by estimate	1,500,000
For the principal and interest of treasury notes falling due in 1815, and on the 1st of January 1816	7,617,553 12
	56,032,034 69

From this view it appears, that ways and means must now be provided for an expenditure of $56,032,044 69, in the year 1815, independent of such additions as may arise from the contemplated establishment of a sinking fund, in relation to the public debt created since the war, and from any other new object of expence, which shall be authorized during the present year.

2. The ways and means of the treasury for 1815.

The outstanding and uncollected revenue, at the commencement of 1815, has been considered as applicable to the payment of the unsatisfied balances the appropriations for the preceding year; and, consequently, only such parts of the revenue, as shall accrue, and be actually received at the treasury, during 1815, can be embraced in the resources for the current service. But it also follows, from this view of the subject, that the treasury is entitled to be credited in 1815, for the excess, in the provision of ways and means, to meet the expenditure of 1814.

This excess, consisting of cash, of outstanding revenue, and of an authority to borrow, or to issue treasury notes, amounts, as above stated, to the sum of

The nett sum receivable into the treasury, in the year 1815, for the duties on goods imported during that year, cannot be safely estimated at a greater sum than

1,000,000

The direct tax will probably give to the treasury during the year 1815, a sum of

2,000,000

The internal duties, old and new, and postage, on an estimate which is stated in the schedule A. will probably produce, in the year 1815, a sum of

7,050,000

The sales of public lands will produce, in the year 1815, a sum of 1,000,000

The amount of incidental receipts, from miscellaneous sources will probably be 100,000

$15,125,999 83

But it appears, that the single item of public debt will require in the year 1815, a sum of 15,493,145 30

And that the revenue (independent of the excess of the authority to borrow, &c. brought from the last year's ways and means) will only be

11,150,000

Leaving a deficiency, in that respect alone, of 4,343,145 30

In a more general view, however, it is to be stated—that the charges upon treasury for the year, 1815, amount to the sum of

56,032,034 69

That the existing sources of supply amount only to 15,125,999 83

And that ways and means must be provided to raise the deficit of

It will be readily seen, that the estimates of the product of the direct tax, and of the new internal duties, are applicable only to the present year; and that in every succeeding year, the amount will be greatly augmented.

It must also be repeated, that in the statements now presented, no provision is inserted for the contemplated sinking fund; nor for the payment of a considerable amount of unliquidated claims upon the government for services and supplies; as these objects seem to require a distinct consideration.

PROPOSITION.

I. It is respectfully proposed, that provision be made to raise a sum of 40,906,124 dollars and 86 cents, in addition to the amount of the existing revenue, for the service of the year 1815, partly by taxes, partly by an issue of treasury notes, and partly by an authority to procure the money upon loan.

II. It is respectfully proposed, that an additional sum to be raised by taxes, to the amount of 5,000,000 dollars; and that the following objects, or a selection from these objects of taxation, graduated in the amount to produce that sum, to be made equally productive, shall form the basis of the additional levy:

1. A tax upon inheritances and devises, to be paid by the heirs or devisees, may be made to produce 900,000
2. A tax upon bequests, legacies and statutory distributions, to be paid by the legatees or legal representatives, may be made to produce 500,000
3. An auxiliary tax upon all testamentary instruments and letters of administration, to be paid by the executors or administrators, may be made to produce 200,000
4. A tax upon the legal process and proceedings in the courts of the U. States, to be paid by the parties at the time of taking out the process, or entering the proceedings, may be made to produce 250,000
5. A tax upon conveyances, mortgages and leases, to be paid by the grantees, mortgagees and lessees, may be made to produce 300,000
6. A stamp tax upon bonds, penal bills, warrants of attorney, notarial instruments, policies of insurance, all negotiable notes, protests of bills of exchange and promissory notes, bills of sale, and hypothecations of vessels, bottomry and respondentia bonds, may be made to produce 400,000
7. A tax of one dollar upon every barrel of wheaten flour, to be paid by the miller, may be made to produce 3,500,000
8. A tax upon the dividends (other than the dividends of banks) and upon the sale and transfer of the stocks of banks, insurance companies, and other corporations, operating for profit, upon a money capital, may be made to produce 600,000
9. An income tax, may easily be made to produce 3,000,000

III. It is respectfully proposed, that the additional sum to be raised, by the specified taxes, shall be appropriated as follows:

1. Towards establishing a sinking fund, in relation to the public debt, created since the war,
2. Towards the payment of principal and interest of the treasury notes, to be issued in the manner hereafter suggested,
3. Towards defraying the expenses of the present year,

IV. It is respectfully proposed, that there shall be an emission of treasury notes, for the service of the year 1815, to the amount of fifteen millions of dollars, on the following plan:

1. The denominations of the notes shall be such as the secretary of the treasury with the approbation of the president may direct.

2. The notes of the denomination of 100 dollars and upwards, shall be made payable to order, and shall bear an interest of five and two-fifths per centum per annum.
 3. The notes of a denomination less than 100 dollars, and not less than 20 dollars, shall be payable to order, and bear an interest at the same rate, or shall be payable to bearer, and bear no interest; as the secretary of the treasury, with the approbation of the president of the United States, shall direct.
 4. The notes of denomination under 20 dollars, shall be made payable to the bearer, and shall be circulated without interest.
 5. The notes shall be issued, and be made payable at the treasury only; but any portion of them may be deposited with the loan officers of banks throughout the United States, for the purpose of being put into general circulation.
 6. The holders of the treasury notes, not bearing an interest, may, at any time, exchange them, in sums not less than 100 dollars, for certificate of public stock, bearing an interest of seven per cent. per annum, and irredeemable for 12 years, from the date of the certificates respectively.
 7. The notes shall be receivable in all payments of the United States; but, in such cases, they may be re-issued.
 8. The notes payable by an annual instalment, according to their dates, and in the manner to be notified by the treasury, to wit:

In 1816, the sum of (one-fifth)	3,000,000
In 1817, the sum of (one-fifth)	3,000,000
In 1818, the sum of (one-fifth)	3,000,000
In 1819, the sum of (one-fifth)	3,000,000
In 1820, the sum of (one-fifth)	3,000,000
 9. The reimbursement of the notes shall be effected, according to the instalments, either by the payment of the principal and interest to the holders; or by taking out of circulation, and destroying the amount of the instalment, in notes, which have been paid to the United States for duties, taxes, or other demands.
 10. There shall be an appropriation of such a portion of the taxes, above specified, as will be adequate to the payment of the successive instalments of the notes; and the faith of the United States should be pledged to make good any deficiency.
 11. There shall be no additional issue of treasury notes, upon a specific pledge of the same taxes, or of other competent taxes, to an amount equal to the reimbursement of the notes, according to the stipulated instalments.
- V. It is respectfully proposed, that authority should be given to the president, to borrow the sum of twenty-five millions of dollars on the faith of the United States.
1. The loan to be accepted on the most advantageous terms that can be obtained.
 2. The amount of the loan, for the payment and security of principal and interest, to be placed on the same footing as the rest of the funded debt created since the war.
- If the propositions submitted to the consideration of the committee of ways and means should be adopted, the treasury will be placed on the following footing for the year 1815:
1. The ascertained demands upon the treasury, amount to
 2. The existing sources of revenue and supply will produce	11,150,000

3. The excess of outstanding revenue, and of authority to borrow money and to issue treasury notes for the service of 1814, beyond the demand, is estimated at	3,975,909 83
4. The taxes now proposed are estimated to produce for 1815.	5,000,000
5. The issue of treasury notes for the service of 1815, will produce	15,000,000
6. The authority to raise money by loan, for the service of 1815, extends to	25,000,000
	60,125,909 83

Surplus of ways and means 4,093,875 14

The surplus of ways and means for the year 1815, will be applicable to the establishment of the contemplated sinking fund, and to the payment of any additional expenses that congress may authorize.

In making the present communication, I feel, sir, that I have performed my duty to the legislature of the country; but when I perceive that more than forty millions of dollars must be raised, for the service of the year 1815, by an appeal to public credit, through the medium of treasury notes and loans, I am not without sensations of extreme solicitude.—The unpromising state of the public credit, and the obstructed state of the circulating medium, are sufficiently known. A liberal imposition of taxes, during the session, ought to raise the public credit, were it not for counteracting causes; but it can have no effect in restoring a national circulating medium. It remains, therefore, with the wisdom of congress to decide, whether any other means can be applied to restore the public credit, to re-establish a national circulating medium, and to facilitate the necessary anticipations of the public revenue. The humble opinion of this department on the subject, has been respectfully, though frankly, expressed on former occasions; and it remains unchanged.

I have the honor to be, with great consideration, sir, your most obedient servant,

A. J. DALLAS.

J. W. Eppes, Esq. chairman of the committee of ways and means.

SCHEDULE A.

Treasury Department, Revenue Office, Dec. 6, 1814.

Sir—I have the honor, in compliance with your request, to submit the annexed estimates of the products of the existing internal duties, and of the additional duties proposed to be laid by the bills now before congress; the first statement exhibiting the products for an entire year after the respective duties shall be in full operation, and the last statement shewing the amounts that may be expected to be received from each duty during the year 1815. It may be proper to add that the materials do not exist for forming estimates, with regard to the new duties, on which a perfect reliance should be reposed.

I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

S. H. SMITH, commissioner of the revenue.

Honorable secretary of the Treasury.

Events of the War.

MISCELLANEOUS.

NEW-ORLEANS.—We are yet without definite intelligence from New-Orleans. The news will probably arrive this day, that will, at least, relieve our suspense. The latest date we have is of the 24th December, at six o'clock, A. M. The several official articles that have reached us are inserted below—and we have the following intelligence from several private letters.

The Tennessee and Kentucky troops, that were instantly expected, by our last accounts, had arrived on the 22d or on the morning of the 23d. The enemy, without being discovered, effected a landing (about 3,000 strong) on general Viller's plantation, by a bayou or creek, from lake Borgne, about eight miles from the city, on the evening of the 23d.—General Jackson immediately hastened to meet them and a severe skirmish ensued, which lasted from about half past seven until after nine o'clock at night. What our loss, or that of the enemy, or what the amount of the forces engaged on either side was, we are not informed—the result, however, seems clearly this, that the enemy was driven back—and that fifty of his men and two majors were brought to the city as prisoners. After which it seems that general Jackson had taken an advantageous position, nearer the city, where he was throwing up entrenchments, &c. A decisive battle was universally expected the next morning—the morning of the 24th—and though we cannot say that we fear, we have, nevertheless, a trembling anxiety for the result.

One letter says that Jackson engaged them with only about 2000 men—he had about 9000 then under his command—it also says that the British had not been able to land their artillery, and expresses an idea that the whole of them would be made prisoners that day—that is, December 24.

The whole British force is variously stated by the prisoners, at from 7 to 15,000 men—the probable number is 6000, commanded by major-general Keane.

Such is the substance of our intelligence. We think New-Orleans is safe, and anticipate the details of a glorious victory—if it has fallen, it has been dearly purchased.

MILITIA GENERAL ORDERS.

New Orleans, December 14.

The enemy is in force in the vicinity of the state, and his movements indicate a disposition to attack this capital. The governor and commander in chief therefore directs that the militia within the city and the Faubourgs and the settlements on Gentilly and the Bayou St. John, be called out (by the respective commanding officers of regiments and corps,) armed, accoutred, and to be drilled by companies twice in each day for one hour at each time.—Officers commanding regiments and corps will designate the ground, and the hour for drill.—The field officers of each corps are to superintend the drill, and inspect minutely the state of the arms and ammunition.

The whole of the militia must be held in readiness to march, and meet the enemy at a moment's warning, as well by day as by night.

The men should not incur themselves with too much baggage. On a march, a spare shirt and a pair of shoes with a good blanket in their knapsack, will be quite sufficient.

The several companies of ancients will on this occasion set an honorable example, nor will the fathers of families composing the companies, be wanting in zeal.

Until further orders the uniform companies will form a battalion under the immediate command of capt. Planche.

The drill and exercise to commence on to-morrow the 15th inst.

WM. C. C. CLAIBORNE,

Governor and commander in chief.

On Sunday the 18th Dec. general Jackson reviewed the militia of the city, the battalion commanded by major Planche, and a part of the regiment of men of color. Being drawn up on their respective parades, the following addresses were read to them by Mr. Livingston, one of his aids,

TO THE EMBODIED MILITIA.

Fellow citizens and soldiers!

The general commanding in chief would not do justice to the noble ardor that has animated you in the hour of danger, he would not do justice to his own feelings, if he suffered the example you have shewn to pass without public notice. Inhabitants of an opulent and commercial town, you have by a spontaneous effort shaken off the habits which are created by wealth, and shewn that you are resolved to deserve the blessings of fortune of bravely defending them. Long strangers to the perils of war, you have embodied yourselves to face them with the cool countenance of veterans—and with motives of disunion that might operate on weak minds, you have forgotten the difference of language and the prejudices of national pride, and united with a cordiality that does honor to your understandings as well as to your patriotism. Natives of the United States! They are the oppressors of your infant political existence, with whom you are to contend—they are the men your fathers conquered whom you are to oppose. Descendants of Frenchmen! natives of France!

they are English, the hereditary, the eternal enemies of your ancient country, the invaders of that you have adopted, who are your foes. Spaniards! remember the conduct of your allies at St. Sebastian, and recently at Pensacola, and rejoice that you have an opportunity of avenging the brutal injuries inflicted by men who dishonor the human race.

Fellow citizens, of every description! remember for what and against whom you contend. For all that can render life desirable—for a country blest with every gift of nature—for property, for life—for those dearer than either, your wives and children—and for liberty, without which country, life, property, are no longer worth possessing; as even the embraces of wives and children become a reproach to the wretch who could deprive them by his cowardice of those invaluable blessings. You are to contend for all this against an enemy whose continued effort is to deprive you of the least of these blessings—who avows a war of vengeance and desolation, carried on and marked by cruelty, lust, and horrors unknown to civilized nations.

Citizens of Louisiana! the general commanding in chief, rejoices to see the spirit that animates you, not only for your honor but for your safety, for whatever had been your conduct or wishes, his duty would have led, and will now lead him to confound the citizen unmindful of his rights with the enemy he ceases to oppose. Now, leading men who know their rights, who are determined to defend them, he salutes you, brave Louisianians, as brethren in arms, and has now a new motive to exert all his faculties which shall be strained to the utmost in your defence. Continue with the energy you have began, and he promises you not only safety, but victory over the insolent enemy who insulted you by an affected doubt of your attachment to the constitution of your country.

To the battalion of uniform companies.

When I first looked at you on the day of my arrival, I was satisfied with your appearance, and every day's inspection since has confirmed the opinion I then formed. Your numbers have increased with the increase of danger, and your ardor has augmented since it was known that your post would be one of peril and honor. This is the true love of country! You have added to it an exact discipline, and a skill in evolutions rarely attained by veterans; the state of your corps does equal honor to the skill of the officers and the attention of the men. With such defenders our country has nothing to fear. Every thing I have said to the body of militia, applies equally to you—you have made the same sacrifices—you have the same country to defend, the same motive for exertion—but I should have been unjust had I not noticed as it deserved the excellence of your discipline and the martial appearance of your corps.

TO THE MEN OF COLOR.

Soldiers—From the shores of Mobile I collected you to arms—I invited you to share in the perils and to divide the glory of your white countrymen. I expected much from you, for I was not uninformed of those qualities which must render you so formidable to an invading foe—I knew that you could endure hunger and thirst, and all the hardships of war—I knew that you loved the land of your nativity, and that, like ourselves, you had to defend all that is most dear to man—but you surpass my hopes. I have found in you, united to those qualities, that noble enthusiasm which impels to great deeds.

Soldiers—The president of the United States shall be informed of your conduct on the present occasion, and the voice of the representatives of the American nation shall applaud your valor, as your generals now praises your ardor. The enemy is near; his "sails cover the lakes;" but the brave are united; and if he finds us contending among ourselves, it will be for the prize of valor and fame its noblest reward.

By command

THOMAS L. BUTLER,

Aid-de-camp.

Copy of a letter from commodore Patterson to the secretary of the navy, dated

New Orleans, 19th December, 1814.

SIR—I have the honor to inform you, that since the date of my last letter, Dr. Marshall has arrived at this place, and made to me the within statement relative to the action between our gun vessels and the barges of the enemy, and their subsequent movements; since when no further intelligence has been received. By this statement it appears the enemy's force was infinitely superior to that reported by Mr. Johnson. The vessels stated by Dr. Marshall to be within the Passes of Cristian and Mary Ann, must have been built expressly for our shoal waters, and their having brought them within those shoals, indicates, I think, an intention to rely upon them and numerous flat barges, to attempt this city by forcing their way up the Bayou St. John. To guard against their so doing, on the evening of the 17th, I commenced erecting on the banks of the Bayou, two batteries to mount each 2 long 24 pounders, one of which, in despite of rain and other difficulties, is now, through the active exertions of my few remaining officers, ready for action—the other will be completed by tomorrow night, when I hope the enemy may attempt us by that route. These two batteries are independent of the fort St. John, at the mouth of the Bayou. Every exertion is also making to have fire-vessels ready for them in the event of an attack by way of the river. Their attack will, no doubt, be made simultaneously by the river Barataria and lake Pontchartrain. Captain Henley and lieutenant Norris have the superintendence of the batteries erecting at the Bayou St. John. Lieutenants Alexis and Thomson, acting lieutenants Crowley and Cunningham, and sailing-master Pollock, are indefatigable in their endeavors to expedite every measure which is found necessary at this time.

The flag sent to the enemy has not yet returned. I am happy to inform you, that the most determined spirit of resistance to the enemy is manifested by every class of citizens of this country; and I have no doubt that the enemy will be repulsed in any attack he may make upon us, with very great loss. The gallant resistance made by the few gun vessels appears to have roused the spirits of the people and animated them to the highest pitch.

I have the honor to be, with great consideration and respect, your obedient servant.

DANL. T. PATTERSON.

The hon. secretary of the navy, Washington.

Copy of a letter from acting surgeon Marshall to commodore Patterson, dated

New Orleans, 17th December, 1814.

SIR—I have the honor to inform you, that on Tuesday evening the 13th inst. at 10 o'clock, A. M. the enemy landed at Pass Christianne, with one hundred and six barges from the squadron off Ship Island. At 2 P. M. got under weigh and directed their course towards the United States' gun vessels, then laying at anchor off Bay St. Louis. They did not, however, come up with our squadron that night, which, in the mean time, retreated to the Malheraux Islands, where the wind and tide forced them to remain. Wednesday, the 14th inst. the weather being calm, at 10 o'clock, A. M. an engagement ensued, which continued about two hours, when the enemy closed and surrounded the gun vessels, in every direction, keeping up a constant fire from their great guns and musketry, and making frequent attempts to carry by boarding. In this situation our gallant officers and men, resolving never to give up their ships, fought with the most distinguished bravery for the incredible space of one hour against such an overwhelming force; when the action terminated in the capture of gun vessels No. 156, 162, 163 23, 5 and despatch boat Alligator, which were immediately carried to the eastward. I immediately proceeded, with Mr. Johnson, to the Petite Coquilles, where I received instructions to join the enemy and render such aid as their prisoners might require. On Friday morning I arrived at the Bay of St. Louis, and discovered that the British had succeeded, without difficulty, in getting one large ship, several brigs and schooners through Pass Mary-Ann, and others rapidly following them, amounting to at least fifty in number.—Having made this discovery, I deemed it prudent to dispense with my instructions in order to acquaint you with this circumstance. I accordingly employed a guard to convey me in the most expeditious route to New Orleans, (the direct communication being in possession of the enemy.) Friday evening I discovered ten schooners in the mouth of Pearl River, and five gun vessels at the east entrance of the Rigolets, under weigh and steering towards the Petite Coquilles.

I have no doubt the above vessels are constructed for those waters, and that in ten days the British will have from twenty to forty sail in Lake Ponchartrain.

I have the honor to be your obedient servant,

(Signed) GEORGE MARSHALL,
Acting surgeon.

Com. D. T. PATTERSON.

IN THE SOUTH the enemy has appeared in considerable force. He has taken possession of Cumberland island, (the next north of Amelia) with about 2,000 men. The naval forces are under the command of ruffian Cockburn, in the Albion 74. What their design is, is not yet "demonstrated"—they will probably, at least, ravage the islands, and possibly attempt the stealth of negroes, &c. from the plantations on the main. An attack on Savannah is apprehended, but their force seems hardly sufficient for such an enterprise. ☞ Since the above was written we have learned that the British have possession of Point Petre and St. Mary's.

MOBILE.—We have nothing additional to the notice in our last of a reported attack on fort Bowyer.

IN THE CHESAPEAKE the enemy has lately entrapped a few small craft, but done nothing important. This force is small at present.

BRITISH ATROCITY. From the Buffalo Gazette—We have never experienced such sensations of indignation, as were excited on learning that a few days after the battle of the Cataract, commonly and improperly called Bridgewater, and Lundy's Lane, the British lieutenant-general Drummond denying the rites of sepulture to our fallen heroes, caused them to be collected in heaps and burnt! This most atrocious act of the enemy, together with several others of a deeper die, have long been well known to the left division—these brave men disdained to vent their rage in words, but with their swords have taken vengeance on this monster in human shape—this imitator of Tamerlane and Khan. He may have hoped that the memory of his defeat and disgrace at the Cataract, would have perished with the bodies of the brave who fell in victory.—Vain, delusive hope! The thunders of the cataract shall cease, and records be extinct, before the memory of that glorious battle shall fade from the mind of man. The recital of it will furnish a splendid page in American history, and add another proof to the truths taught at Zama, Marathon and Platen, that slaves and hirelings must always yield to the brave and the free!

Did the American troops ever omit the honors of the grave to a fallen foe? No, never! After the repulse of the assault of the enemy on Fort Erie, the slain were interred with all the pomp and honors of war, and the party of troops engaged in this sacred duty were fired upon by the enemy, and many of them slain, notwithstanding he was repeatedly informed they were burying his dead. JUSTICE.

St. Inigo's November 28, 1814.

Messrs. Gales and Seaton.—I read in your paper, some time ago an account of a boat's crew having landed at St. Inigo, near the mouth of Potomac and committed various excesses, but particularly had taken away the sacred vessels, &c. consecrated to divine worship and the service of the altar. Those facts were true, and the individuals concerned, as well as the crimes perpetrated, required such excesses to be published; but as by the annexed letter we are assured that these excesses were unauthorized and that a public acknowledgement and reparation has been in part made, by a return of almost all the articles, justice, even to an enemy, requires that the said return and letter should be published. To the clergymen belonging to the chapel of St. Inigo's, and the other residents there, to whom this letter refers.

Gentlemen—An officer and boat's crew, belonging to his Britannic majesty's sloop *Saracen under my command, having landed at St. Inigo's on the 30th ult. and taken several articles of furniture, and other things from the houses and chapel there; and such proceedings being unauthorized by me, I have taken the earliest opportunity of causing restoration to be made of the property so taken; and now send one of my lieutenants with this letter, and the property above mentioned, to you under a flag of truce; hoping this instance of justice will efface every prejudicial sentiment towards the British from your minds, and that the injured parties will express their satisfaction at our present conduct in this matter.

I beg you to believe, gentlemen, it is matter of great regret to me, that the proceeding complained of should have been performed by those under my command; and, with sentiments of consideration, I am, gentlemen, your very obedient servant,

ALEXANDER DIXIE, Capt.

*His Britannic majesty's sloop Saracen,

BRITISH OFFICIALS. The London Morning Chronicle, speaking of naval affairs, says, "British official accounts in cases of capture or destruction [or defeat] have ceased to exist."

[I believe it is a fact, that British official accounts of the battle on Champlain, or of the capture of the Epervier, Reindeer, Avon, &c. or of the destruction of the Hermes, &c. &c. have never appeared. At least, I have never seen either of them. "The wooden walls of old England."]

TRADE. We have conversed with a gentleman from the district of Maine, who informs us, that trade at Castine is very brisk; that there is a great and constant influx and efflux of traders, to such an extent that the town is overflowing. The enemy have fortified Castine with 120 pieces of cannon, and cut a canal of eighteen feet, by which the town is insulated. They do not attempt to molest the people in the interior who have pretty generally refused to take the oath of allegiance. The goods purchased by the traders, are transported up the Penobscot, to a narrow place, where lies a neutral schooner, which is warped backwards and forwards, laden on the British, and unladen on the American side, when they are regularly entered at the custom house, and the duties paid. They are then shipped off in waggons, to Boston, and other places. Vessels are continually arriving from Halifax; and an accommodation stage is daily running between Halifax and Castine, a distance of 57 miles.

MORE TRADE.—Daniel Lambert turned smuggler! This mammoth gentleman of wax, who exhibited for the admiration of the curious in every part of the country, was lately met on his way from Canada by a custom-house officer, who remarking the rotundity of Daniel's corporation, had the curiosity to subject it to a critical inspection: when lo! instead of flesh and blood, or even straw, the entire fabric of this unwieldy gentleman was found to be composed of fine English cloths and kerseymeres!

ST. AUGUSTINE.—It is stated in a way that, we think, may be fully relied on, that colonel Woodbine was at St. Augustine early in December last, where he was actually raising a military force, enlisting all red, black and white persons that chose to come forward to the red cross of British humanity. On the 3d December he is said to have had between 4 and 500 men. Is this the neutrality of the Spaniards?

PRIZES.—A paragraph is running through the newspapers, respecting the value of the prizes captured from the enemy, which, from the manner of the publication, may be thought to have appeared in this work—and the editor feels it due to his own credit to disavow the extravagant calculation. He never made it, or said any thing on the matter.—

—The thing values such prizes at one hundred and thirty-three millions of dollars!!!

COL. MITCHELL, on a visit to Elkton, (Md.) his native village, was invited to and partook of a splendid public entertainment there on the 18th inst.—The company was very numerous and respectable. The colonel has since proceeded to his command on the Canada frontier.

TRAITEROUS INTERCOURSE.—From the New-York Columbian.—We hear from Plumb-Island, that a few days since, one of the mail-boats from the land of Steady Habits, in going alongside one of the ships of the squadron, upset, and the poor fellow in the boat came very near being drowned. He lost his mail, newspapers, letters, &c

One of the Beebes, at Oysterponds, some time since, was detained a prisoner on board for ten days or a fortnight. He said a mail from the shores of good old Connecticut was regularly delivered on board the squadron twice a week as punctually as it is at any of our post-offices.

They get the news from New-York on board the ships, via Connecticut, earlier than we receive it in the Long-Island mail.

QUEBEC.—The following from a Montreal paper of Jan. 7, may serve to give us some idea of the great trade that is carried on between Lower Canada and the United States. It is impossible that these goods could have been imported for the use of the Canadas:

"We have been favored by a friend with the amounts of the imports and exports at the port of Quebec, in 1814: and with the assistance of that friend, have ascertained their actual value of custom house entry. This is a subject upon which we dwell with no ordinary pleasure; because it illustrates the growing prosperity of the country, amidst the din of war and devastation, which to many may appear paradoxical. The import of wines at prime cost [this is the rule we go by] is 225,000*l.* currency; colonial produce, including brandies, gin, Irish spirits, and teas, nearly 925,000*l.* dry goods, all manufactured in the British isles, come to nothing short of 1,600,000*l.* The custom-house duty is charged at the manufacturers' price; to which we add 15 per cent. for all charges to Canada; and we believe we scarcely set down enough, so that the total value of the imports will be found to exceed 2,750,000 currency. In 1800 they were not a quarter of this amount! The exports cannot be counted beyond 430,000*l.* currency. Although the value in 1809—10 was of three times the extent, or thereby; yet this is no inclination of a declining prosperity. For two years the crops have been good in both provinces, and the prices of all necessities fetch double any former average, one article with another. To this may be accounted the great augmentation of internal consumption owing to the increase of the army and navy, and the various departments attached to them."

NEUTRAL RIGHTS.—Or another instance of British magnanimity in a neutral port. We yesterday noticed in our paper the arrival at Philadelphia of the schooner Ellen, from Lisbon, since which, we have been informed, that when the Ellen was ready to sail, she was detained, by order of the Portuguese government, 24 hours, in consequence of the sailing of a British vessel, in conformity to the laws of nations; which, they alleged, does not allow a vessel of one belligerent to sail within 24 hours after the vessel of another belligerent from a neutral port.—Afterwards, the captain of the Ellen requested of the Portuguese government not to allow any of the British ships of war, then in Lisbon, to leave port within 24 hours after his departure.

This request was assented to, and orders given to that effect—but, as soon as the Ellen got under way for sea, the British frigate Curacoa immediately weighed to follow her out. The fort, at Bellum, fired a blank cartridge at the frigate, of which she took no notice—afterwards, several shot were exchanged, and the frigate proceeded on. The fort below, viz. St. Julian, then fired, and the Curacoa thought proper to come to an anchor and give up the pursuit. The British officers while the Ellen lay in Lisbon, had viewed her with great attention, and declared that they meant to have her, as she would make an elegant tender for his majesty's navy. The conduct of the Portuguese, on this occasion, was very honorable and spirited. But the conduct of the British officer was, as it almost invariably has been, ever since the commencement of the war, base and infamous, and truly characteristic of the government. They seem totally regardless of every principle of honor, and the rights of every independent nation.

[Nat. Adv.]

The Democratic Press of Saturday last, contains a letter from the captain of the Ellen, to our consul at Lisbon, in which he states the particulars of the affair, and says that by the firing of the British upon the castle of Bellum, the commandant's life was endangered; and shews clearly that the design of the enemy was to capture the schooner in the Tagus, had they not been prevented by the fort, St. Julian, having placed boats for the purpose, &c. These "friends of religion, liberty and law," are the most finished pirates of the world, the gang late of La Fette, not excepted.

MR. LLOYD, of Massachusetts, has written a very long letter in reply to Mr. Randolph. We expect to give it a place in our next.

VERMONT. The people of gallant Vermont are emulating the example set them by the town of Poultney—(see page 336) and appear to be taking efficient measures to prevent traitorous intercourse with the enemy—in which they are ably seconded by major-generals Strong and Orms.

SACKETT'S HARBOR, guarded by Brown, with his veterans, is considered perfectly safe until spring—when it will be protected on the lake.

ST. LOUIS, (MISSOURI) December 3.

Colonel Russell, with the volunteers and rangers, came in on Monday last, from a tour into the indian country. We understand they proceeded north to the trace leading from Rock river to Boon's lick settlement. From thence towards Grand river, and returned by the upper settlements without being able to see an enemy.

Colonel Russell has favored us with the following report from captain Moore, who commanded the detachment of rangers that was attacked by the indians while employed in escorting beef cattle to fort Clark.

CAMP RUSSELL, Nov. 19th, 1814.

SIR—Agreeably to your command I left this place on the 10th inst. and proceeded on without much inconvenience, until a few miles beyond the old Kickapoo town, where we came upon a party of indians to the number of ten. They were discovered by major John Mudduck, who that day was behind in captain Short's detachment, and who had went out into a point of wood to spy, or make discoveries. On his information, the rear of the whole detachment got ahead and attacked the indians. We killed five of them* and took a squaw and a boy of about 3 years old prisoners, the two latter are here.

The information the squaw gave us was that we were surrounded by the indians, in considerable numbers, and the most of them Kickapoo; and her information seems to correspond with the discovery we made of many trails leading from the Wabash towards the mouth of Sangameux. As to herself, she said she and her party were Pottowatomies; but as proof of their hostility, they had with them a hoe that had been taken from Cox, who was killed on Shod Creek, and also they had their mouths full of balls; moreover they had with them a home-made blanket and a hat supposed was taken from a Miss Cox about one year ago. The total number of the men then under my command, including officers, non-commissioned officers and privates, was only seventy-six; this was far an inadequate force, and our situation was very precarious. I called all the officers together, and after a consultation it was an unanimous opinion to return immediately. This was thought to be more advisable and justifiable in consequence of getting one of our men wounded mortally, (who that night died) and also the charge of the cattle: being compelled that night after the attack, to travel through large prairies in the utmost darkness, and through an excessive rain and cold; we lost nineteen of the cattle, which we hunted for next morning until an hour by sun, when again it was an unanimous opinion, that it was not safe to tarry any longer, as more danger was then apprehended than before.

On the same night we discovered many fires around us, and in the morning the prairies were burnt in many places.

I am with much respect, your most obedient, humble servant,

JAMES B. MOORE.

Colonel Wm. Russell.

MILITARY.

There are upwards of 1500 British prisoners at Pittsfield, Mass.

Certain movements of the troops indicate a design to draw the chief part of the force from Buffalo—a part seems destined for Sacketts-Harbor and Plattsburg.

The legislature of Virginia has made choice of Robert B. Taylor and Armistead T. Mason, major-generals in the state corps which the state has determined to raise.

The brigadier generals are, John H. Cocke, Charles F. Mercer, David Campbell, John W. Green.

NAVAL.

The "rotting"* Peacock, captain Warrington, and "rotting"* Hornet, M. C. Biddle, with the schooner Tom Bowling, and several other vessels, went to sea from New-York, on Friday the 20th inst. Thus they go, without waiting for the "clemency" or "forbearance," as governor Gore says, of Great Britain, to "permit" them.

The ship carpenters at Sackett's Harbor are said to be competent to build two 74's and a frigate of the first class, and have them ready for the lake, by the time they will be wanted.

The Wasp. A brig is reported to have arrived at a southern port, that fell in with the U. S. sloop of war Wasp, off Turks Island, 35 days since—all well, but no particulars stated.

A small party of brave fellows went off from New London a few nights ago in a commissioned barge, and re captured a sloop with three men on board, though lying between the Majestic and a man of war brig, and brought her in safe.

On the death of Mr. Dolph, killed by the English in retaking two prizes from them last week, off Saybrook, the Connecticut Gazette remarks—"It is very extraordinary, that notwithstanding the numerous rencontres we have had with the enemy, he is the only person who has been killed in Connecticut, or on our coast since the war."

The British privateer Rover, lately was off the mouth of Connecticut river, and sent a barge to capture some craft; but a few of the people volunteered and manned a long boat—re-captured the vessels, and made the Englishmen prisoners. In the skirmish we had one man killed, and the lieutenant of the privateer was also slain.

Two small vessels, prizes to the British privateer

* Three men, a boy of about 13 or 14 years of age, and a squaw. The latter was killed without my knowledge.

Rover, have also been driven on shore, near Brook-Haven, (Long Island Sound)—three of the prize crews were drowned, and the survivors, six in number, gave themselves up prisoners. The vessels were got off by the inhabitants without much injury.

A sloop was recently seen off New London manoeuvring till dark, with a cargo of live stock—the next morning she was under the stern of the majestic razeel! What a pity that such villains are not exalted.

The kind of treatment received by American prisoners of war in England, may be gathered from the following extract of a letter from an American seaman, to his parents in Philadelphia:

"Dartmouth prison, (England) October 22d, 1814.

"In the beginning of the year one thousand eight hundred and one, I arrived in England from Philadelphia. Shortly after my arrival I was impressed on board his majesty's ship Princess, receiving ship for impressed seamen. I could not obtain my discharge on account of an order which was issued, to impress, notwithstanding their protections, a number of Americans! I was sent to Plymouth, and, after being detained there three months, was ordered on board the Nautilus sloop of war, about to sail as one of a convoy from Spithead for Gibraltar. During this time I, in vain, endeavored to procure my discharge.

"Soon after arriving at Gibraltar, we were stationed for a considerable time in the Mediterranean. After a series of hardships, and no scanty share of brutal treatment, which would neither afford you pleasure in perusing, nor me in penning, in the month of December, 1812, we received intelligence of war having been declared. The Americans on board of our ship immediately gave themselves up as prisoners of war. Being then in the Mediterranean, we were sent to prison in Malta, at which place the plague was then raging—in this prison we were kept till the 4th of May, 1814.

"During our confinement we suffered excessively for the common necessities of life—and every trick was tried to torture us into the horrid alternative of entering on board their ships. You may form some idea of our situation and feelings, when I inform you, that not less than eleven thousand of the inhabitants were hurried to their graves, starvation staring us in the face, and no prospect of release from a close, foul prison! All their attempts at our seduction proved fruitless.

"We were, however, finally sent to this prison. I need scarcely mention that I never received a penny of pay. The number of Americans here is supposed to be between 4 and 5000.

My best respects to my brothers—inform them of my present situation, and the treacherous, ungrateful treatment that I have and am now receiving from the infernal tyrants that now oppress me: after having faithfully, though reluctantly, served them for twelve years, without pay, prize-money, or pension—thrown into prison, and there doomed to spend the remainder of my life. Such is British gratitude! Such is the recompence they make to the defenders of their country! Such infamy must, at some period, meet with its deserts. Notwithstanding the love I bear my brothers, I would sooner hear of their falling by the sword of their enemy than remaining inactive spectators."

Dreadful shipwreck. The British sloop of war Sylph went on shore near the east end of Long Island, on the night of the 17th inst. and all her crew, 14 excepted, perished! One hundred dead bodies were counted on the beach. Another account says that only 6 persons were saved.

A fifty guinea sword has been subscribed by the school companions of lieut. Frederick Rolette, a Canadian born subject, and some Canadian gentlemen of Québec, for said lieut. Rolette's conduct under the brave com. Barclay, in the action with the American squadron on the 10th Sept. 1813, which conduct merits the warmest approbation of his countrymen, and reflects great credit on lieut. Rolette, as an officer and seaman.—Quebec Gaz.

Statistical Scraps.

"SALT," says a letter to the editor, from Kenhaven Salines, Va. "is now selling here from 50 to 62 1-2 cents per bushel of 50lbs." Jan. 1815.

OHIO. Extract of another letter to the editor of the Register.—"As you are a friend to the western country, you will no doubt be delighted to hear of proofs of its rising importance, from any source. Our monthly returns from the several land offices in Ohio and Indiana Territory, exhibit an unparalleled sale of public lands, since the pacification of the Indian tribes in that quarter. In some districts the sales have been doubled in the last six months. In the Canton District, for instance, the sales in November (the last account received) is upwards of 45,000 acres, nearly all in quarter sections. When I came into the office in May last, the monthly sales were only about 17,000. In Cincinnati district, the sales exceed Canton. The emigration to the state, the last summer, also, has been beyond all example, great. The main road through the state, I am told, has been almost literally covered with waggons moving out families.

SHEEP. Another letter to the editor says—"We are in the culture of Merino sheep, and have a beautiful flock of nearly five hundred. We have named our plantation after the celebrated plains of Estramadura, in Spain. We are situated two miles from Kendal." (Ohio.)

In the statistical work of Dr. Colquhoun the conquests made by Great Britain since 1792, are estimated at 105,000,000£, whereof 87,000,000£ are restored by the treaty of Paris. Since the commencement of the war, there have been taken ships and other floating property worth 50,000,000 or 60,000,000£ more.

The French papers give the following statement of the number of troops employed according to them, against France, during the late campaign: troops of the ci-devant confederation of the Rhine 145,000 men. 2. Austrian army in France and Italy, 250,000. 3. Russian army, 250,000. 4. Prussian army, 200,000. 5. Swedish army, 30,000. 6. Corps of Dutch, 30,000. 7. English army in Spain and the Netherlands, 60,000. 8. Spanish and Portuguese army in the field, 80,000. 9. Neapolitan army, 30,000. 10. Danish auxiliary corps, 10,000. Total, 1,685,000 men exclusive of the landwehr.

It appears by a return made to the house of commons from the colonial department, dated the 5th instant, of the slave ships condemned in the British colonies, together with the number of slaves they had on board, from 1810 to 1812, that no less than 40 vessels were condemned during that period, viz. 27 at Sierre Leone, 5 at the Cape, 3 at the Bahamas, 2 at Barbadoes, and 3 at Jamaica, containing altogether, 6237 slaves of whom 1200 were females.

The present state of the church establishment of England is indicated by two of those official documents for which the public are indebted to the vigilance of parliament. By an abstract of the non-resident incumbents laid before the house of lords for the year 1812, it appears that at this time there appertain to our church establishment 10,582 benefices, including 133 dignities; that of these, 5,100 are non-resident, and 5,482 are resident. That of these 1,964 reside on other benefices; 382 are infirm; and 1,120 want a parsonage house. The non-residents, without leave, are 746, of whom there are 221 in St. David's and 93 in Exeter. The dioceses in regard to their size, contain, Lincoln 1,252 benefices; Norwich 1,039; York 830; Litchfield 677; Exeter 610; London and Chester respectively, 586 and 585; the others fewer, and Rochester but 107. In Carlisle, Chester, London, Peterborough, and York, the residents exceed the non-residents; and in Bristol they are 131 each; but the non-residents are to the residents in St. David's nearly as 8 to 1; in Bangor as 4 to 1, and in Landaff as 7 to 1; owing, as may be supposed, to the poverty of the benefices; though in Litchfield and Lincoln they are at least 2 to 1. By an order of these interesting documents, made up to January 1st, 1813, it appears that (Ely excepted) there were 3,926 curates, 58 of whom received but 10*l*. per annum; 217, but 20*l*.; 679, 30*l*.; 683, 40*l*.; 617, 50*l*.; 100 from 60 to 100*l*.; and only 40 above 100*l*.

Proceedings of Congress.

IN SENATE.

Thursday, Jan. 19.—After disposing of some other matters—The senate proceeded to the consideration of the message from the house announcing its disagreement to the amendments of the senate to the bank bill.

After a variety of speaking and debating, and several motions, the question to insist on the first amendment, was decided as follows:

For insisting—Messrs. Anderson, Bibb, Chase, Condit, Howell, Laeock, Morrow, Roberts, Smith, Taylor, Turner, Varnum, Walker—13.

Against insisting—Messrs. Barbour, Brown, Daggett, Dana, Fromentin, Gaillard, German, Giles, Goldsborough, Gore, Horsey, Hunter, Kerr, King, Lambert, Mason, Robinson, Tait, Thompson, Wells, Wharton—21.

So the senate refused to insist on this amendment.

Mr. Roberts moved to postpone the further consideration until the 2d Monday of March next—equivalent to a rejection. After debate, the question was decided as follows:

For postponement—Messrs. Gaillard, German, Kerr, Laeock, Lambert, Roberts, Taylor, Turner, Varnum—9.

Against postponement—Messrs. Anderson, Barbour, Bibb, Brown, Chase, Condit, Daggett, Dana, Fromentin, Giles, Goldsborough, Gore, Horsey, Howell, Hunter, King, Mason, Morrow, Robinson, Smith, Tait, Thompson, Walker, Wells, Wharton—25.

The question on Mr. Giles' motion to recede from the said first amendment, was then decided in the affirmative, ayes 18.

Mr. King then moved to recede from all the other amendments to which the house had disagreed.

The senate then receded from such of the said remaining amendments, as preceded the following:

The question on receding from the insertion of the section, authorising the bank under certain circumstances, to suspend payment of their notes in specie, was decided as follows:

For receding—Messrs. Barbour, Brown, Daggett, Dana, Fromentin, Gaillard, German, Giles, Goldsborough, Gore, Horsey, Hunter, Kerr, King, Lambert, Mason, Thompson, Wells—8.

Against receding—Messrs. Anderson, Bibb, Chase, Condit, Howell, Laeock, Morrow, Roberts, Robinson, Smith, Tait, Taylor, Turner, Varnum, Walker, Wharton—16.

So the senate virtually disagreed to the insertion of such a section. Whereupon

Mr. Bibb moved to postpone to the second Monday in March (to reject) the further consideration of this bill.

Mr. Smith, then, expressing a desire to have a night's reflection on this question, moved to adjourn.

There were 19 ayes in favor of the motion; and the senate adjourned at a late hour.

Friday, Jan. 20. After disposing of other business, among which was the question as to the right of Mr. Bledsoe, to a vote, which was decided in the negative—

The senate resumed the consideration of the amendments to the bank bill.

The question on Mr. Bibb's motion to postpone to the 2d Monday in March (to reject) the further consideration of the subject, being yet under consideration—

A very able and highly interesting debate took place, in the course of which Mr. Bibb, Mr. Taylor and Mr. Roberts supported the affirmative, and Mr. Giles the negative side.

The question was decided at late hour as follows:

For postponement—Messrs. Anderson, Bibb, Condit, Gaillard, Howell, Kerr, Laeock, Morrow, Roberts, Smith, Taylor, Turner, Varnum, Walker—14.

Against it—Messrs. Barbour, Brown, Chase, Daggett, Dana, Fromentin, German, Giles, Goldsborough, Gore, Horsey, Hunter, King, Lambert, Mason, Robinson, Tait, Thompson, Wells, Wharton—20.

So the senate refused to postpone the bill.

On motion of Mr. Giles,

The senate then determined to recede from its disagreements with the house. Adjourned.

[The bill wants only the signature of the president to become a law.]

Monday, January 23.—Mr. Mason's motion for requiring of the executive the reasons why a call for information by the senate in relation to the state of the army, had not been obeyed, was again considered, and negatived, 18 to 12.

The senate was occupied the principal part of the day in discussion of the bill from the house "to prohibit intercourse with the enemy, and for other purposes;" the further consideration of which was, at the close of the sitting, postponed until to-morrow.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Thursday, Jan. 19. The house resumed the consideration of the report of the select committee on the letter of Patrick Magruder, clerk of this house, touching the destruction by the hands of the enemy, of the vouchers for the contingent expenditures of his office; and after considerable debate, the resolution reported by the committee was amended so as to read as follows, and then agreed to by the house, viz.

Resolved, That Patrick Magruder, clerk of the house of representatives, be credited at the proper office in the treasury department for the sum of $30,686 78, and such other sums as he shall exhibit satisfactory evidence of having properly paid for expenditures on account of the contingent expenses of the house of representatives since his last settlement; and that a copy of this and the former report of the committee be filed in the auditor's office.

The bill from the senate, supplementary to the act passed at the last session for the indemnification of certain claimants of public lands in the Mississippi territory, was read a third time as amended, and passed.

The bill for the better regulation of the ordnance department, passed through a committee of the whole, and was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The bill to alter and amend the several acts establishing a navy department, by adding thereto a board of commissioners, went thro' a committee of the whole.

Friday, Jan. 20. The speaker laid before the house two letters from the secretary of the treasury, the one transmitting his annual report of the names and salaries of the clerks employed in the treasury department of 1814, and the other the annual statement of the district tonnage of the United States on the 31st December last; and also a letter from the secretary of the navy, transmitting his annual report of the names and salaries of the clerks employed in the navy department for the year 1814.

The bill to amend the several acts for establishing a navy department was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading—and a great deal of other business of lesser importance was transacted.

Saturday, Jan. 21.—The report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two houses relative to the volunteer bill, was agreed to by both houses; and the bill only wants the signature of the president to become a law.

Several memorials and resolves of the legislature of the Mississippi territory, were presented in each house; among which was a petition for authority to call a convention to form a constitution, preparatory to admission into the union.

The several bills passed to a third reading on Friday were read a third time and passed.

Mr. Jackson's bill to amend the militia act (so far as relates to the organization of the militia) underwent considerable discussion and some amendment in committee of the whole, and, being reported to the house, was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. Clark made a motion to supersede the present clerk of the house—ordered to lie on the table.

Monday, Jan. 23.—Mr. Eppes reported a bill to levy a direct tax on the district of Columbia—for laying a duty on lotteries—and a bill to amend the act laying duties on the retailers of licenses (for the relief of domestic manufacturers of wine, who themselves dispose of their products), the two first of which were committed, and the latter ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

On motion of Mr. Clarke, of Ken. the further consideration of the orders of the day was postponed until to-morrow, in order to proceed to the consideration of the resolution for the removal of Patrick Magruder from the office of clerk of the house of representatives, and the appointment of a successor.

[It is alleged that the clerk or his deputies, did not take sufficient care to preserve the records of the house, during the late incursion of the enemy, though it seems the most valuable papers were saved.—Among those lost were the vouchers for the contingent expences of the last year, on account of which he had received 50,000 dollars—it is stated that all had been expended except about 3,000 dollars—but vouchers for more than 30,000 cannot be obtained.]

Tuesday, Jan. 24. Mr. Troup, from the committee on military affairs, reported a bill making provision for subsisting the army of the United States by authorizing the appointment of commissaries of subsistence, which was twice read and committed.

Mr. T. also from the same committee reported a bill to authorize the purchase of a tract of land for the use of the United States (being the land adjacent to the village of Plattsburg, on which fort Mureau and other batteries are erected)—which was twice read and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The speaker laid before the house a letter from Benjamin W. Crowninshield, secretary of the navy, transmitting an annual report of the commissioners of the navy pension fund; which was ordered to be printed.

The engrossed bill to amend the act laying duties on licences to retailers of wines, spirituous liquors, and foreign merchandize, was read the third time and passed.

The order of the day, on Mr. Jackson's proposition to amend the constitution, so as to give to congress power to establish a national bank, &c. having been called over, on motion of Mr. Jackson, the further consideration thereof was postponed indefinitely.

Wednesday, Jan. 25. The house was engaged in various business this day. It postponed, indefinitely, Mr. Jackson's bill to conform the organization of the militia to that of the several states, &c.—also the bill for declaring the assent of congress to an act of the legislature of Georgia, establishing fees for the health officer, &c. at Savannah at St. Mary's—and passing the bill for purchasing certain land in the vicinity of Plattsburg; and that for extending the time of Oliver Evans' patent.

From the New-York Evening Post.

FROM PORT-AU-PRINCE.—The letter-of-marque schooner Jonquille, capt. Carman, has arrived at Beaufort, (N. C.) in nine days from Port-au-Prince, with a cargo of sugar, tortoise shell, some prize goods and a considerable amount in specie, to Cox and Montauvert, of this city, owners—She has captured on her voyage 4 prizes, manned one, (arrived,) ransomed another, gave the third up to the prisoners, and the fourth destroyed. Captain Carman writes to his owners in this city, that the only news at Port-au-Prince or from the island is, that the two ministers sent out by the court of France were received by the president Petion and emperor Christophe. Their demands on the part of the king were, that the island and inhabitants should return to their former allegiance. This was promptly rejected—Christophe sent his soldiers and unexpectedly seized the ambassador with all his instructions, in which it was found he was to encourage and promote disaffection between the mulattoes and blacks, he instantly turned him out to the soldiery, who terminated his mortal existence. Petion treated the other with much courtesy during my stay, and sent him in a small vessel under a strong expedition to Jamaica. He says the torches are ready when their tyrants approach to destroy every vestige of civilization, not a cock shall crow on the plains to nourish them, not a tree or a hut shall afford them shelter from a Tropical sun, and the mountains shall become our abiding place from whence we have the abundant means of annoying them, and rendering them still more comfortless than God and nature will do. They are already storing the mountains with cured provisions and the most active preparations are going on to complete their means of defence. The minister to Petion represented the foreign merchants there as a set of desperate and needy adventurers who were his bad counsellors, and that when his master sent there they would be committed to the stake. The secret expedition that was progressing in Jamaica had not yet sailed—general opinion was that it was destined for some southern quarter of the United States.—While at Port-au-Prince, his B. M. sloop of war Peruvian touched there on her way to Gonaives, Bermuda and New-Providence, with an agent of the house of Boyles and co. Jamaica, supposed for the purpose of placing funds at the two latter places to purchase southern produce that is to be captured by the expedition now fitting out.

POSTSCRIPT.

We have the details of the operations of the enemy in the south. They have captured Point Petre and St. Mary's without much opposition, and an attack upon Savannah was apprehended. There force is stated at from 1500 to 2000 men.

The Georgians are rising in arms—and we shall soon see a contrast between St. Mary's and Castine—the southern and eastern extremities of our coast.

Nothing of importance in congress on Thursday.

Legislature of Pennsylvania.

INAUGURAL ADDRESS.

To the Senate and house of representatives of the commonwealth of Pennsylvania.

Fellow-Citizens—Again honored by a re-election to the office of chief magistrate; again in the presence of the representatives of the people, I have renewed my oaths of fealty to the constitution, and again, in sincerity, and singleness of heart, I pledge myself ever to be mindful of the rights, interests and happiness of the people, who have repeatedly and in the most distinguished manner reposed their highest confidence in me; all the return I can make, is, an honest devotion of all the faculties of my mind to promote their welfare; that such devotion has been heretofore rendered and acceptably received, I have abundant reason to be convinced.

Having by message communicated to the legislature the state of the commonwealth, and suggested such measures as have appeared to me likely to promote the general weal, I have now no special recommendation to offer to your consideration as legislators; yet such are my impressions, and anxieties, that I should feel I had but half discharged the obligation of duty, were I to return from this assembly, without endeavoring to impress upon all its members, and would to God upon all their constituents, the sacred, and at this time indispensable necessity of such an union of sentiment, as shall secure an union of action, against our common enemy. It is scarcely possible to read the resolutions, against the inadmissible terms proposed by the British ministers, which were unanimously adopted by the highly respectable legislatures of the states of New-York, Virginia and North Carolina, without feeling a glow of patriotic fervor and inward conviction that such unanimity throughout the United States would be the surest guide to successful warfare, and the surest pledge of an honorable and speedy peace.

The blood of our brave troops has been shed in vain; vain are the laurels they have won, and the praises they have received, if the public voice be rent in twain by discord, and the public arm be palsied by faction; in vain has our flag, resplendent with many victories, been proudly displayed in every clime, and its victorious defenders been hailed as the bravest of the brave, if their countrymen will not emulate their virtues, and unite head, heart and hand against the common foe. When the independence and integrity of our country are at stake, what American will withhold his utmost efforts to redeem them. When the soil which gave us birth and covers the bones of our fathers is trodden by the feet of hostile men, who threaten to destroy and lay waste our homes and temples of worship, shall we hesitate to march to meet them because we may not have approved of the declaration of war, or because we may not approve of the manner in which it has been conducted, or, because we do not approve of the men who are constitutionally in authority? most certainly not; such reasoning, however satisfactory to the individual it might influence, would have no weight with the community, and would be but a feeble apology for abandoning the nation in time of peril and danger. Let us go forth united, and who shall stand before our en-battled multitude. When we have experienced the proud invaders, and conquered an honorable peace, then let us settle our political differences, exact rigid accounts from those in authority, and in the usual constitutional regular manner let the highest of our public functionaries be arraigned at the bar of public opinion, and if any be found dishonest or incapable, let them be set aside, and men more worthy be appointed to fill their stations. But let us not, I beseech you, indulge party feelings at the expense of principle, nor engage in party animosity and fan a flame in which the vital interests of our country may be consumed. Upon you my friends and fellow citizens much depends, your conduct and example will, as it ought, have much influence with your constituents, will not be viewed with indifference by other states or even by the enemy. If I have urged this subject with more words, warmth or earnestness than you may deem necessary, impute it to the deep conviction I have of the baleful effects of every measure which represents us to the enemy as a divided people.

This is probably the last time I shall personally have the honor to address the general assembly of Pennsylvania, and I embrace it to express the affectionate solicitude I feel for the happiness, and prosperity of a state, which has not only bestowed upon me, in common with my fellow citizens, the enjoyment of so many civil, religious and political rights, but has also honored, and distinguished me so frequently as to bind me to its interests by the strongest ties of gratitude, and esteem. To you, gentlemen, the representatives of this state, I tender for yourselves and your constituents my best wishes for your happiness; and I offer up my fervent prayers to the Giver of all good, that he will bless, protect and defend you and our country from the machinations of all enemies public and private.

SIMON SNYDER.

MORTALITY.

The annual bill of mortality for the city and precincts of Baltimore, for the year 1814, gives us the following results. Whole number of deaths, 1152; of which were—under 1 year 249; from 1 to 2, 115; 2 to 5, 70; 5 to 10, 41; 10 to 20, 76; 20 to 30, 179; 30 to 40, 167; 40 to 50, 115; 50 to 60, 49; 60 to 70, 29; 70 to 80, 35; 80 to 90, 25; 90 to 100, 2. The greatest number of deaths was in October, 125; the least in June, 62. There died, of consumption, 225 cholera morbus, 102; bilious fever, 113; typhus do. 56; other fevers, 7; of fits, 80; old age, 69; pleurisy, 110; still-born, 70; worms, 85; dropsy, 36; croup, 25, &c. &c. Deaths in the army not included—the population of Baltimore, as aforesaid, may be esteemed at 50,000.

The annexed bill for Boston, for 1814, states 727 deaths—as follows: under 1 year, 161; 1 to 2, 76; 2 to 5, 53; 5 to 10, 28; 10 to 20, 35; 20 to 30, 114; 30 to 40, 87; 40 to 50, 56; 50 to 60, 33; 60 to 70, 25; 70 to 80, 27; 80 to 90, 21; 90 to 100, 1. The males were, 399; females 328. Greatest number of deaths in October, 100; least in June, 40. There died, of consumption, 153; typhus fever, 77; other fevers, 44; infantile diseases, 208; old age, 39; still-born; 32, &c. The population of Boston is about 34,000.

The annual bill for New-York for the same year, gives the whole number of deaths at 1974; of whom, 1062 were males and 912 females. Of these, 407 were of the age of one year and under; 160 between 1 and 2; 132 between 2 and 3; 91 between 3 and 4; 94 between 4 and 5; 280 between 5 and 6; 245 between 6 and 7; 218 between 7 and 8; 133 between 8 and 9; 91 between 9 and 10; 84 between 10 and 11; 35 between 11 and 12; 2 between 12 and 13; 2 of 13 and upwards. Total 1974. Of these died 572 of consumption.

A writer in "the (London) Public Cause," gives us the subjoined statement of mechanics' and laborers' wages in 1785 and 1811, together with the prices of provisions for their respective years, and goes on to attribute the present misery of the inhabitants of the "fast anchored isle" to the quantity of accommodation bank provincial notes. The inundation of bank paper has undoubtedly a great tendency of producing misery and distress particularly when it is made a legal tender; but another and greater cause will be found in the pernicious course pursued by the British ministry in the prosecution of disastrous war and disregard of neutral rights.

With every other article proportionably cheap.

It is stated from an account, laid before the house of commons, that the total quantity of corn, grain, meal and flour of all sorts, imported into Great Britain during the twelve years from 1799 to 1810, both inclusive, was 17,004,031 quarters.

NEW-YORK.—The next census of the state of New-York will astonish us all; though its great western district, where the increase of population will mainly rest, has borne an extraordinary portion of the hard ships and calamities of the war. The gallant and patriotic county of Ontario has, of itself, received an accession of nearly sixteen thousand souls since the year 1810.—and there is every reason to believe that many other districts of that delightful and extensive country have gone forward to the "fulness of strength" with about the same ratio. The cause of these things is to be found in the madness of the eastern jacobins—who, by discouraging manufactures and encouraging political strife, have driven their people rather to seek plenty, with domestic peace, in the neighborhood of the public enemy, than remain near the "bones of their ancestors" to starve on a thin soil, and wrangle with those who should be their friends. I think it likely that New-York, with two senators in congress, will have as great a free population as all the "nation of New-England," in 1820, having ten senators—but the jacobins say that that section of the country has not its due weight in the councils of the nation! Ohio, in the same lapse of time, will probably outnumber any two states of the "nation," except Massachusetts, and "tread close on the heels" of that great commonwealth!

LEHIGH CHAIN BRIDGE. From the Philadelphia Daily Advertiser. This bridge is built over the river Lehigh, one mile below the borough of Northampton (alias Allentown) on the great road leading from the borough of Easton to Reading. It is constructed on the plan of judge Finley, with material improvements; its length is 475 feet, in two whole and two half spans or arches. The piers were sunk in the autumn of 1813. In the latter end of May 1814, the building was recommenced, and in the middle of September last the bridge was passable. It has a double passage for carriages, with a foot way of 8½ fect between the middle chains. The chains are made of 1 3-8 inch square bar iron, of superior quality from Mr. Spang's iron works. The whole of the iron work was made by the calculation and under the immediate superintendence of Mr. Jacob Blumer, of Northampton, and every part thereof fitted so remarkably well, that the whole was raised in a few days without altering a single link. The total cost amounted to no more than about $20,000, which, considering the short time in which it has been completed, is certainly a very trifling sum. It is allowed by judges to be one of the best built bridges in the United States, as also a perfect model in regard to workmanship. It required about 27 tons of bar iron.

STOVES.—From the same.—Public attention has been lately drawn to the improvement of stoves and saving fuel. The materials of which stoves are constructed, are to be more or less esteemed as they retain the heat.

The writer of this article had soapstone and marble cut to the size of common bricks, and exposed to the same heat—the common brick cooled first, the soapstone next, the marble retained the heat a little longer than the soapstone. The difference between brick and stone is considerable, and merits particular attention. There are in and near the city of Philadelphia 20,000 houses, say as many stoves; if a quarter of a cord only could be saved in each season, by using stone or brick in the cast stoves (see below) it would amount to 5,000 cords, say 30,000 dollars per annum: probably experience will prove that the calculation may be doubled, and that will save 60,000 dollars. It cannot be too generally known that the heat of stone is more agreeable than iron, or even bricks.

Fill all parts of a stove not necessary for the fuel or cooking with stone or brick, and lay a stone slab on the top plate the same size, and 3 or 4 inches thick; also where the fuel is consumed, there is generally room for a row of bricks or more. Iron heats quickly, and as quickly cools; stone retains the heat. A thermometer, or even common observation, will determine how far this subject deserves attention.

Events of the War.

NEW-ORLEANS & ST. MARY'S.

We have devoted a large portion of our paper to details, official and unofficial, of events at New-Orleans and St. Mary's. The former has especially, engaged the public attention, for the object contended for is of incalculable importance. Our latest date is of the 7th January (which must have been written very early in the morning, the mail closing, as we are told, at 7 o'clock, A. M.) received by a house in Baltimore which states that "one of the British ships (the Herald) had got over the bar in the river Mississippi; but in consequence of some information received by express, the whole fleet had left the Balize, their destination not known." When we compare this movement with the information contained in a letter to the 6th, "that their main body had retreated towards the bayou where they landed," it would appear to be the intention of the enemy to withdraw their forces—at least, to be prepared for such an event.

A letter to the editor of the REGISTER says, that when the British were attacked on the evening of the 23d, they were leisurely preparing to cook their suppers. But they got much hotter coffee than they expected. This letter speaks confidently of the safety of the place (before the arrival of the brave spirits from Kentucky) and observes, that though the capture of the enemy is desirable, the protection of the city is infinitely to be preferred; and gives the opinion that Jackson would not risk its safety. It passes the highest eulogiums on the patriotism of the people, and says the mulattoes fight manfully, and that the French shew the greatest possible anxiety to beat the enemy. The stores were all shut up, and an idler was not permitted to walk the streets of the city.

Of the battle with the gun-boats we have some intelligence via Havana, brought by a Baltimore vessel arrived in the Delaware. The Dictator 64, came to the Havana direct from the neighborhood of New-Orleans, which she left on the 1st or 2d of January. The commander publicly stated, that he had been present at the action with our gun-boats. He spoke of the resistance they made as being without parallel. That many of the British were killed by tomahawks while boarding, and that there was a dreadful contest on the deck of every vessel. He acknowledged that there were one hundred Englishmen killed before our flags were struck. We have very little doubt from this statement, that the capture of these five little boats, carrying five guns in all, and manned with probably less than 150 men, cost the enemy at least two hundred lives, as several of their great barges were torn to pieces and sunk, and perhaps 300 wounded. Better "stuff" than composed our naval force at New-Orleans never "cracked a biscuit." High-minded spirits, emulous of the glory of their brethren, and only wanting opportunity to earn the wreath that crowns our Hull's, Decatur's, Jones's, Bainbridge's, Perry's, Warrington's and Macdonough's, or the double glory of our Blakeley's. Commodore Patterson, who has the command, is one of the best and bravest of men.

The commander of the Dictator further gave his opinion, or rather expressed his fears, that the whole British army might be destroyed or captured. He said they had been led to their place of disembarkation by a Spaniard, and expected to have carried New-Orleans immediately; and that a return to their shipping was difficult, if not impracticable, with the opposition they might reasonably expect. We think there is good reason to hope something of this kind from the fact of the British having entrenched themselves. It would certainly shew that they calculated on acting upon the defensive.

My own opinion of the affair has been, from the beginning, that the British would sustain one of the greatest losses they ever met with, in their attack on New-Orleans. And it will not surprise me (though the reverse may be fact) that the "soldiers of Wellington" are captives to the "raw militia" of Tennessee and Kentucky, led and conducted by the inestimable Jackson, Carroll and Coffee, and hundreds of others "unknown to fame" equally worthy our gratitude and praise. Amen! So mote it be!—that not one shall escape to tell the story!

A letter from St. Francisville of January 8, under advices from New-Orleans, says "Report also states, that the enemy is in a starving condition. This much is certain, that on the day of the last engagement our troops took a number of prisoners, and on examination of their knapsacks, found rations of horse-flesh, say 1 1-4lb each, which was to last them four days.

Under such circumstances they cannot hold out long; and ere this I have no doubt, they are either buried or in safe keeping. The enemy has been very much disappointed in their calculations—they supposing the natives generally disaffected. There certainly never were people more unanimous than our good citizens."

The National Intelligencer says—"We are sorry to learn that the state of general Jackson's health is so precarious as to give reason to apprehend that his country may be deprived of his services at this critical moment* Some complaints are made of a scarcity of ammunition, which, however a few days will supply, as we understand there are great quantities on the passage down the river. One of the private letters states that lieutenant-general Picton is in command of the British forces near New-Orleans, and, as the deserters inform, that the enemy daily expects reinforcements. Before he receives them, we hope to hear of his defeat and dispersion.

We have heard, and we believe correctly, that, to guard against possible events, the government intend to call out five or six thousand men, from Kentucky principally, to proceed down the Mississippi, to join our forces in that quarter."

Copy of a letter from general Andrew Jackson to the secretary of war, dated Camp, below New-Orleans, 26th Dec. 1814.

The enemy having by the capture of our gun-boats obtained command of the lakes, were enabled to effect a passage to the Mississippi, at a point on the side of New Orleans, and about nine miles below it. The moment I received the intelligence, I hastened to attack him in his first position. It was brought on in the night and resulted very honorably to our arms. The heavy smoke, occasioned by an excessive fire, rendered it necessary that I should draw off my troops, after a severe conflict of upwards of an hour.

The attack was made on the night of the 23d—since then both armies have remained near the battle ground, making preparations for something more decisive.

The enemy's force exceeded ours by double, and their loss was proportionably greater. The moment I can spare the time, I will forward you a detailed account. In the meantime I expect something far more important will take place. I hope to be able to sustain the honor of our arms and to secure the safety of this country.

I have the honor to be, with great respect, your obedient servant,

ANDREW JACKSON,
maj. gen. comd'g.

SIR—The loss of our gun boats near the pass of the Rigolets having given the enemy command of lake Borgne, he was enabled to chuse his point of attack. It became therefore an object of importance to obstruct the numerous bayous and canals leading from that lake to the highlands on the Mississippi. This important service was committed, in the first instance, to a detachment of the 7th regiment, afterwards to colonel De Laronde, of the Louisiana militia, and lastly, to make all sure, to major-general Villere, commanding the district between the river and the lakes, and who, being a native of the country, was presumed to be best acquainted with all those passes. Unfortunately, however, a picquet which the general had established at the mouth of the bayou Bienvenu, and which, notwithstanding my orders, had been left unobstructed, was completely surprised, and the enemy penetrated through a canal leading to his farm, about two leagues below the city, and succeeded in cutting off a company of militia stationed there. This intelligence was communicated to me about 12 o'clock of the 23d. My force at this time, consisted of parts of the 7th and 44th regiments not exceeding six hundred together, the city militia, a part of general Coffee's brigade of mounted gunmen, and the detached militia from the western division of Tennessee, under the command of major general Carroll. These two last corps were stationed 4 miles above the city. Apprehending a double attack by the way of Chief-Monteur, I left general Carroll's force and the militia of the city posted on the Gentilly road; and at five o'clock P. M. marched to meet the enemy, whom I was resolved to attack in his first position, with major Hind's dragoons, general Coffee's brigade, parts of the 7th and 44th regiments, the uniformed companies of militia under the command of major Planche, 200 men of colour, chiefly from St. Domingo, raised by colonel Savary and acting under the command of major Dagwin, and a detachment of artillery under the direction of colonel McTea, with two 6 pounders, under the command of lieutenant Spots; not exceeding in all 1500. I arrived near the enemy's encampment about seven, and immediately made my dispositions for the attack. His forces amounting at that time on land to about 3000, extended half a mile on that river, and in the rear nearly to the wood. General Coffee was ordered to turn their right, while with the residue of the force, I attacked his strongest position on the left near the river. Commodore Patterson having dropped down the river in the schooner Caroline, was directed to open a fire upon their camp, which he executed at about half after seven. This being a signal of attack, general Coffee's men, with their usual impetuosity, rushed on the enemy's right, and entered their camp, while our right advanced with equal ardor. There can be but little doubt, that we should have succeeded on that occasion with our inferior force in destroying or capturing the enemy, had not a thick fog which arose about 8 o'clock, occasioned some confusion among the different corps. Fearing the consequence, under this circumstance, of the further prosecution of a night attack with troops, then acting together for the first time, I contented myself with lying on the field that night; and at four in the morning assumed a stronger position, about two miles nearer the city. At this position I remained encamped, waiting the arrival of the Kentucky militia and other reinforcement. As the safety of the city will depend on the fate of this army, it must not be incautiously exposed.

In this affair the whole corps under my command deserve the greatest credit. The best compliment I can pay to general Coffee and his brigade is to say, they behaved as they have always done while under my command. The 7th led by major Pierre, and 44th commanded by colonel Ross, distinguished themselves. The battalion of city militia commanded by major Planche, realized my anticipations, and behaved like veterans. Savary's volunteers manifested great bravery; and the company of city riflemen having penetrated into the midst of the enemy's camp, were surrounded, and fought their way out with the greatest heroism, bringing with them a number of prisoners. The two field pieces were well served by the officers commanding them.

All my officers in the line did their duty, and I have every reason to be satisfied with the whole of my field and staff. Colonels Butler and Piatt and major Chotard, by their intrepidity, saved the artillery. Col. Haynes was every where that duty or danger called. I was deprived of the services of one of my aids, capt. Butler, whom I was obliged to station, to his great regret, in town. Capt. Reid, my other aid, and Messrs. Livingston, Duplissis and Davizac, who had volunteered their services, faced danger wherever it was to be met, and carried my orders with the utmost promptitude.

We made one major, two subalterns, and sixty three privates prisoners; and the enemy's loss in killed and wounded must have been at least —. My own loss I have not as yet been able to ascertain with exactness, but suppose it to amount to 100 in killed, wounded and missing. Among the former I have to lament the loss of colonel Lauderdale, of general Coffee's brigade, who fell while bravely fighting. Colonels Dyer and Gibson of the same corps were wounded, and major Kavenaugh taken prisoner.

Colonel De Laronde, major Willere, of the Louisiana militia, major Labour of engineers having no command, volunteered their services, as did Drs. Kerr and Hood, and were of great assistance to me.

I have the honor to be, with great respect, your obedient servant,

ANDREW JACKSON,

Major general commanding.

Hon. James Monroe, secretary of war.

Head quarters, 7th Military District,

Camp below New Orleans, Dec. 9, 1814.

Sir—The enemy succeeded on the 27th in blowing up the Caroline, (she being becalmed) by means of hot shot from a land battery which he had erected in the night. Emboldened by this event, he marched his whole force the next day up the level, in the hope of driving us from our position, and with this view opened upon us, at the distance of about half a mile, his bombs and rockets. He was repulsed, however, with considerable loss—not less, it is believed, than 120 in killed. Ours was inconsiderable—not exceeding half a dozen in killed, and a dozen wounded.

Since then he has not ventured to repeat his attempt, though lying close together. There has been frequent skirmishing between our picquets.

I lament that I have not the means of carrying on more offensive operations. The Kentucky troops have not arrived, and my effective force at this point does not exceed 3,000. Theirs must be at least double—both prisoners and deserters agreeing in the statement that 7,000 landed from their boats.

ANDREW JACKSON,

Major-general commanding.

UNOFFICIAL ACCOUNTS.

Copy of a letter from his excellency Wm. C. C. Claiborne, governor of Louisiana, to a senator in congress, from that state.

New Orleans, Dec. 30, 1814

Sir—I am to apprise you of the situation of the state of Louisiana, to which no citizen of the United States can be indifferent.

The enemy entered the lake Borgne behind this city, about the 10th inst. Their fleet consisted of a number of vessels, of different sizes. It soon overpowered and captured five gun-boats, our whole naval force on that lake. Severe as the loss was to us, our gallant tars rendered it a very dear advantage to the foe. In the course of the following week, we heard of the landing of some of the enemy's forces on the shores of Pearl river, and on the 23d inst. early in the afternoon, information reached this city, of the arrival of part of them at the house of major-general Willere, below; and at the distance of seven miles from this city, and on the same side of the Mississippi.

They had approached the shores of that river through a small creek (bayou Bienvenue) which emp-ties itself into the lake Borgne, has its head within four miles from the river, where it meets a canal through which fishermen bring their fish to market in small canoes, and from which there is a small portage to the Mississippi. General Jackson, who commands the forces of the United States in this district, immediately marched with the regulars and militia that were in town and some artillery, and was soon after followed by gen. Coffee's cavalry and a detachment of the militia of Tennessee, under gen. Carroll, who were encamped three miles above. Towards dark, the vanguard of our army had a brisk engagement with the enemy, in which we had several killed, many wounded and some missing.—We took twenty odd prisoners, and the loss of the enemy in killed and wounded is said to be much more considerable than ours.

During the night gen. Jackson took an advantageous position, and threw up on the next day a strong entrenchment from the river to the Cypress swamp parallel to it, behind which he has lodged his army in considerable safety. We had two armed vessels on the river (the one commanded by com. Patterson, the other by capt. Henly) which on the following day kept a brisk fire on the enemy, and compelled them to retire into the swamp; but in the night between the 25th and 26th the enemy erected a battery on the shore, from which they fired hot shot on one of our armed vessels, which a strong current and contrary winds kept at anchor. She caught fire, and was abandoned by the crew. On the 27th in the morning the enemy prepared to attack our lines and advanced in close column which the strong fire from our lines compelled to retreat.

On the 28th they were again harrassed by the fire of our armed vessels, which compelled them to retreat again into the swamp.

On the 29th three deserters from the enemy came to our camp; no attack was made.

From the prisoners and deserters we have various accounts of the force and designs of the enemy.

The main body of the army that opposes us sailed from Plymouth on the 28th of September last; it consisted of about 3,000 men; they touched at Madeira, Barbadoes and Jamaica. In the two latter islands they took some troops which had before garrisoned the island of Martinico, and two regiments of blacks. There are, it is said, some indians also with them; but this is not credited.

Combining the various accounts we have, the probable result is, that the force of the enemy below the city, is not less than four nor more than seven thousand, and that of this number are from 1000 to 1500 blacks; they are well supplied with arms, ammunition, artillery and provisions. The force of gen. Jackson before the enemy is from six to seven thousand, and is drawn up in lines behind a high and strong entrenchment impenetrable to musketry and the shot of small cannon, at the distance of about 2 miles from the enemy. In front of the entrenchment and along its whole length, is a wet ditch; the right flank covered by the river, and the left by an impenetrable cypress swamp, and the whole front is defended by several pieces of cannon of various calibres.

None even among the most timid entertain any apprehension of the enemy's ability to force our lines, and I imagine our present force sufficient to insure our temporary safety at least. We are in hourly expectation of the arrival of gen. Thomas with a large reinforcement from Kentucky, and detachments of militia are approaching the city from several quarters; so that I apprehend not the least danger from the enemy, unless they be strongly reinforced."

[The remainder of the letter is the same nearly as that copied letter from the Tennessee papers.]

Copy of a letter from a gentleman in New-Orleans to a gentleman in this city, dated Dec. 30.

Sir—After the action last Friday with the British, gen. Jackson fell back a short distance, where he strongly and advantageously entrenched himself. Monday the enemy succeeded in destroying one of our schooners, the Caroline, by means of their artillery, of which they have a few small pieces. Wednesday they made an attempt on our lines, but were repulsed at every point, with a loss, as is said, of 150 men killed. They have subsequently endeavored to entrench themselves in the vicinity of our camp, but have been compelled to retreat to their original position, their force being insufficient apparently to effect any thing, offensively. Our loss in both actions has been inconsiderable. Some few are known to be killed, some to be prisoners. It appears from the report of deserters, that the British calculate on the neutrality of the French and Spaniards; and with a view to realize it, they have liberated every Creole who has fallen into their hands, observing that they did not make war upon them, and that their property should be generally respected. Upon the whole the greatest confidence prevails in our ability to drive away the enemy; and I am sanguine that in a short time they must either surrender to our arms or evacuate the country. The Kentucky troops, 2,500 strong, are momentarily expected. Our force will then amount to 10,000, fully equal to the defence of the country at the present moment.

Clarion office, Nashville, Jan. 10,—12, A. M.

Extract of a letter to his excellency governor Blount, from colonel Andrew Hynes, dated Orleans city, Dec. 30.

The British have landed with a large army, and are now within about five miles of the city of New Orleans. We began fighting them on the night of the 23d instant, and have been at it almost ever since, but the principal mischief has been done by cannonading. General Coffee's division of the army covered themselves with glory on the night of the 23d. His loss was considerable, among whom were the brave colonel Lauderdale and major Cavanaugh—colonels Dyer and Gibson were wounded. Whatever may be the issue of the pending conflict, rests only with Heaven. We pray to the Almighty that we may not tarnish the reputation of the troops of Tennessee. A detachment is this moment advancing from our lines on the enemy, and our heavy artillery are firing almost constantly on them.

Day before yesterday the brave colonel Henderson and some others were killed by the advance of the enemy's column on the left wing of our army.

Generals Jackson, Carroll and Coffee are worth more than their weight in gold to the American government.

Admiral Cochrane is said to be with the army, and perhaps is not more than a mile from us.

This is said to be the army that took the city of Washington.

General Kean is said to be the commander.

Extract from a letter to his excellency governor Blount, from his excellency governor Claiborne, dated Orleans, December 30.

The enemy remains encamped about 7 miles from this city, within full view of our army under the command of general Jackson. The force of the enemy is variously stated, from four to seven thousand. In an attack on the evening of the 23d inst. he suffered considerably, and, but for the darkness of the night, which caused some little confusion in our ranks, the affair, I am told would have been decisive. We have lost some very brave men, and among the number I am sorry to mention two highly esteemed officers of your state, colonel Henderson of the rifle corps, and colonel Lauderdale of the volunteers. The Tennessee troops equal the high expectations which were formed of them, nor is it possible for men to display more patriotism and firmness in battle, or composure under fatigue and privations. The Louisianians also deserve and will receive the highest approbation. We are united as one man, and a spirit prevails which insures our safety. We may have, and calculate on having some hard fighting; but you need not fear for the result. The general inspires much confidence, and all his troops, regulars, volunteers and militia, are in high spirits, and anxious to be led against the enemy. This will be done in due season; the Kentucky troops are daily expected; until reinforced by them, the general has very prudently determined to maintain his present position—a position which completely covers the city, and from which the enemy cannot dislodge him. The American army is drawn up in a line, extending from the Mississippi to the Cypress Swamp, having in front a wet ditch and an entrenchment impenetrable to musketry or smaller pieces of ordnance—the right flank covered by the river, and the left by the swamp, and the whole defended by several pieces of cannon of various calibres—32, 24, 12 and 6 pounds.

Extract of a letter from the post-master at New-Orleans, to the post-master in Nashville, dated December 30.

"You will have heard, I presume, of the landing of the British here, and of an action which took place last Friday in which it is thought they suffered much. Since that time our army has entrenched itself very strongly and advantageously about five miles from town. Last Wednesday the enemy attacked our lines, but were repulsed with considerable loss; ours trifling. Previous to the attack, they succeeded in destroying a schooner belonging to us by means of their artillery, of which they have a few small pieces.

"In this state the affairs rest—the Kentucky troops being momentarily expected, which, added to our previous force, puts the country, I conceive, entirely out of danger.

Extract of a letter from colonel R. Butler, adjutant general, dated Camp, 6 miles below New-Orleans, December 30, 1814.

"I am here surrounded with the din of war—artillery and small arms alternately playing. On the 23d at night we attacked the enemy; and, as reported by deserters, we killed, wounded and took prisoners about 500. Our loss comparatively very small. Colonels Lauderdale and Henderson have bit the dust and are no more. The latter on the 28th inst. at which time the enemy advanced on us, with a view to storm our works; but they found us too strong to attempt it. We opened our artillery, and a deserter says we killed 140 men that day—among them sir Beverly Evanson of the 85th. We cannot estimate their force as yet correctly—we are in fine spirits and have no doubt of drubbing the rascals."

Extract of a letter from the honorable Eiegins Fremontin, senator in congress from Louisiana, to his friend in Baltimore, dated Washington, January 28, 1815.

"I hasten to relieve your anxiety about New-Orleans—New-Orleans was safe on the 30th December, and I hope is safe now. Take your own time to read the details below, extracted from letters which I received this morning from governor Claiborne, Thomas Urquhart, Richard Relf, John Kilty Smith and James Sterrett. All my correspondents agree together about all the material facts; and they all agree likewise with Brown's and Robertson's correspondents, so that you may give an entire belief to the following narration.

"Strange as it may appear, the enemy were in general Villere's yard before any body knew that they had even attempted to land. Villere's son was a prisoner by them in his father's house; but under some pretence he got leave to go into the yard, made his escape, and was the first to give the news in New-Orleans at about two o'clock, p. m. on the 23d December. Our videttes at the mouth of the bayou Bienvenu had been before made prisoners, supposed to have been betrayed by some fishermen, who were in the habit of bringing fish from the lake through that bayou to the New-Orleans market. General Jackson went immediately to the enemy with what regulars and militia of every description happened to be in New-Orleans, the whole amounting to about 4900. Our army attacked the British at about eight o'clock, and after an engagement of about an hour and a half, the firing ceased on both sides, as if by mutual consent. Our loss is supposed to be about 200 men killed, wounded and missing—that of the enemy is believed to be much more considerable. We took that night seventy odd prisoners. Parmelee was found dead on the field of battle—he is the only one whose death has been ascertained. Among the missing, supposed to be prisoners, are George Ogden, George Pollock, John Lynd, Laverty, Nathan Cox, Brundage, Wm. Flowers, Story, and others, whose names are not given. Sterrett, Porter and Alexander Smith, (Kitty's brother) were slightly wounded. They are getting well, and ready for another action.

All the American prisoners are sent on board of their fleet. The Creoles were first ordered to be released on condition of their taking with them a proclamation from the British commanding general to the inhabitants of Louisiana. This they every one refused to do. They were nevertheless released on parole. In the number are, Prieur, Beauregard, Renault, Roy, and Villere, jun. who, it seems, after he made his escape from his father's house, put himself at the head of a company of Creole volunteers, formed on a sudden, on the spur of the occasion.

After the night action of the 23d, the hostile armies respectively took a position, ours on Edward Macarty's plantation, adjoining our old country seat, and threw up breast-works from the river to the swamp, the old mill canal serving as a ditch ready made. The British established their lines on Bienvenu's plantation, about two miles below, and there fortified themselves, waiting for their artillery.

The two armies remained in the situation above described, and on the 25th, the ship Louisiana, and the schooner Caroline dropped down the river abreast the wings of the enemy, and opened their fire on them. The British suffered considerably from the brisk uninterrupted fire of our two vessels, and were at last compelled to retire to the swamps. But in the night of the 25th and 26th, they erected a battery on the shore, from which they fired red hot shot and succeeded in setting fire to the Caroline and blew her up, not however before the brave captain Henley had taken on shore all his guns. Not a man was hurt in consequence of the Caroline blowing up.

On the 27th or 28th (for in that respect our several accounts are at variance) the enemy advanced in considerable force with their artillery, and attacked at the same time the whole of our line; but they were repulsed at all points with considerable loss. This action lasted nearly three hours, a severe and incessant cannonading. Our loss in this last affair is about 50 killed and wounded. Major Carmick of the marines has been severely wounded, not dangerously. Since that time to the 30th December, 9 o'clock, p. m. the date of my last letter, nothing has been done but firing during the day from our entrenchments on the works which the British erected in the course of the night.

The ship Louisiana and several other small armed vessels, with the fire from our lines, harass the British constantly, and not unfrequently drive them to the swamps. It appears that general Jackson means at present to keep his strong hold, and to act on the defensive until the arrival of general Hopkins, who was expected on the 31st December with 800 men from Lafourche and Iberville, and of general Adair who was hourly expected with 2,500 men.

Three deserters from the enemy came to our camp on the 29th December.

From them and from the prisoners it is collected, that the force of the enemy amounts from 6 to 8 or 9,000 including about 1,200 black troops which are represented as not of any considerable use thus far, owing it is supposed to the excessive cold weather, which since the landing of the British has prevailed in Louisiana, to such a degree, that the bayou St. John is froze over, which I believe has never been known before.

All our letters speak in the highest terms of the unanimity, confidence and courage manifested by every description of people in Louisiana. No words can do justice to the bravery of the Tennesseans. The Louisianians are not unworthy of them. From the age of 15 to the age of 75, every man is in one way or other engaged in resisting the common enemy. This is truly a noble mode for Louisiana to repel the calumnies by which she has been assailed from many quarters. A country thus defended cannot be conquered.

Generals Packenham and Keene commanded the army; and admirals Cochrane and Malcolm the navy. It is believed that Lewis Kerr* is with the British.

Yours, &c.

ELEGIUS FROMENTIN.

Another extract of a letter from a merchant at St. Francisville, to a gentleman in Baltimore, dated January 1, 1814.

"The enemy under the command of major-general Keene, supposed to be the advance guard of lord Hill, made their appearance within seven miles of New-Orleans on Friday, the 23d December, where they were met by general Jackson, with a force of 4000 men; an action immediately ensued, and Jackson succeeded in driving them off the field of battle, after killing and wounding many of them; their force was estimated at 7000 men, they fought like men, but the force under Jackson fought like devils. The particulars we have not yet ascertained, I must therefore refer you to general Jackson's official report."

Extract of a private letter received at Washington city, dated Camp, near New Orleans, Jan. 6th 1814.

After narrating occurrences of which we are already informed, the letter says—"We all remained perfectly quiet until the morning of the 1st January, when the enemy had advanced within 600 yards of our breast works, under cover of night and a heavy fog, and erected three different batteries, mounting in all 15 guns, from 6's to 32's. About 8 o'clock, when the fog cleared off, they commenced a most tremendous fire upon us, but it was amply returned by us, and a heavy cannonading was kept up without the least interval on either side, except that occasioned by the explosion of my magazine in the rear of my battery, and the magazine of my captain in the night, owing to their Congreve rockets. Against 4 o'clock in the afternoon, we had dismounted all their guns but two. They retreated during the night to their strong hold, about a mile and a quarter from our lines, where they have remained perfectly quiet ever since. On new year's day we lost about 15 killed and as many badly wounded. That of the enemy, from the accounts of two prisoners taken on that day and three deserters since, must have been much greater. Twice have the enemy tried to storm and carry our batteries, with the firm belief of dining in Orleans the same day, but woefully have they been deceived. All deserters that have come in, agree that the enemy's force is from 7 to 9000 strong; but we generally suppose it to be about six thousand.—The enemy in killed, wounded, and prisoners, since the 23d, must have lost near one thousand men. Since our last fight, the Kentucky troops have arrived—near three thousand men, which makes our force better than 8000; so that Orleans, I believe, is pretty safe."

Extract of a letter from a gentleman in New Orleans to a gentleman in the same, dated

New Orleans, January 6th, 1815.

Sir—The operations of the enemy since Friday, the day on which they were repulsed in an attempt to pierce our left flank, have been confined to firing upon our camp from their heavy ordnance, erected on an advance battery, and the discharge of every species of combustible matter, under expectation of throwing us into confusion and thereby giving a chance for storming our lines and bring on a general engagement. The cool and intrepid conduct of our men, however, defeated their scheme; while the fire from our batteries drove them back beyond their works, enabling us in a sortie to demolish them. Since this discomfiture, their main body is said to have retreated towards the Bayou, where they landed, intending as may be presumed, either to wait reinforcements, by the river, a feature in the original plan of invasion, or to effect clandestinely an escape to their shipping. They are said to be distressed for provisions and very sickly, and appear heartily to repent their presumption. General Adair's force reached this Wednesday week; our effective force 10,000 men.

Extract of a letter from an officer in the navy to his friend in Baltimore, dated Camp, 3 miles below New Orleans, Jan. 6.

"We are entrenched, say from eight to ten thousand men, between the British lines and the city.—Their entrenched camp is about four miles from Orleans—where they are supposed to be 10,000 strong. They have made several attempts on our works, and were always handsomely repulsed. I do not think they will take New Orleans this winter. It is now 14 days since the first battle—and the whole of these two weeks the cannonading has been incessant—we have battered down their advance works as fast as they can erect them. We have lost from 100 to 200 men, amongst whom some of our most respectable citizens.

General Jackson behaves well: I think, however, he exposes himself too much; for should a chance shot take him off, I know not what might be the consequence. And of this there is no little danger—his head quarters being so near the lines that at least thirty cannon balls have passed through his house. The opposing lines are so near that the picket guards skirmish daily. The enemy is fortifying and entrenching his camp very strongly."

To the editor of the Philadelphia Gazette.

New Orleans, 6th January, 1815.

You will no doubt expect to hear by this day's mail of something important having occurred in this quarter; but nothing decisive has as yet taken place.

On Sunday the 1st inst. the enemy, who had the preceding night erected a battery in advance of their lines and near our works, opened a very heavy fire upon us, and made two bold attempts to force and turn our left wing, in both of which they were repulsed with considerable loss, and obliged to retreat to their entrenchments, leaving all their guns on the battery, a considerable quantity of ammunition, working tools, and their dead unburied.

Since then no other attempt has been made on our lines; but all accounts concur in stating, that they are fortifying themselves very strongly, with what intention we know not.

It was reported a few days ago, that several of the enemy's vessels had entered the river; and we were seriously alarmed lest they might succeed in passing fort Philip or Plaquemine, and thus co-operate with the army.

But accounts from there to-day state, that they had retired. It is also said there is some misunderstanding between the land and naval commanders. God grant this may prove propitious to our cause!

We have had a few deserters come in since my last.

I have just learnt that the detachment stationed at the Chief Montee road, on lake Borgne, have taken and destroyed an English transport brig, laden with provisions for the army. This will prove a severe blow to them; for they are said, by the prisoners and deserters, to be short of bread—of meat they find abundance in the country they possess, having the command of all the eastern shore of the river, from about 6 miles below the town, including the rich settlement of Terre au Boeuf.

The forces under gen. Thomas, say the Kentucky quota of 2,500, arrived two days ago: *but their arms have not yet come on. It is generally supposed that the want of them (there being none here to supply the deficiency) prevents general Jackson from attacking the enemy. Their arms appear to have been shipped in some common trading boat, and God knows when they may arrive.

From the Savannah Republican of January 17.

The following is a copy of a letter from captain Massias to brigadier general Floyd, received last Sunday afternoon by express.

King's Bay, 11th Jan.—12 o'clock.

Sir—I deem it expedient to apprise you by express, the enemy effected a landing this moment on Cumberland, in two divisions, with nineteen barges. Assisted by two look-out boats, and flanked by two gun barges, at first they shewed a disposition towards the bay; but ascertaining we were prepared to receive them, they altered their course and took the Plumb Orchard passage, keeping Cumberland close ahead. The first division effected its landing at Dungenness—the second at the Plumb Orchard.

The officer left in charge of our battery was ordered not to let them approach our side with impunity; which he promptly obeyed.

One of the barges was sent out of line in chase of a boat making a retreat to St. Mary's, but on receiving a shot from an eighteen which came rather near him, he gave up the chase.

*It appears that the steam boat Enterprize, and a keel boat, passed Louisville, Ky. about the 28th of December, with arms and various stores for New Orleans, and we fear it is so that gen. Adair's men are without arms. However Jackson's fertile genius may make them useful, or, perhaps, partially supply them.

3 o'clock, P. M.—(11th January.)

Sixteen barges of the largest size, have passed towards Dungeness, and have landed.

I compute his whole force to be about fifteen hundred, white and black, their fleet are beating off St. Andrews', at which end they came in.

It was my intention to receive them at Cabin Bluff with riflemen: this could have been done with much advantage, but they were apprized of it, and kept the Plumb Orchard creek.

We are now at the Point, and on the alert, waiting an attack, which I expect momentarily; in which event I shall do my best.

In the event of a retreat, the assistant deputy quarter-master general has been charged to place a supply of provisions and ammunition at a point selected by myself in our rear.

The men have always two days provisions in advance, ready to march to any point at a moment's warning.

I have the pleasure to anticipate the best of conduct in the officers and men under me: though few, they are well chosen, and discover great eagerness for battle: they behaved well the day we prepared to receive the enemy.

Extract of a letter from lieutenant colonel Scott, to the same, (by express) dated

St. Mary's 12th January, 1815.

SIR—Your orders of the 5th inst. reached me, at this place, whither I had repaired on the first information of a serious attack being intended by the enemy, on the frontiers as well as by sea, having previously issued orders for detachments from the companies within my regiment to march to this place. These detachments have partially arrived, but from the alarms existing on the frontier, I fear much delay will arise before the entire number will arrive at this point.

The alarm guns from the garrison were fired the evening before last, and information soon after reached me of the enemy having entered and anchored in St. Andrews'. Yesterday morning seven large boats advanced up the river, and at 11 o'clock effected a landing at Dungeness, in full view of the garrison at Point Petre; and at 4 P. M. were joined by fifteen barges more. The enemy immediately formed their encampment and pitched their tents. Last night their fires were distinctly seen from this side.

The hostile attitude of the enemy leaves no doubt of an attack being meditated on the garrison and this place.

The alarm in this quarter is great beyond description, in consequence of the very large force of the enemy and the very defenceless state of this place.

Unless reinforcements are forwarded, this country is lost. Agreeably to your orders, I have issued mine to lieutenant colonel Pray, requiring reinforcements from his regiment.

I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servant,
WM. SCOTT, lieutenant col.

P. S. The enemy's force is estimated at 1000.

THE ENEMY IN POSSESSION OF POINT PETRE AND ST. MARY'S.

Copy of a letter from captain Massias to brigadier general John Floyd, dated Sweet water Branch, 13th January, 1815.

SIR—The enemy moved against Point Petre this morning at half past seven o'clock, with his whole force, (about fifteen hundred.) His operations were simultaneous. I received information of his approach on my picket, near major Johnson's, with about 800 to a 1000 men and two pieces of artillery; aware of his intentions to place himself in my rear, while he at the same time was advancing in considerable force in front to attack the battery on the St. Mary's, with a view to cut off my retreat; I made the following disposition of my small but brave force. I ordered captain Stallings to remain at the Point, with about thirty-six effectives, with orders to defend it as long as possible, and if he should be overpowered, to spike the guns, fire the train at the magazine, and retreat to me with the remainder, (about 60 riflemen and infantry.)

I moved against the enemy in the rear, determined to oppose his passage at a narrow defile near maj. King's, and make good my retreat at all hazards; at about nine o'clock we came up with the defile, near major Johnson's; it is flanked by a marsh on each side, and has a complete cover for riflemen on the right and left, across which the day previous I had caused some large trees to be fallen; and we entered it on one end, the enemy did so on the other. It was my intention to gain the cross roads near maj. King's, but finding myself stopped, lieutenant Hall, of the 43d infantry, was ordered with a detachment of riflemen, to advance on the enemy's left, and lieutenant Harlee with another detachment, to pass the thicket and endeavor to gain his rear—this order was promptly obeyed. Captain Tatnall, of the 43d infantry, was ordered at the same time to advance in close column and pass the defile; at this moment their bugle sounded, and a brisk fire commenced on both sides. We had already passed some distance, and the enemy had given way twice, when capt. Tatnall, who stood near me, received a severe wound which obliged him to fall back. This produced a momentary pause, when the enemy pressed forward, but was received with unequalled firmness. It was at this moment I received unexampled support from sergeant Benson of the 43d infantry, and private Green of the rifle; but our efforts were unavailing, their numbers were too imposing—a thousand to sixty was too much odds; and believing the battery in the hands of the enemy, as but three guns had been fired, it was with reluctance that I ordered a retreat, which I am happy to state was effected in good order. We took a path to Mrs. Gordon's on the North river, at which place I had previously engaged a large boat, in the event of not being able to pass by the bridge near maj. King's; but the boat was taken away. I had but one resource left, and that was to pass at Miller's Bluff with a paddling canoe. I then sent an order to capt. Stallings to retreat by that way, which he promptly obeyed, the enemy followed him close in his rear, and I have the pleasure to state we effected it without the loss of a man. While I lament the necessity of informing you of the loss of the fort at Point Petre, I console myself with a consciousness of having done my best for its preservation, and of being peculiarly fortunate in making good a retreat, always doubtful, and by none believed practicable but myself. The enemy's loss must have been considerable; the defile was covered with blood. An officer of distinction, wearing a pair of gold epauletts, was among the slain—our loss was very inconsiderable, as will appear by the report annexed to this; I have reason to hope that some of those missing will yet join.

I should not do justice to the gentlemen I had the honor to command, did I not say they performed prodigies beyond all reasonable expectation. All were equally brave; but if I may be allowed to discriminate, and to recommend any to your particular attention, it would be capt. E. F. Tatnall, 43d infantry; he was conspicuous in every act, and gave me the utmost support.

I cannot but consider my little band highly complimented by the number the enemy thought fit to bring against them.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

A. A. MASSIAS, Capt. c 1st rifle corps U. S.

Return of killed, wounded, prisoners and missing in the action on the 18th January; near Point Petre, (Geo.)

431 infantry—killed none, wounded, 1 captain, severely; do. 1 private do.; missing, 4 privates.—Total 6.

Rifle corps—killed, 1 private; wounded, 1 sergeant; prisoner, do. one private, severely; missing, 5 privates—grand total 14.

A. A. MASSIAS, captain,
com. 1st rifle corps U. S. troops.

Copy of a letter from lieutenant. col. Scott to brig. general Floyd, dated "Jefferson, 14th Jan. 1815.

"DEAR SIR—Yesterday, the enemy advanced in two divisions against Point Petre, which they carried by storming it. One division landed at major Johnston's, and marched on the rear of the fort—a number of barges made the attack in front. At this time, I was in the town of St. Mary's; the moment I received information of the enemy landing, I assembled the militia (which amounted to ninety men) and marched for King's bay. When I had advanced two miles from St. Mary's, I heard a heavy firing commence in the road leading from King's bay to Point Petre, which convinced me that the enemy had attacked the Point in the rear. I marched out quick step to make an attack on their rear. I soon found the firing ceased, which gave me to believe the party of reserve had surrendered—my hope then was to meet a party of reserve to guard their barges. I ordered a few horsemen to reconnoitre their landing. They reported, that their barges were all gone except two, which were adrift. I immediately fell back on St. Mary's; when I got within a mile of the town, I was informed that the enemy were advancing against the town of St. Mary's. I halted my men about a mile from St. Mary's—as I was informed some of the barges were in the North river. I proceeded to town myself. When I arrived, I discovered their barges had got as far as maj. Moor's causeway, and that maj. Clark and Mr. Sadler had been appointed by the inhabitants to carry a flag to the enemy to capitulate. The inhabitants appeared much alarmed lest I should make some defence. After getting some refreshments for my detachment, I returned to them. A few minutes after I arrived, a messenger was sent from town, to inform me that a British officer had just landed with a flag, offering the town honorable terms, if they surrendered; and, in case a single gun was fired, the town should be laid in ashes. Knowing my force not sufficient to defend the town, I thought it proper to retire. I had not retired far before I fell in with captain Massias, with the greater part of his command. They retreated by the way of capt. Miller's—we are now encamped at Jefferson.

I never experienced so much alarm: The inhabitants are flying in all directions. If we do not get reinforced, there will be scarce a family left in the county: The inhabitants dread colonel Woodbine and his indians, more than the British. Provisions are hard to be got. I shall do every thing in my power to protect the frontier of this part of the county. I have but eighty five men with me. The men, women, and children are all running away. I hope you will contrive some way to reinforce us. I shall never desert this part of the county, while I can raise a man.

While writing, a Mr. Brown made his escape from St. Mary's—he informs me, that the enemy are collecting all the horses and saddles about that place. From the best information we could obtain, it appears they intend marching by land to Savannah. I shall endeavor to check their march as much as possible, at every advantageous post. I have not been able to ascertain their numbers. There is still a large force on Cumberland, at Point Petre, and in the town of St. Mary's.

I have the honor to be, your's sincerely,
WILLIAM SCOTT,
lieut. col. com. detachment."

FROM THE SAME.

Georgians!—Your state is invaded—the capital of it (Savannah) is threatened—your sires were gallant—you will do every thing in your power to repel the merciless enemy who carries the sword in one hand and the torch in the other—an enemy who wars on the widow and distressed—whose deeds have been as bad as the savage of the American woods, or the plundering Arab of the desert. Remember, the eyes of the world are upon you—Georgia expects every man to do his duty. To arms, then, Georgians, to arms!

The brigadier-general commanding the troops at this station earnestly recommends to the citizens of Savannah the necessity of exertion to complete the fortifications around the city. It is hoped that private interest will on so important an occasion yield to public duty, and that every man possessed of American feelings will repair to the lines, and by united efforts render themselves secure against an attack from the enemy, who will avail himself of neglect. Citizens of Savannah! let your stores and shops be shut until the defences of the city are completed.

Fort Barrington, 12 o'clock, Wednesday evening,

18th January, 1815.

SIR—The enemy is now near Darien—his fleet has anchored in Doboy Sound—he keeps close to me; yet it is my belief Savannah is his object—I shall watch his motions."

Extract of a letter from lieutenant-colonel Scott to brigadier-general Floyd, dated Brown's Ferry, January 18, 1815.

"SIR—I had the honor to receive your's of the 13th inst. by the express, in which you request me to send in my report, which is annexed to this letter. This morning a gentleman arrived here from St. Mary's, who informed me that admiral Cockburn had landed in town with an additional force, number unknown. I have since been told that a number of  troops had been landed since the arrival of the admiral from on board of a bomb brig. The enemy are taking possession of all provisions they can find, and putting them on board their vessels, and are taking in water—they are likewise mounting guns on carriages and training horses, for what purpose I leave you to judge—they have not as yet attempted any fortifications in the town; on the contrary, they have reduced fort Physic; and, it is my opinion, that they will not march by land. I should have wished very much to have made a stand at Crooked River bridge; but captain Massias would not co-operate with me, which was the cause of my falling back to this place yesterday. I have been informed by one of the patriots of Florida that their spies had discovered two indians on the south side of St. Mary's, near Underwood's mills; the indians seeing them, retreated, and were followed until an encampment was discovered with a considerable smoke at different places, when they thought prudent to retire. I have 4 trusty spies out to give me immediate notice of any approaching danger. The distress of the families of this country is beyond description."

Our further advices from the south to the 22d ult. at Savannah, at eight o'clock in the evening give us the following facts and reports. A report (on the 19th January) prevailed that colonel Woodbine was coming on in the rear, at the head of 600 Indians, and that the settlements on the St. Mary's and Satilla rivers were breaking up in consequence. On the 21st it appeared ascertained that the enemy's force was about 2,000 men, part blacks—and it was also stated that the ruffian Cockburn had arrived with a reinforcement—and that at St. Mary's they had plundered every body of every thing. [This we should have presumed from the presence of Cockburn.] Major-general Pinkney was expected at Savannah about the 23rd. The following articles from the Savannah paper of the 22d is the latest advice we have—and cause us to hope, that, by stealing excepted, no great damage may be done:

Savannah, January 22.—"Here we are, under martial law; not knowing the hour when the British forces may pay us a visit. We have no positive accounts from the southward, however, to warrant a positive conclusion, that they are coming this way. We believe the forces at Cumberland and St. Mary's to be about 6000 men."

Another extract—same date.

"Martial law was declared to-day. Governor Early has arrived at the lines with 2,000 men. Strong reinforcements are on their way. Our fortifications progress rapidly, and are able at present to sustain and repel the attack of all the British forces said to have arrived."

Another extract—same date.

"I have only time to say, we are under martial law—the enemy daily expected. Should they have the temerity to approach, I trust we shall give a good account of them—at least, they will not get the place, without a struggle; and that a pretty hard one."

Latest Extract—8 P. M.

"We are in hourly expectation of the arrival of major-general Pinkney, who, we are informed, has ordered on 1500 of the South-Carolina militia: among whom are your country sharp-shooters, who can pick out a squirrel's eye at the distance of one hundred yards. They will match and beat Woodbine's motley crew, even if they have half of the number. A number of your disciplined officers are expected to start from Charleston for this place on the 24th instant."

MISCELLANEOUS.

PEACE RUMORS, we have in a great variety, but none of them, perhaps, worthy of credit. Our latest regular intelligence from Europe is of Nov. 5—and in the absence of it, we are supplied by many reports, possibly, mere speculations. Our present accounts come chiefly from Castine, one of which goes so far as to say that peace was signed on the first of December. British accounts to the 9th of that month are said to have been received at Halifax, and that the merchants there had received advices that peace was expected immediately. The traders at Castine are said to be selling off their goods by auction on account of this news.

CHAMPLAIN FRONTIER. Whether the enemy does or does not intend an excursion into our territory during the winter, we shall be well prepared for it.—Major general Strong, of Vermont, by a very spirited "general order" holds his "green mountain boys" in perfect readiness; who, as Burgoyne said they did in his day, will "hang like dark clouds" on the foe.—Gen. Maccomb is deservedly popular with them, and has supplied those who wanted them with arms, &c. The militia of the New York side is also in readiness. Two new forts (forts Tompkins and Gaines) have been erected near Plattsburg, and other works were going on. Strong batteries are also erected for the protection of our fleet, and the whole seems in such good train, that if general Brisbane makes the incursion, it is likely he may go further into the interior than he expects. The Plattsburg Republican of the 21st January, says, "The British came into Champlain last week, four miles west of the village, and carried off about 30 tons of hay."

NATIONAL BANK. It will be seen by our congressional proceedings, that the president has refused his assent to the bill for establishing a national bank, as it lately passed both houses of congress—and we thank him for it: convinced in our own minds that such a bank, on such principles, would do immense injury to the United States, and essentially aid the operations of the enemies of the republic, at home and abroad. The editors of the National Intelligencer give an opinion that no bill to establish a bank, will be passed this session. The term of the present congress is nearly out—and we are much mistaken if the people at large are not very glad of it. Never, we think, has time, very precious time, been so shamefully wasted.

MILITARY.

It appears by despatches received at Milledgeville, (Geo.) that boats are about to be built to descend the Alabama, to transport general McIntosh's forces to Mobile, upon which an attack was apprehended. It is probable he will reach the place in time to defend it, if the enemy at New-Orleans does not get "enough" of the notion of "restoring" the country and makes the attack. Colonel Hawkins is at the head of 700 friendly Indians to restrain the "Red Sticks" and avenge their murders. He was to leave fort Michel on an expedition, on the 10th ult.

Governor Shelby, of Kentucky, on the requisition of brigadier-general McArthur, has called out 1000 men to relieve the militia of that state now stationed at Detroit.

NAVAL.

LOSS OF THE PRESIDENT FRIGATE.

New-London, January 25.—On Monday afternoon a flag came up from the enemy's squadron off this port, was brought to off fort Trumbull, and delivered a letter, of which the following is a copy:

"Rear-admiral Hotham has the honor to request general Cushing will please to convey the enclosed letter to the lady of commodore Decatur; who the rear-admiral begs leave to acquaint general Cushing, is gone to the Bermudas, in good health, on board the Endymion, having been captured in the United States' frigate President, on the 15th instant, by a detachment of his majesty's ships."

off New-London, 23d Jan. 1815.

"Rear-admiral Hotham also begs leave to commit the accompanying letters to the care of general Cushing; which were received from persons late of the President."

The letters were from commodore Decatur to his lady, and other officers to their friends; and none official. The officer who came with the flag declined making any verbal communication. A letter from an officer to his friend was read in town and forwarded. It was written on board the Pomone.

It briefly stated that the President was captured in the afternoon of the 15th instant, after an action of four hours and a half, by four British ships. That the first, fourth and fifth lieutenants were killed, and the sailing-master and two midshipmen wounded, with a great loss of men.

It appears that the enemy prohibited any particulars of the action from being communicated; from which we must infer that although they gained a frigate they have reaped no laurels from the capture.

The President sailed from New York on Saturday evening, and on Sunday morning before sunrise, the Majestic razee, which lay near Plumb Island, got under way in great haste, and proceeded to sea, leaving her water casks principally on shore. A remarkable circumstance, which leads to the suspicion that information of the sailing of the President was received by traitorous information in twelve hours after her sailing; which, not improbably, led to her capture.

The action must have been principally a running one, and nearly parallel to the coast of Long Island, as the firing was distinctly heard at Stonington and Newport.

It appears before the brave commodore struck his flag, he was assailed by the frigates Pomone, Forth, and Endymion, and the razee Majestic; and we have no doubt, that in this bloody and lamented action, new glory perched on the American standard.

Connecticut Gazette.

From the United States Gazette.

"Various statements have been given of the circumstances attending the loss of the frigate President. The following may be relied on as the substance of a brief letter from commodore Decatur to his lady, who is at present at Frankford.

On passing Sandy Hook the frigate struck on the bar, where she remained thumping for two hours, until the tide rose. Early in the morning she fell in with a British squadron consisting of the Majestic razee, the Endymion, Pomone and Tenedos frigates, and the Despatch brig. Every effort was made to escape, but in vain, the frigate having lost her sailing trim in consequence of the injury sustained at the Hook. The Endymion being the leading ship, came up with her, and getting close under the quarter, kept up a destructive fire, cutting up and crippling the rigging of the President. To suffer this was to make capture certain, without inflicting any injury on the enemy. The commodore, therefore, bore up and engaged the Endymion, and after a severe fight of two hours silenced and beat her off. [It is proper to mention that the Endymion is the same frigate that challenged the United States at New London. She is one of the largest frigates in the British navy, of superior force to the President, mounting 56 guns, (24 pounders on the gun deck) and was sent out expressly to fight our frigates.]

The President now made all sail and endeavored to escape. The sternmost ships were two miles distant. In three hours, however, the Pomone and Tenedos were along side, the others close astern, when, seeing all hopes of escape at an end, the President only waited to receive the fire of the nearest ships and surrendered.

Such are the principal circumstances of an affair which though it gives us cause to lament over the loss of valuable lives and a noble ship, affords us fresh proof, if such are necessary, of the gallantry and skill of our navy. It was a fortunate circumstance for Decatur that the situation of the enemy gave him an opportunity of fighting a distinct battle with the Endymion, and accomplishing a positive and splendid victory over her, before the other force could come up and overwhelm him with numbers."

The following is an extract of a letter from commodore Decatur—politely communicated to the Columbian for publication:

"The night we left the Hook, owing to some blunders of our pilots, we struck on the bar, and there remained thumping for two hours, until the tide rose. At day-light we fell in with the British squadron, consisting of the Majestic, Endymion, Pomone, Tenedos and Despatch brig. My ship, owing to her getting aground, lost her sailing. I lightened her as much as possible, but the enemy gained on us. The Endymion, mounting twenty-four pounders on her gun deck, was the leading ship of the enemy. She got close under my quarters, and was cutting my rigging without my being able to bring a gun to bear upon her. To suffer this, was making my capture certain: and that too, without injury to the enemy. I therefore bore up for the Endymion and engaged her for two hours, when we silenced and beat her off. At this time the rest of the ships had got within two miles of us. We made all the sail we could from them, but it was in vain. In three hours the Pomone and Tenedos were alongside, and the Majestic and Endymion close to us. All that was now left for me to do, was to receive the fire of the nearest ship, and surrender; for it was in vain to contend with the whole squadron. My loss has been severe; the precise number I do not know, but believe it to be between eighty and ninety; of this number, twenty-five are killed;—Babbitt, Hamilton, and Howell, are among the slain. Mr. Dale is wounded, but is doing well.

I am in great haste—we sail to-day for Bermuda."

Many other letters confirm the general facts stated in the preceding accounts. Our loss in killed and wounded appears to have been from 80 to 90; about 25 of the former, among whom were lieutenants Babbitt, Hamilton, and acting lieutenant Howell—several other officers wounded. Decatur, the gallant Decatur, escaped without a hurt to revenge the unmanly attack. He was taken on board the Endymion, and many of the rest of the officers and of the crew transferred to the Pomone, where it appears they have been treated—as they would have treated the British in reverse circumstances. The President and Endymion were lost sight of in a gale—when last seen, the former had a signal of distress flying, having lost her fore and mizen-top-masts. She was ordered for Bermuda, whither also the Pomone was bound. Our frigate was captured the day after she left New York, no doubt by the information of some blue light wretch that yet defrauds the gallows of its due. Arrangements appear to be making in the city of New York to build immediately, a new frigate, or a 74, for Decatur. The President must have been greatly injured, as it is stated that several of her guns were dismounted; and we are not without our fears for the sake of our brave fellows that yet remained on board of her, that she may have been lost in the gale.

However we may lament the loss of the brave men who fell in this contest, the services of those wounded or carried into captivity, or of the vessel herself (which, however, we can easily replace,) we rejoice that our naval glory remains untarnished, and that this capture of Decatur, like Porter's, will add to his own fame and the renown of his country.—Europe, astonished at the charm that has encompassed the British navy, will exult that it is so fairly broken; and hail our tars as masters of the sea, ship to ship and man to man. Under so great disadvantages, acting on the defensive and crippled before she turned upon the Endymion, the President reduced that ship, her superior in force to the condition "of a log on the water," and would most assuredly, have made a prize of her, if her consorts had not been so near. A little while longer, and this vessel, sent out expressly to capture one of our frigates, would have mounted in the air, as the Guerriere and Java had done before her. Admiral Hotham has admitted our vessel was captured by a "detachment of his majesty's ships," and if the tower guns are fired, the world will laugh at the occasion.

We have rather doubted the policy of, at present, sending out our frigates. By small vessels, from 16 to 20 guns, we can make the best impression on the enemy. Our naval glory is established, and we should contend on the ocean only as may most affect the interests of the enemy, and induce him to peace.

The Yankee privateer, of Bristol, R. I. owned by J. D'Wolf, esq. is about 168 tons, carries one long 12, and 14 carronades, 12, 9 and 6 pounders. It has been estimated that this vessel, (to say nothing of her present cruise, in which among others she captured the late India ship General Wellesley) has captured and destroyed British property to the amount of three millions of dollars, of which about one half has arrived in the United States, paying duties to the amount of $200,000.

New privateers are daily pushing out from our several ports. There will be a precious tale told at Jloyd's before three months. Many valuable merchant vessels with rich cargoes arrive from the West Indies, with colonial produce, dry goods, &c. &c. Among the privateers that have recently sailed we notice the Avon, the Champlain, the Ludlow and the Tomahawk, strong and powerful vessels, full manned.

The late U. S. frigate Chesapeake has been put in commission by the British—rated as a 38, George Burdett, captain.

The Sylph.—We have the dreadful particulars of the shipwreck of this vessel off Long Island. Only the purser and 5 seamen were saved, and they by the great humanity and exertions of the people of Southampton. They have since arrived at New-York. The rest of her officers and crew, 111 in number, perished in the sea! Many of their bodies have been cast on the shore, and decently interred. The kindness of the people of Southampton has been very handsomely acknowledged by admiral Hotham, who has promised to make the best return for it in his power; and has commenced his shew of gratitude by releasing the crew of a vessel that belonged there. There is something pleasing in this. Though, one after another, we have no manner of objection to every British vessel coming ashore like the Sylph; yet we have no wish for such destruction of their crews, and would have those (even if each were a Cockburn) who reached us in this manner, treated with all tenderness and charity. The Sylph was a ship of 390 tons, carrying 20 guns, viz. 16 24lb. carronades, 2 12lb. ditto, and 2 long 12's.

Proceedings of Congress.

IN SENATE.

Saturday, January 23.—A bill was passed requiring a colonel to every regiment of militia in the United States. The bill to prohibit intercourse with the enemy was ordered to a third reading.

Monday, January 30.—The bill in addition to the act for laying out and making a road from Cumberland in Md. to the state of Ohio, being on its third reading—

Mr. Smith of Md. moved to fill the blank for the amount of additional appropriation to be made, with the words "one hundred thousand dollars." This motion was decided as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Darbour, Bibb, Brown, Chace, Condit, Fromentin, Gaillard, Goldsborough, Horsey, Kerr, Morrow, Smith, Taft, Taylor, Turner, Varnum, Walker, Wharton—19.

NAYS—Messrs. King, Lambert, Mason, Robinson, Thompson, Wells—5.

The bill was then passed and sent to the house.

The bill from the house to prohibit intercourse with the enemy, was read a third time, and passed, with amendments, which were sent to the house for their concurrence therein.

Monday, January 30. Mr. Coles, the president's secretary, returned the bill "to incorporate the subscribers to the Bank of the United States of America," with the following message:

To the senate of the United States.

Having bestowed on the bill, entitled "An act to incorporate the subscribers to the bank of the United States of America," that full consideration which is due to the great importance of the subject, and dictated by the respect which I feel for the two houses of congress, I am constrained, by a deep and solemn conviction, that the bill ought not to become a law, to return it to the senate, in which it originated, with my objections to the same.

Waring the question of the constitutional authority of the legislature to establish an incorporated bank, as being precluded, in my judgment, by repeated recognitions, under varied circumstances, of the validity of such an institution, in acts of the legislative, executive, and judicial branches of the government, accompanied by indications, in different modes, of a concurrence of the general will of the nation; the proposed bank does not appear to be calculated to answer the purposes of reviving the public credit, of providing a national medium of circulation, and of aiding the treasury by facilitating the indispensable anticipations of the revenue, and by affording to the public more durable loans.

1. The capital of the bank is to be compounded of specie, of public stock, and of treasury notes convertible into stock, with a certain proportion of each of which every subscriber is to furnish himself.

The amount of the stock to be subscribed will not, it is believed, be sufficient to produce, in favor of the public credit, any considerable or lasting elevation of the market price, whilst this may be occasionally depressed by the bank itself, if it should carry into the market the allowed proportion of its capital consisting of public stock, in order to procure specie, which it may find its account in procuring, with some sacrifice on that part of its capital.

Nor will any adequate advantage arise to the public credit from the subscription of treasury notes. The actual issue of these notes nearly equals, at present, and will soon exceed the amount to be subscribed to the bank. The direct effect of this operation is simply to convert fifteen millions of treasury notes, into fifteen millions of six per cent. stock, with the collateral effect of promoting an additional demand for treasury notes, beyond what might otherwise be negotiable:

Public credit might indeed be expected to derive advantage from the establishment of a national bank, without regard to the formation of its capital, if the full aid and co-operation of the institution were secured to the government during the war, and during the period of its fiscal embarrassments. But the bank proposed will be free from all obligations to co-operate with the public measures; and whatever might be the patriotic disposition of its directors to contribute to the removal of those embarrassments, and to invigorate the prosecution of the war, fidelity to the pecuniary and general interests of the institution, according to their estimate of it, might oblige them to decline a connection of their operations with those of the national treasury, during the continuance of the war and the difficulties incident to it. Temporary sacrifices of interest, though overbalanced by the future and permanent profits of the charter, not being requirable of right in behalf of the public, might not be gratuitously made; and the bank would reap the full benefit of the grant, whilst the public would lose the equivalent expected from it. For it must be kept in view, that the sole inducement to such a grant, on the part of the public, would be the prospect of substantial aids to its pecuniary means at the present crisis, and during the sequel of the war. It is evident that the stock of the bank will, on the return of peace, if not sooner, rise in the market to a value which, if the bank were established in a period of peace, would authorise and obtain for the public a bonus to a very large amount. In lieu of such a bonus the government is fairly entitled to, and ought not to relinquish or risk, the needful services of the bank, under the pressing circumstances of war.

2. The bank, as proposed to be constituted, cannot be relied on during the war, to provide a circulating medium, nor to furnish loans, or anticipations of the public revenue.

Without a medium, the taxes cannot be collected; and in the absence of specie, the medium understood to be the best substitute, is that of notes issued by a national bank. The proposed bank will commence and conduct its operations, under an obligation to pay its notes in specie, or be subject to the loss of its charter. Without such an obligation, the notes of the bank, though not exchangeable for specie, yet resting on good pledges, and performing the uses of specie, in the payment of taxes, and in other public transactions, would, as experience has ascertained, qualify the bank to supply at once a circulating medium, and pecuniary aids to the government. Under the fetters imposed by the bill, it is manifest, that during the actual state of things and probably during the war, the period particularly requiring such a medium and such a resource for loans and advances to the government, notes for which the bank would be compellable to give specie in exchange could not be kept in circulation. The most the bank could effect, and the most it could be expected to aim at, would be to keep the institution alive by limited and local transactions, which, with the interest on the public stock in the bank, might yield a dividend sufficient for the purpose, until a change from war to peace should enable it, by a flow of specie into its vaults, and a removal of the external demand for it, to derive its contemplated emoluments from a safe and full extension of its operations.

On the whole, when it is considered that the proposed establishment will enjoy a monopoly of the profits of a national bank, for a period of twenty years; that the monopolized profits will be continually growing with the progress of the national population and wealth; that the nation will during the same period, be dependent on the notes of the bank for that species of circulating medium, whenever the precious metals may be wanted, and at all times for so much thereof as may be an eligible substitute for a specie medium; and that the extensive employment of the notes in the collection of the augmented taxes, will, moreover, enable the bank greatly to extend its profitable issues of them, without the expense of specie capital to support their circulation; it is reasonable as it is requisite, that the government, in return for these extraordinary concessions to the bank, should have a greater security for attaining the public objects of the institution, than is presented in the bill, and particularly for every practicable accommodation both in the temporary advances necessary to anticipate the taxes, and in those more durable loans which are equally necessary to diminish the resort to taxes.

In discharging this painful duty of stating objections to a measure which has undergone the deliberations and received the sanction of the two houses of the national legislature, I console myself with the reflection, that if they have not the weight which I attach to them, they can be constitutionally overruled; and with a confidence that, in a contrary event, the wisdom of congress will hasten to substitute a more commensurate and certain provision for the public exigencies.

JAMES MADISON.

Tuesday, January 31.—On proceeding to reconsider the bill, returned by the president "to incorporate the subscribers to the bank of the United States of America," the said bill and the objections of the president thereto were read; when, after some debate, the further consideration thereof was, on motion of Mr. Barbour, postponed to Thursday next, by the following vote:

For the postponement	16
Against it	13

The bill giving further time to the purchasers of public lands to complete the payments therefor, was read a third time and passed.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Thursday, Jan. 26.—Mr. Plessants from the committee of naval affairs, to whom was referred the bill from the senate to authorize the president of the United States to cause to be built, equipped and employed, one or more floating batteries for the defence of the waters of the United States, reported the same without amendment, and the bill was twice read and committed.

On motion of Mr. Taylor, the committee of military affairs was instructed to enquire into the expediency of repealing or amending so much of the act for establishing rules and articles for the government of the armies of the United States, as relates to the infliction of corporal punishment.

On motion of the same gentleman, the committee of ways and means were instructed to enquire into the expediency of imposing a duty on silver plate and jewelry manufactured for sale, in the hands of the manufacturer.

The house proceeded to the consideration of the bill from the senate authorizing the purchase of the library of Thomas Jefferson.

A motion was made to postpone the bill indefinitely—lost: ayes 66, nays 73. A motion was then made to postpone it until the 4th of March—lost: ayes 68, nays 74. The bill being then stated on its passage, Mr. King made a proposition for a new section providing for a selection of the books—lost: ayes 56. Many motions and speeches were made, not worth the room it would take to record them, and the bill finally passed—ayes 81, nays 71.

Friday, Jan. 27.—Many private petitions were presented and disposed of, and some minor business was done; but the house was chiefly employed on the bill to authorise payment for property lost, captured or destroyed by the enemy whilst in the military service of the United States, which passed through a committee of the whole and was reported to the house.

Saturday, Jan. 28.—This day was principally spent in discussing the bill for paying for property lost or destroyed in the service of the United States. The clerk of the house, Patrick Magruder, in a letter to the speaker, assigned his reasons therefor, and resigned his office.

Monday, January 30.—A variety of business of little general interest was done this day. Thomas Dougherty was elected clerk of the house.

Tuesday, Jan. 31. The amendments of the senate to the bill for preventing intercourse with the enemy were concurred in—so that it wants only the signature of the president to become a law.

The house then took up the bill for the support of government for the year 1815—(civil list) and considerable time was spent thereon.

Wednesday, Feb. 1. Mr. Moore of Md. presented a memorial of the committee of vigilance and safety of the city and precincts of Baltimore, representing the defenceless situation of that city, and praying that a force may be provided adequate to their defence during the next campaign—Referred to the committee on military affairs.

Mr. Eppes, from the same committee, reported a bill to provide additional revenue for defraying the expenses of government and maintaining the public credit, by laying a duty on gold, silver and plated ware, and jewelry and paste work, manufactured within the United States; which was twice read and committed.

The house resumed the consideration of the report of the committee of the whole, on the bill making appropriations for the support of government for the year 1815; and on the question to concur in the amendment to strike out the two items for the support of the office of superintendent general of military supplies, after much debate, the vote stood as follows, by yeas and nays:

For the amendment	61
Against it	85

So the house refused to concur in this amendment. And the bill was, after being further amended, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading—And then the house adjourned.

☞ The senate, on Thursday refused its assent to the passage of the bill to establish a national bank, as returned by the president. Yeas 15, nays 19.

Nothing important occurred in the house.

Sale of the French ships at Antwerp.

ANTWERP, Aug. 13.—The subjoined 11 French ships of war, not having been finished within the time (6 weeks after the signing of peace) limited by the treaty of Paris, were put to sale by auction, this morning, as they stood on the stocks in our dock yard. It is singular that very little publicity was given to the intended sale. The conditions were not printed but written. They consisted of eleven articles. All the timber, copper, iron, or other materials lying round the ships were included in the same lot with the vessel. Five months allowed them from the 1st inst. to break up. Half of the purchase money to be paid within two days in hard cash, the remainder within one month; but marine bons issued for the pay of the navy, were to be taken in payment for one moiety of the sum.—The sale to be definitive only 24 hours afterwards. The lots to be knocked down to-morrow (the day after the sale) to the highest bidder of this day, unless an advance be made on the last bidding, or the offer made altogether declined by the vendors. The ships were put up in the following order; but without a single bidding being made by those present:—Morarque, of 120 guns, 3-4ths completed, put up at 230,000 francs, and bought in at 120,000, or about 6,000*l*. Neptune, 110 guns, 10-24ths completed, bought in at 110,000 francs. Fougues, 80 guns, 6-24ths completed, bought in at 100,000 francs. Belliqueux, 74 guns, 17-24ths completed, bought in at 100,000 francs. Alcide, 74 guns, 6-24ths completed, bought in at 80,000 francs. Aigle, 74 guns, 6-34ths completed, bought in at 80,000 frs. Impetueux, 74 guns, 6-24ths completed, bought in at 80,000 francs. L'Inconstant, 74 guns, 9-24ths completed, put up at 80,000, and bought in at 60,000 francs. Ruppel, (number of guns not stated) 2-24ths completed, put up at 80,000 and bought in at 50,000 francs. It is expected that the sale to-morrow will pass without a bidding, in which case all the timber will go to France.

NEW ORLEANS.—Another letter from Mr. Fromentin contains the following particulars abstracted from several letters addressed to him.

January 1, by way of a "new-year's gift" the enemy, from his new battery, commenced a heavy discharge of cannon—the compliment was amply returned, and he was soon silenced. A 32 pounder from a battery commanded by commodore Patterson killed 15 of them at one shot. The Louisiana this day fired 700 shot. British loss stated at 200—ours 10 killed and 20 wounded. The enemy's sailors appear to be landed to serve his guns.

The British are reported to be commanded by sir Thomas Picton, who has arrived since they first landed, and it is said that reinforcements are expected. But Hopkins and Adair had arrived, and the 3d reg. of regulars, 900 strong, were momentarily expected from Mobile. We have yet the command of lake Ponchartrain. In the garrison of fort Coquille, 100 of Lafitte's men are on duty. ☞ The Kentuckians have been furnished with the arms of the exempts of New Orleans.

All is patriotism. The very mons have thrown open their doors to receive and take care of the wounded; and every convenience that the city can furnish is afforded to its defenders.

☞ This letter, at length, may be inserted in our next.

We have advices from Savannah to the 24th. It was expected they would evacuate St. Mary's on the 20th, having got all the plunder on board. They are said to have received a good many "allies" there. The barbarians have not disgraced themselves—this is impossible—they have only added fresh causes for us to hate and detest them.

☞ There is a report, by way of Amelia, that a war between France and England, was immediately expected, on account of the former insisting on a possession of the Netherlands.

An attack on Savannah was still expected—but the due preparation appears to have been made to repel it.

TERMS OF THE REGISTER.

Subscriptions are received as follows:

If a complete copy be desired, they must pay 22 dollars—that is, 20 dollars for four years subscription up to September, 1815, and two dollars for two extra supplements (of twelve sheets each) one already published for the 5th, and the other in the press for the 7th volume.

The 2nd volume began with March, 1812; the 3d with Sept.; the 4th with March, 1813; the 5th with Sept.; the 6th with March, 1814; and the 7th with Sept. last; if desired to begin with either of these, (the 7th excepted) the subscriber must pay for the volumes required at the rate of two dollars and fifty cents each, and also five dollars in advance for the current year. If he begins with the first or second volume he must, likewise, pay the two dollars required for the supplements—but if he commences with any other than these volumes, or at the present or any future time, he may receive these supplements, or not, as he pleases.

The volumes are so carefully packed that they reach the most distant post-office safely—but the cash must be paid before the work can be forwarded. They are rated as newspapers, for postage, by order of the post-master-general.

Additional patronage is requested; the editor hopes to improve or add to the value of the work as his means are increased.

☞ All letters to the editor must be post-paid.

New-England Convention.

No. V.

The following article from the Boston Patriot of the 21st January, ult. so fully takes the ground, in one respect, that I myself intended to occupy, that I adopt it totis verbis, and publish it entire. As it regards the part that the New-England states have in the power of government, though this essay is, in some points more full, I do not know that it more clearly shews their undue preponderance than the article published in the WEEKLY REGISTER, on the 23d of December last. It is, however, a very curious paper, and well deserves a careful inspection.

The alleged commercial pre eminence of New-England considered

In my last I examined in part the boastful pretensions of New-England to an exclusive or a preponderating interest in commerce. It is of the highest importance that the people should be correctly informed on this subject at the present time. Every engine of faction is at work to produce a forcible separation of the states; a measure pregnant with such certain ruin to this part of the country, that the project is utterly inexplicable on any other principles than those which I have before stated. If would at a single blow prostrate at least two-thirds, perhaps three-fourths of our shipping interest; it would throw one-half of our commercial capital out of employment, which would immediately be transferred to the cities of the south, and the rich country to the west; it would ruin three-fourths of our manufacturing establishments, and diminish the permanent value of real estate throughout the country, while that on our seaboard, and especially in our most considerable trading towns, would sink to one-half of its common peace price. It would entail on New-England either with a nominal independence the permanent charge of a large and expensive national civil list, with an army and navy, or leave her in a state of colonial vassalage to some power which could afford to protect her. These are some of the certain consequences of a dissolution of the union. It is impossible that these projects should spring from patriotism. They can only originate in views of personal aggrandizement. The aristocratic faction of Boston have lost all hope of dictating to the union, and they prefer a secure dominion in New-England, shorn, as she will be, of half her strength and all her glory, to continuing longer a despised and suspected minority under the general government. In the true spirit of the arch fiend, they say,

Better to reign in hell than serve in Heaven; and well may they emblazon on their banners the words of the Prince of Discord—

Have, and spoil, and ruin are my gain.

The incessant labors of this desperate and unprincipled faction have for years been devoted to complete this work of treason and desolation. Under color of defending the rights of New-England, they have been pursuing plans of personal aggrandizement, and have incessantly sought to establish their own power upon the ruins of their country. I will now proceed to examine further their lofty claims of commercial pre-eminence. With these claims it will be recollected that the complaint that the interests of New-England have not been fully represented in the government of the union, has been constantly associated. The reader will therefore doubtless be gratified to see the commercial representation of the different sections of the country brought into comparison. This is done in the following calculation:

Exports of the State of Maryland, Virginia, North, and South Carolina, and Georgia—the southern section of the union—for ten years, beginning 1791, and ending 1800, were in value	Dolls. 175,039,000
The exports of the New-England states including articles both of foreign and domestic growth and manufacture for the same term	97,921,000

Difference in favor of southern states,	Dolls. 82,017,000
---	-------------------

During the whole of this period, New-England had 29 members in the house of representatives, and 10 in the senate, making an aggregate of 39 in both houses. This is one member for $261,594 of exports annually. The southern states had 35 representatives and 10 senators—45 in both houses; which is one member for $388,975 of annual exports. In these exports it is to be recollected there are included productions of foreign growth and manufacture, first imported into the United States and then re-exported. New-England had vastly the greatest share in this trade. If these were deducted, the comparison would be much more to her disadvantage.

Exports of native produce from Maryland, Virginia, &c. between the years 1808 and 1811.	Dolls. 125,262,000
Exports of native produce from the New-England states, during the same term,	62,234,000

Difference in favor of the southern states	Dolls. 63,028,000
--	-------------------

During this term the eastern states had 35 representatives and 10 senators—45 members in both houses; which is one for $197,468 of annual native exports. The southern states had 55 representatives and 10 senators, in both houses 65—which is one member for $275,301 of native exports annually.

Exports from Maryland, Virginia, &c. for three years, 1811–12 and 13.	Dolls. 42,114,000
Exports of productions of domestic manufacture from New-England for the same term,	16,415,600

--	-------------------

New-England has at present 41 members in the house of representatives and 10 in the senate, to watch over the interests of her trade—51 in both houses. This allows her one member for 107,243 dollars of annual exports. The southern states have 60 representatives and 10 senators, 70 in both houses—which is one member for 200,542 dollars.

Suppose then that the representation instead of being fixed as at present, had been established on principles purely commercial. Our exports may fairly be assumed a true representation of our permanent and substantial interests in commerce.—Thus allowing the representation of the southern states to remain as heretofore, and we should have the following results as far as New-England is affected, in the periods above considered. From 1791 to 1800, both years included, our representation will appear from the following proportion:

As $175,038,000 exports of southern states is to 45, the number of members in both houses of congress; so is 92,021,000 exports of New-England to 23 members, instead of 39, the number we actually sent—then we should have lost 16 members.

2. Term from 1803 to 1810—

As 125,262,000 : 65 :: 62,254,000 : 32 instead of 45, which we had. In this instance we should have lost 13 members.

3. Term from 1811 to 1813—

As 42,114,000 : 70 :: 16,415,000 : 27 instead of 51, our present number. Here our loss would have been 24. The haughty and supercilious Bostonians complain that their great commercial interests are not represented, yet these calculations proceed on the principle that the basis of representation is wholly commercial. The amount of exports is the fairest basis that can be taken. This shews our interest in trade, because this is what we have to sell.

Let us now view the subject in relation to the whole United States, and see if New England commerce has been defrauded of its full weight in the national councils. The exports of the United States from 1791 to 1800 amounted to 475,726,000 dollars in value. The whole number of senators were 28, of representatives 103—aggregate 131.

As 475,726,000 : 131 :: 92,021,000 : 25.

Thus would New England on this plan have been entitled to but 25 members in both houses, instead of 39, the actual number. I answer, if these calumniated states of the south would not have gained something of what we lost. Their exports will be seen above.

As 475,726,000 : 131 :: 175,038,000 : 49.

Their real number was 45, a gain of 3 out of the 14 we should have lost. Enough, and more than enough has been said to silence, if not to satisfy, the most arrogant driveller of faction.

The proper basis of representation, it is admitted, is population—free population, if you choose, to be distributed according to numbers. Let it be granted on this principle, that the slave representation is a real injury. Before we resort to a violent remedy it is at least prudent to ascertain the magnitude of the evil. To enable my reader to judge for himself, I lay before him the following data. If my calculations are inaccurate he can correct them.

By the census for 1790 the free population of the United States was 3,231,629; of this the New England States had 1,005,636. The whole number of representatives was 103. The following proportion shews the number of members which New-England would have had in the lower house had the representation been distributed according to the numbers of free inhabitants.

As 3,231,629 : 103 :: 1,005,636 : 32.

She had in fact but 29—loss 3.

2d. 1800—Whole free population of the United States, 4,406,817. In New England 1,231,672—whole number of representatives 141.

As 4,406,817 : 141 :: 1,231,672 : 39—The real number was 35—loss of 4.

3d. 1810—Free population of the United States, 6,048,530; of New England 1,471,973. The whole number of representatives 181.

As 6,048,530 : 181 :: 1,471,973 : 44.

New England has now but 41 members in the House. She has, therefore, three less than she would have, were there no representation for slaves. Now I appeal to any prudent man to say, whether this inequality, admitting the wrong in its full extent, is an evil that demands violent measures to redress it. If it shall be determined that it is, let me intreat the good people of New England for one moment to pause. We have heard that our constitution was framed in a spirit of compromise; that there were jarring prejudices to be conciliated, and discordant interests to be harmonized. Let us look a moment and see if we can find some compensation for their loss. If the reader will raise his eye to the difference of our exports as stated above, he will, perhaps, should his complexion be aristocratic, find something. If his notions are at all of the democratic, here let him go with me for satisfaction, to the senate. The inequality of representation in this branch of the government is incomparably greater than in the house. For instance, Rhode-Island with 76,931 free inhabitants, has two senators; and Pennsylvania with 810,091 has no more. Were she represented in proportion to Rhode-Island, she would have 23; so that she sustains a comparative loss of 21 in the senate. This inequality has never been a subject of complaint in New-England. The reason will appear from the following statements. New-England has constantly had 10 members in the senate, while, had the representation in this branch been proportioned to the free population, she would have had but 8 from 1790 to 1800, but 9 from 1800 to 1810, and but 8 from 1810 to 1820. In the proportions which follow, the first term expresses the whole free population of the United States, the second the whole number of the senators, the third the free population of New-England, and the fourth the number of senators to which her population would entitle her on the supposition that the number of senators were distributed according to the number of free inhabitants.

1st census of 1790, As 3,231,629 : 28 :: 1,005,636 : 8,677
3d do. 1810, 6,048,589 : 36 :: 1,471,973 : 8,760.

The result is, 8, 9 and 8, with a fraction in each case.

The following table shews the loss in the house and the gain in the senate under each census.

Loss in the house.
1790, 3 in 103, or 2 9-10 per cent.
1800, 4 in 141, or 2 8-10 per cent.
1810, 3 in 181, or 1 6-10 per cent.
Gain in the senate.
1790, 1 ⁷⁶⁷/₁₀₀₀ in 28, or 4 7-10 per cent.
1800, 5-10 in 34, or 1 4-10 per cent.
1810, 124 ¹²⁴/₁₀₀ in 36, or 4 00 per cent.

Balance of Gain, in 1790, 1 8-10 per cent.
Loss, 1800, 1 4-10 per cent.
Gain, 1810, 2 4-10 per cent.

Deducting the balance of loss in the second term from the gain in the first and third, and it leaves to New-England a clear advantage of 2 8-10 per cent. in the representation in both houses. It must be recollected that our gain is their loss. This then must be doubled to express the true amount of our advantage over the rest of the union in the present scheme of representation. Thus we find that the real balance in our favor is 5 6-10 per cent. since the establishment of the government, and 4 8-10 per cent. in the present congress. Under these circumstances, it requires something more than an ordinary share of impudence to complain, that the principles upon which representation is fixed by our constitution, affect injuriously the rights of New-England.

I had proceeded thus far, before the doings of the Hartford convention were made public. They avail themselves, as might be expected, of the popular clamor respecting the representation for slaves. An amendment of the constitution is proposed, which alters the representation in the lower house, so that the number from each state shall be in proportion to the freemen. Not a word, however, is said of the infinitely greater inequality that results from giving to each state an equal voice in the senate. They are not contented with the certain and solid advantages New England already possesses over the rest of the union. They must be grasping for more. If the representation in the lower house is changed, that in the senate must and will be changed with it. I cannot conceive a more flagrant instance of folly and impudence, than the Rhode-Island members of the convention of the convention were guilty of when they signed this report. She has now an advantage, over the rest of the union, of 100 per cent. in the national councils; for her free population would, if this amendment were adopted, entitle her to but two representatives, and if the principle were carried to the representation of the senate, she could never have a single member in that house. Yet these modest gentlemen, Mr. Daniel Lyman, Mr. Samuel Ward, Mr. Edward Manton and Mr. Benjamin Hazard, recommended to the state "to persevere in its efforts till this amendment is effected." Let Rhode Island do it, and she puts the seal to an instrument that will perpetuate her own insignificance.

The Olive Branch.

The author of this popular little volume has honored the editor of the WEEKLY REGISTER, by presenting to him a copy of the second edition, considerably enlarged and invaluable improved. There is, perhaps, no book extant that in so small a compass, contains so great a quantity of momentous political truth. Like the two edged sword, said to have been wielded by the angel of light against "Satan and his legions," it dispels and puts to flight the army of error and of falsehood that jacobinism had collected to war against the constitution: and I trust that it, with the contemporaneous labors of others devoted to the same object, may bind the deceiver in "chains of adamant," and consign him forever to the "bottomless pit," where there is "weeping and wailing and gnashing of teeth."

The compliments that the author has been pleased to pass upon the editor of the REGISTER, and his publication, has really and honestly restrained me from offering to him and his work that tribute of public admiration which I thought it deserved. But I cannot decline to recommend it to the earnest perusal of all my countrymen, desirous to know the truth and fearing it not—and especially to those of the eastern states. It may well serve as a hand book for the honest politician.

In two or three places, particularly in page 163, the author of the Olive Branch refers to a pamphlet I wrote several years ago, entitled "Things as they are;" or, as he has it in that page, "Things by their right names." As he makes certain quotations on my authority and name, it becomes me to say, that the extracts for that pamphlet were made by me from the original papers they import to have appeared in. I presume their correctness never will be denied.

We propose to enrich our numbers by liberal extracts from the "OLIVE BRANCH."

Impressed Seamen.

In the more recent outrages of the enemy, that come nearer to our homes, the enormity of the conduct of Great Britain towards our seamen, is partially forgotten. The case inserted in our last is well calculated to call forth our indignation against the merchandise.

When war was declared by the United States, every Englishman had liberty to return to his home. We detained none, though they came to us voluntarily. This was right. It was worthy of that character for justice that has marked the government of our country from its first establishment.

I believe I have mentioned the case before, but it is worth a repetition—that, when war was made the second time with France, Bonaparte detained, as prisoners, certain English men who happened to be in his empire, at the time, as spies or visitors. Who does not recollect the terrible outcry that this procedure excited against the "tyrant?" Whose ears were not stunned by the trumpeting of his baseness and crime? He was the grandest rascal and most finished villain that ever lived—the attributes of the devil himself were not diabolical enough to apply to his proceedings and conduct. So went on the British press in England and America.

Well—war between England and America takes place—We permit all her subjects to return home who wish it; we keep none against their consent, such as were made prisoners in the usual way excepted. But what does that civilized, religious, liberty loving and moral nation? She had in her fleet 10,000 Americans, impressed and held against their consent—she had had them for years, compelling their services without pay or a prospect of release!—They refuse to fight against their country—they are flogged and starved, if bribery fails, to obedience—and if these sufferings and indignities will not do, they are cast into prison as "incorrigible dogs," and there treated with double raucor and malignity. Hundreds have perished under the lash and for want of food for their "obstinacy"—thousands, unable to bear the torture, have received the "thirty pieces of silver"—thousands have been cast into stinking dungeons—and thousands are yet denied that favor, being still held to "his majesty's service." Two are said to have perished in the Sylph, lately shipwrecked off Long Island; every government vessel whose crew we have mustered since the war, was found to have had more or less of them. I do not believe there is a ship in the British service without impressed Americans on board, even at this day. If Bonaparte was such a terrible wretch, what is the government of Great Britain? He neither forced the English to make prisoners of, to come into his territory, much less attempted to make them fight against their country, by stripes, starvation and chains. I have never said Napoleon Bonaparte was any thing else than a tyrant—but I repeat what I have often said, that his deeds were angelic compared with those of our barbarian enemy.

The act of making prisoners of war of the persons spoken of, is full evidence that the British officers held them to service knowing them to be impressed American seamen who has refused the "king's bounty:"—for had they received that, they would have become "liege subjects of his majesty" in the space of two years. But Great Britain complains of our naturalization laws! The history of Algers furnishes nothing so abominable as the proceedings of Great Britain towards the seamen of the United States. Yet, even with us, she is held up as the model of virtue! O shame, shame, shame.

Legislature of Massachusetts.

[In consequence of the resolutions attached to the following report, three persons have been appointed to proceed to Washington city for the purposes therein stated.]

January 24—The hon. Mr. WHITE, from a committee on the subject, made the following report to the senate; which was read and ordered to be printed:

The committee of both houses to whom was referred the message of his excellency the governor, and the documents therewith transmitted, have had the same under consideration, and beg leave to report in part:

THAT the expediency of having invited a convention of delegates from the New-England States is fully proved by the result of their labors communicated with his excellency's message. In times of unprecedented embarrassment and distress, there can indeed be no better mode of discovering the means of relief, or of preparing for inevitable consequences, than to resort to the deliberate and united counsels of the wisest and most faithful men of the community; men who have an interest in common with all their fellow-citizens in the subjects of their deliberation, and who will act with a firm and enlightened regard to the good of the whole, and under the highest responsibility. However sensibly such men may feel the importance of timely resisting oppression, and averting impending calamities, their counsels will be tempered by an accurate understanding of past political transactions, by a sound perception of the nature of existing sources of complaint, and by a careful inquiry as to events which time may unfold.

The committee entertain a high sense of the wisdom and ability with which the convention of delegates have discharged their arduous trust. While they maintain the principle of state sovereignty, and of the duties which citizens owe to their respective state governments, they give the most satisfactory proofs of attachment to the constitution of the United States, and to the national union; and while with the undaunted freedom, which they inherit from their ancestors, they express their disapprobation of the measures which have produced our public calamities, and especially of the unnecessary and ruinous war in which we are involved, they manifest a determination, which the people will support, that our country must be defended at every hazard against invasion and conquest. The people will thus find new reasons for approving the confidence reposed in their delegates, in discerning through their report the proper course to be pursued, in their relation to the federal constitution, in sustaining their allegiance to the state governments, and in defending themselves against the public enemy; but above all, in the recognition of duties, which they owe to their creator, to themselves, and to posterity and which are founded in higher authority than any earthly government can claim.

As the exposition of the views and sentiments of that convention is clear and intelligible, the committee deem it unnecessary to enlarge upon the considerations which entitle them to the approbation and support of the legislature; or to repeat the arguments contained in the very able report of their proceedings for adopting the measures by them recommended.

The committee therefore respectfully submit the following resolves. D. A. WHITE, per order.

Resolved, That the legislature of Massachusetts, do highly approve the proceedings of the convention of delegates from the states of Massachusetts, Connecticut, and Rhode Island, and the counties of Cheshire and Grafton, in the state of New-Hampshire, and the county of Windham, in the state of Vermont, convened at Hartford, on the 15th day of December, in the year 1814; and that the advice and recommendation therein given are entitled to, and shall receive the most respectful consideration of this legislature.

Resolved, That his excellency the governor be, and he hereby is authorised and empowered to appoint commissioners to proceed immediately to the seat of the national government, and in pursuance of such instructions as his excellency may think proper to give them, to make an earnest application to the government of the United States, requesting their consent to some arrangement, whereby the state of Massachusetts, separately, or in concert with neighbouring states, may be enabled to assume the defence of their territories against the enemy; and that to this end a reasonable portion of the taxes collected within said states may be paid into the respective treasuries thereof, and appropriated to the payment of the balance due to the said states, and to the future defence of the same: The amount, so paid into the said treasuries, to be credited, and the disbursements so made as aforesaid to be charged to the United States.

The legislature of Connecticut has also passed like resolutions, and appointed delegates to Washington. They have further adopted all the amendments to the constitution of the U. S. as recommended by the Hartford convention, and directed them to be transmitted to the several state legislatures, &c. as usual.

Events of the War.

"Advance our waving colors on the walls, Rescued is Orleans from the English wolves."

SHAKESPEARE, HENRY VI.*

GLORIOUS FROM NEW-ORLEANS.

The leading facts contained in the following letters, independent of the high character that some of them bear as being official, are supported by such

*We are indebted for this happy quotation to a writer in the Democratic Press, who adds "Who then [when Shakespeare wrote them] imagined they were ever to be applied to the New World and New Orleans!"

a host of testimony that the most sceptical cannot refuse entire belief to them, however extraordinary some of the parts may appear. Glory be to God, that the barbarians have been defeated, and that at Orleans the intended plunderers have found their grave!—Glory to Jackson, Carroll and Coffee, and the hardy and gallant Tennesseans, Kentuckians and Louisianians who “seized opportunity by the forelock” to “demonstrate” what freemen can do in defence of their altars and firesides. Glory to the militia, that the “soldiers of Wellington,” the boastful conquerors of the legions of France, have shrunk from the liberty-directed bullets of the high-souled sons of the west! Sons of freedom—saviors of Orleans—benefactors of your country and avengers of its wrongs, all hail! Hail glorious people—worthy, thrice worthy, to enjoy the blessings which heaven in bounteous profusion has heaped on your country! Never may its luxuriant soil be trodden unrevenged by insolent foreigners in arms!

The mail which is expected this evening will probably give the finish of the attack.

Copy of a letter from major-general Jackson to the secretary of war, dated Camp, 4 miles below Orleans, 9th Jan. 1815.

SIR—During the days of the 6th and 7th, the enemy had been actively employed in making preparations for an attack on my lines. With infinite labor they had succeeded on the night of the 7th in getting their boats across from the lake to the river, by widening and deepening the canal on which they had effected their disembarkation. It had not been in my power to impede these operations by a general attack: added to other reasons, the nature of the troops under my command, mostly militia, rendered it too hazardous to attempt extensive offensive movements in an open country, against a numerous and well disciplined army. Although my forces, as to number, had been increased by the arrival of the Kentucky division, my strength had received very little addition; a small portion only of that detachment being provided with arms. Compelled thus to wait the attack of the enemy, I took every measure to repel it when it should be made, and to defeat the object he had in view. General Morgan, with the New Orleans contingent, the Louisiana militia and a strong detachment of the Kentucky troops, occupied an entrenched camp on the opposite side of the river, protected by strong batteries on the bank, erected and superintended by commodore Patterson.

In my encampment every thing was ready for action, when, early on the morning of the 8th, the enemy after throwing a heavy shower of bombs and Congreve rockets, advanced their columns on my right and left, to storm my entrenchments. I cannot speak sufficiently in praise of the firmness and deliberation with which my whole line received their approach—more could not have been expected from veterans inured to war. For an hour the fire of the small arms was as incessant and severe as can be imagined. The artillery, too, directed by officers who displayed equal skill and courage, did great execution. Yet the columns of the enemy continued to advance with a firmness which reflects upon them the greatest credit. Twice the column which approached me on my left, was repulsed by the troops of general Carroll, those of general Coffee, and a division of the Kentucky militia, and twice they formed again and renewed the assault. At length, however, cut to pieces, they fled in confusion from the field, leaving it covered with their dead and wounded. The loss which the enemy sustained on this occasion, cannot be estimated at less than 1500 in killed, wounded and prisoners. Upwards of three hundred have already been delivered over for burial; and my men are still engaged in picking them up within my lines and carrying them to the point where the enemy are to receive them. This is in addition to the dead and wounded whom the enemy have been enabled to carry from the field, during and since the action, and to those who have since died of the wounds they received. We have taken about 500 prisoners, upwards of 300 of whom are wounded, and a great part of them mortally. My loss has not exceeded, and I believe has not amounted to ten killed and as many wounded. The entire destruction of the enemy's army was now inevitable, had it not been for an unfortunate occurrence which at this moment took place on the other side of the river. Simultaneously with his advance, upon my lines, he had thrown over in his boats a considerable force to the other side of the river. These having landed were hardy enough to advance against the works of general Morgan; and what is strange and difficult to account for, at the very moment when their entire discomfiture was looked for with a confidence approaching to certainty, the Kentucky reinforcements, ingloriously fled, drawing after them, by their example, the remainder of the forces; and thus yielding to the enemy that most fortunate position. The batteries which had rendered me, for many days, the most important service, though bravely defended, were of course now abandoned; not however, until the guns had been spiked.

This unfortunate route had totally changed the aspect of affairs. The enemy now occupied a position from which they might annoy us without hazard, and by means of which they might have been enabled to defeat, in a great measure, the effects of our success on this side the river. It became therefore an object of the first consequence to dislodge him as soon as possible. For this object, all the means in my power, which I could with any safety use, were immediately put in preparation. Perhaps, however, it was somewhat owing to another cause that I succeeded beyond my expectations. In negotiating the terms of a temporary suspension of hostilities to enable the enemy to bury their dead and provide for their wounded, I had required certain propositions to be acceded to as a basis; among which this was one—that although hostilities should cease on this side the river until 12 o'clock of this day, yet it was not to be understood that they should cease on the other side; but that no reinforcements should be sent across by either army until the expiration of that day. His excellency major-general Lambert begged time to consider of those propositions until 10 o'clock of to-day, and in the meantime re-crossed his troops. I need not tell you with how much eagerness I immediately regained possession of the position he had thus hastily quitted.

The enemy having concentrated his forces, may again attempt to drive me from my position by storm. Whenever he does, I have no doubt my men will act with their usual firmness, and sustain a character now become dear to them.

I have the honor to be,

With great respect,

Your obedient servant,

ANDREW JACKSON.

Maj. gen. com'd'g.

Head-quarters, left bank of the Mississippi,

5 miles below New Orleans, January 10, 1815.

SIR—I have the honor to make the following report of the killed, wounded and prisoners taken at the battle at Larond's plantation, on the left bank of the Mississippi, on the night of the 23d, December, 1814, seven miles below New Orleans.

Killed, left on the field of battle, 100
 Wounded, left on the field of battle, 230 Prisoners taken—1 major, 2 lieutenants, 1 mid-shipman, 66 non-commissioned officers and privates, making a grand total of 400.
 I have the honor to be, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

A. P. HAYNE, Insp. gen.

Major-general Andrew Jackson,
 commanding the army of the Mississippi.

Copy of a letter from major-general Jackson, to the secretary of war, dated head-quarters, 7th military district, camp, 4 miles below New-Orleans, Jan. 13.

Sir—At such a crisis, I conceive it my duty to keep you constantly advised of my situation.

On the 10th inst. I forwarded you an account of the bold attempt made by the enemy on the morning of the 8th to take possession of my works by storm, and of the severe repulse which he met with.
 That report having been sent by the mail which crosses the lake, may possibly have miscarried; for which reason, I think it the more necessary briefly to repeat the substance of it.

Early on the morning of the 8th, the enemy having been actively employed the two preceding days in making preparations for a storm, advanced in two strong columns on my right and left. They were received, however, with a firmness which, it seems they little expected, and which defeated all their hopes. My men, undisturbed by their approach, which indeed they long anxiously wished for, opened upon them a fire so deliberate and certain as rendered their scaling ladders and facines, as well as their more direct implements of warfare, perfectly useless. For upwards of an hour it was continued with a briskness of which there have been but few instances, perhaps, in any country. In justice to the enemy it must be said, they withstood it as long as could be expected from the most determined bravery. At length, however, when all prospect of success became hopeless, they fled in confusion from the field, leaving it covered with their dead and wounded. Their loss was immense. I had at first computed it as 1500; but it is since ascertained to have been much greater. Upon information, which is believed to be correct, col. Haynes, the inspector-general, reports it to be in total 2600. His report I enclose you. My loss was inconsiderable, being only 7* killed and 6 wounded. Such a disproportion in loss, when we consider the number and the kind of troops engaged, must, I know, excite astonishment, and may not every where be fully credited; yet I am perfectly satisfied that the account is not exaggerated on the one part, nor underrated on the other.

The enemy having hastily quitted a post which they had gained possession of, on the other side of the river, and we having immediately returned to it; both armies at present, occupy their former positions. Whether after the severe losses he has sustained, he is preparing to return to his shipping, or to make still mightier efforts to attain his first object, I do not pretend to determine. It becomes me to act as though the latter were his intention. One thing, however, seems certain, that if he still calculates on effecting what he has hitherto been unable to accomplish, he must expect considerable reinforcements; as the force with which he landed must undoubtedly be diminished by at least 3000. Besides the loss which he sustained on the night of the 23d ult. which is estimated at 400, he cannot have suffered less between that period and the morning of the 8th inst. than 3000—having, within that time, been repulsed in two general attempts to drive us from our position, and there having been continual cannonading and skirmishing, during the whole of it. Yet he is still able to shew a very formidable force.

There is little doubt that the commanding general, sir Edward Packenham was killed in the action of the 8th, and that major generals Keane and Gibbs were badly wounded.

Whenever a more leisure moment shall occur, I will take the liberty to make and forward you a more circumstantial account of the several actions, and particularly that of the 8th, in doing which my chief motive will be to render justice to those brave men
 I have the honor to command, and who have so remarkably distinguished themselves.

I have the honor to be, most respectfully, your obedient servant,

ANDREW JACKSON,

Maj. gen. commanding.

P. S. A correct list of my killed and wounded will be forwarded you by the adjutant general.

*Head-quarters, left bank of the Mississippi,

Sir—I have the honor to make the following report of the killed, wounded and prisoners, taken at the battle of Mac Pradies plantation, on the left bank of the Mississippi, on the morning of the 8th January, 1815, and 5 miles below the city of New Orleans.

 Wounded 1400

Prisoners taken, 1 major, 4 captains, 11 lieutenants, 1 ensign, 483 camp officers and privates, making a grand total of 2600.

I have the honor to be, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

A. P. HAYNE, Insp. Gen.

Major-general Andrew Jackson,
 commanding the army of the Mississippi.

*Copy of a letter from a gentleman in New-Orleans to

New-Orleans, 13th January, 1815.

Dear Sir,—Knowing the interest you must feel in the movements of the enemy in this quarter, I will now continue my account up to this date. In my last I mentioned a reinforcement daily expected by the enemy, which I now understand was at that time actually received by them at Cat Island, having arrived in a fleet of twenty-one sail, said to be from Portsmouth. This force is said to consist of 3000 men, and to be commanded by general Lambert, and probably forms the first brigade of their present army. On the 7th these troops were disembarked at the bayou Bienvenu. The enemy had now remained quiet for three or four days, keeping us in a state of uneasy suspense and fearful uncertainty. During this ominous interval, part of their forces was employed in preparing scaling ladders, and collecting facines (made of sugar canes) for their intended assault upon our lines; while others were digging a canal, communicating with that through which they entered, and extended to the levee, which, on the evening of the 7th, was cut through to admit the river. Through this canal they floated or dragged twenty-four of their smaller boats, supposed to contain twenty-five men each, and thus transported about 600 men to the opposite side of the river, some distance below the spot where we had constructed our batteries. These troops, under the command of colonel Thornton, were intended to make a dash at our batteries, and create a diversion on that side of the river, while the main attack was carried on on this side. Accordingly, before day-

*This was in the action on the line—afterwards a skirmishing was kept up in which a few more of our men were lost.

light on the morning of the 8th, they silently drew out a large force to storm our lines, their columns advancing unperceived in the obscurity of the morning, to within about half a mile of our camp, where they met and drove in our piquet guard. About day-break they advanced with great vivacity to the entrenchments, led gallantly on by their officers up to the very muzzle of our guns. Some of their men penetrated into our lines, where they were immediately killed or taken prisoners; many fell mounting the breast-works; others upon the works themselves, and the ditch in front, was, in many places, literally filled with dead and wounded. The roar of artillery from our lines was incessant, while an uninterrupted rolling fire was kept up from our muskets. The atmosphere was filled with sheets of fire and volumes of smoke. For an hour and a quarter the enemy obstinately continued the assault; fresh men constantly arriving to fill up their lines, thinned by our fire. Their determined perseverance and steady valor, were worthy a better cause; nor did their troops falter, until almost all the officers who led them on had fallen. They then retreated, leaving from 1500 to 2000 in killed, wounded and prisoners. In this number are included thirty-nine officers. On our side the loss was confined to about 20 men, 7 only of whom were killed. Though our extreme right was attacked with great vivacity, yet the principal assault was made on our left, where general Coffee's brigade of riflemen were stationed, and the carnage there was prodigious. Our men, covered by their breast-works, took steady and deliberate aim, and almost every shot told. The enemy drew out eight regiments to the attack, animated by the presence of their commander in chief, Pakenham, and led on by generals Gibbs and Keane.

In my former letter, I named to you six of these regiments, viz.—the 4th, 44th, 21st, 85th, 93d and 95th—to these were added the 7th regiment of Scotch fusileers, and the 43d, being part of their last reinforcement. Their 7th and 21st regiments are said to be completely ruined. Soon after the battle, they sent in a flag of truce, and twenty-four hours were allowed them to remove and bury their dead. In one small spot alone, on the left of our lines, they found three hundred and sixty-eight dead bodies. In the course of the day, forty carts and ten boats arrived in town loaded with wounded prisoners, who were put into the barracks, which were converted into a temporary hospital; about 150 unwounded prisoners were also brought to town and placed in prison. Their generals, Pakenham and Gibbs, are said to be killed, and Keane mortally wounded. Their communications are all signed by Lambert. The prisoners are all remarkably fine, well-looking men; indeed these are picked troops, the flower of their army; men who have served with distinction in Spain, Italy and France. Is not this a brilliant affair? And if we consider the disparity of loss, almost unprecedented in military annals! Allow us to boast a little.

We are now disposed to think that the English are seriously inclined to relinquish their attempt. Of this I entertain no doubt if their vessels do not succeed in taking or passing the fort at Plaquemines. This fort is said by an express to have been attacked on the 9th, about noon, and that the attack still continued when he left there, on the morning of the 10th. Four of their vessels are said to have advanced towards the fort; to have put springs upon their cables, and opened a distant fire; more were coming up to support them—but we have above thirty pieces of cannon mounted upon that fort, and major Overton, who commands, is said to be a brave man.

Many of the English officers have brought their families with them, and it is said they have a collector aboard. Every thing proclaims their intention of permanent establishment and their confidence of ultimate success—a confidence still kept alive. Major Mitchell, one of the prisoners taken on the night of the 23d, when complimented by our colonel Piatt, with an offer of linen, politely declined it, upon the ground that his own baggage would be up in a few days. And many of the officers taken in the last engagement, seem, or affect to believe, that their troops will soon be up. Mais nous verrons.—The number of unwounded prisoners we have, at different times taken, amounts exactly to 289, exclusive of officers; of this number, 100 have been sent to Natchez, and the rest will soon follow. One of the officers taken prisoner, is a lieutenant Ponblanque, son of the barrister who wrote the treatise of equity. The amount of the total loss of the enemy, in men put hors de combat, it is calculated, cannot fall much short of 3000 men.

Before I again write you, I think the affair must be finally decided. The die, if I may so say, is now turning, upon which our fate is staked. If we retain the command of the river, their army must necessarily and speedily retreat. Their provisions are falling short, and their troops growing discontented; they are disappointed in the supposed divisions and disaffection in this country; their loss has been severe, including in it their commander in chief; near Baltimore the death alone of gen. Ross broke up the enterprise; the reception too they have met with at our lines, will not tempt them to repeat their visit, unaccompanied by their fleet; and yet, it is evident, from the tardiness of its movements, and from their separately risking so serious an assault, as that of the 8th, that they did not originally calculate upon its co-operation. The firing at Plaquemines has now continued to be heard, at intervals, since the 9th at noon; unfortunate fort Bourbon opposite, which in the beginning of December was begun, remains still incomplete and useless. Our fort however at English Turn is growing formidable. We are all impatiently waiting news from Plaquemines. To Jackson every credit is due, for inspiring general confidence, uniting our scattered efforts, and calling forth our dormant strength. Many men distinguish themselves at our batteries, whose names until lately were unknown; the privateering class, formerly yeelped Baratarians, have produced a corps of skilful artilleryists. Behind our entrenchments, the discipline of the English troops is not feared, nor our own want of it felt; the more regular they are in their approaches and attacks, the greater is the loss they sustain, and perhaps the very irregularity of our fire makes it more destructive.

To the inhabitants of the town much credit also is due for their generosity and humanity. Independently of their subscription for the relief of our own militia, &c. amounting to above $7,000, when a call was made for mattresses, the day after the battle, for the use of the wounded prisoners, four hundred and forty odd were voluntarily furnished.

P. S. Having left my letter unsealed, until the evening, I can now add, that it is said, that an express has arrived from Plaquemines, who states, that the fire of the enemy had made no impression upon our works.

New-Orleans, January 12, 1814.

I wrote you fully by last mail, giving you, as correctly as I could, the account of the assault by the British, upon the entrenchments of our army. Never was there an action wherein one side suffered so much and the other so little; we have lost but six men killed, and nine wounded, and the British lost at least 1500 killed, wounded and prisoners, for, after the engagement, they asked a truce to bury their dead, and there was a line marked out for them to come within one-third of a mile of our works, and we delivered to them of their dead, that fell within that line

Add to which, those who fell and were taken up by them, the slight-wounded which got off, and those who were wounded in the first of the engagement, will make up the full 1500 loss on their side; and so severe was our fire, that very few of the wounded have as few as one wound, but some have seven, and one man who fell received 17 wounds. It is ascertained to a certainty that general Pakenham, first in command, is killed, and general Krane, second in command, killed; so said their adjutant general, during the truce, and admiral Cochrane signed it as commander in chief of the land and naval forces, which I think puts it beyond doubt. They got possession of our right bastion of three guns, but our fire upon them was so severe, that they had not time to spike the guns before they retreated. There never was a more gallant attack made upon any works, than was that of the British upon ours. Nor was there ever a more gallant repulse; for there was one continued roar of musketry, from right to left, and those who fell of the British receiving so many wounds is a proof that our fire was superior, I think, to that of any army that was ever brought into action; for the proportion of riflemen in our army is very great; and those Tennessee fellows in Coffee's brigade, tore them literally to pieces, and did not give the enemy time to charge them. The British colonel Rainey, who led the men that carried our right bastion, had the calf of one of his legs carried away before he mounted the works, notwithstanding which he pushed on; and it is said, killed a sergeant and corporal of our regulars with his two pistols, and was then shot by one of our New Orleans riflemen, who were posted on the right and who drove them out of their works, and thereby saved New-Orleans. Indeed, after the engagement, general Jackson told them they had done themselves immortal honor.

The British have received such a lesson in Louisiana from mil-lita, as they never had before in any part of the world; and they were beaten by sheer superiority in firing; and they are no doubt 2,500 men less, killed, wounded and prisoners, than when they landed. Jackson, during the action, was running along the line, crying out, "Give it to them, my boys, let's finish the business to day!"
He is a noble fellow, and the men adore him. It is expected the British have attacked Plaquemine, with about seven vessels, six gun-brigs, and bomb and rocket-ships. What the result is, I cannot say; but there are two strong forts down there, and I trust they have been repulsed; and if they have, their army will soon go off; for they must know they can do nothing, for in the last attack, they picked the best men from all the regiments, and officers volunteered, and never was there a finer set of officers and men composing an army, than made the assault.

On the other side of the river, however, we were completely disgraced by some of the militia, who scarcely waited to fire a gun at them, but turned immediately about, although they were stronger than the enemy, and could have taken or killed every man of them, had they stood as they ought to have done.

Journal from the Aurora.

FROM NEW-ORLEANS:—January 1st.—At day-light the enemy had opened upon us a battery of two 18 pounders constantly pouring upon our lines, principally upon our left, towards the cypress woods.
The affair has been pretty hot. The British have considerably suffered from the fire of our batteries all along the line. We have lost 12 men killed and wounded. This day arrived general Thomas with 660 men from Baton Rouge.

2d.—Gen. Jackson having (by the means of his telescope) observed, last evening, a good deal of confusion in the enemy's camp, and also this morning again, ordered a sortie of 400 men, 200 of them mounted, to go and reconnoitre their camp; by them it was ascertained, that a part of their artillery had been dismounted by our guns; that they had been carried off; that they had razed the redoubts, and had retreated on their first lines, towards lake Bienvenu. General Adair has arrived this evening with 4000 men, who encamped about three miles from the city. The general, accompanied by his aids, went to gen. Jackson's quarters, and to-morrow his corps will march to the place assigned to it.

3d.—Nothing extraordinary—all the prisoners and deserters will soon be conducted into the interior.

4th.—In consequence of the great number of men arriving with their arms in bad order, and of the scarcity of good muskets with bayonets, the four companies of veterans have given up theirs, amounting to about 500, to arm the men at the camp, and they have armed themselves with fowling pieces and pikes.

5th and 6th.—To-day all the prisoners and deserters have gone for Natchez, under escort. Yesterday arrived 10 British sailors, captured from a British brig from Jamaica, loaded with rum, bread, and other munitions for the English army; the brig grounded near the post, (Chef-Monsieur) the commanding officer of which, captain Johnson, finding it impossible to land the cargo of said brig, ordered her to be fired; we are informed by these prisoners that the infamous Cochrane had received a reinforcement of 2000 men. On the evening of the same day arrived 660 men from Natchez; they inform that all the volunteers and militia from the states of Ohio, Kentucky, Tennessee, and Mississippi territory, are burning with the desire of coming to assist us, and were ready to march at the first call from general Jackson, who, it is said, has orders from the president to call them into the field whenever he may think proper:

8th.—Sunday, at 6 1-2 o'clock A. M. the enemy began a very heavy cannonade upon our lines from his batteries of 18 and 12 pounders erected since the 3d, supported by the musketry of 2,500 men, who marched in close columns, and advanced nearer than musket shot distance to our entrenchments, armed with rockets, obuses, and facines, to storm our batteries; they directed their principal attack against the head of the line, flanked by the river, and upon the left resting upon the cypress swamp, as well as against the tirailleurs and riflemen placed above the said swamp; the roaring of the guns and firing of the musketry lasted two hours and a quarter, the enemy's mortars, although directed against our centre, have done no harm to our troops, the bursting of their bombs in our works has been of no effect. Two British officers and one French engineer of the name of Rennie, who had gained the summit of our parapet, have been killed or wounded and made prisoners, (the engineer and one colonel was killed); after this terrible affair, the field in front of our works was strewn with British wounded and killed. The English have lost more than 1600 men, of whom 600 killed, at least 800 wounded and more than 200 prisoners or deserters, amongst them 25 officers of every rank. Our loss is trifling, 4 killed, whites and men of color, and 7 slightly wounded, we don't know exactly the number of the British wounded in their camp.

From the 2d to the 7th, the British had made the negroes of the sugar plantations in their possession, cut and continue the canal from Villare near lake Borgne into the river, on the night of the 7th they passed in their barges about 600 men on the Mississippi, chiefly sailors, with orders to attack our two batteries of 4 guns of 24 pounders, on the right side, at the same time that they would attack us on the left; they effectively opened their fire before day light upon about 500 of our men that our good general had sent there in the afternoon of the 7th; our men, surprised by an enemy that they could not see, and exposed to the fire of such gallant troops, retreated; the commanding officers of the batteries, so unsupported, spiked their pieces, and made their retreat. On the morning of the 9th, the British having found all the guns spiked, re-crossed the river in their barges, two of them were lost. Our barracks and hospitals are full of the enemy's wounded, and some of our own; the British die at every moment of their wounds, more than 30 were buried yesterday. On the 6th, in consequence of a truce agreed upon, the enemy sent sixty of his men unarmed, who were busy all the morning in carrying off their dead; our city is at present a true ville de guerre—our cruel enemy is only five miles distant from our gates. This day the prisoners have been sent on horseback to Natches and Fort Adams.

Among the officers that have been killed or wounded, are lieutenant-general commander in chief, Packenham, major-general Keane, the French engineer Rennie, and also a colonel—all carried to their camp. We learned that the three last are dead, and that the general in chief, at his request, has been carried on board of admiral Cochrane, said to be always in a tented gig on the border of lake Borgne.

This day, 11th, we are informed by two deserters that general Gibbs died of his wounds in their camp, and that Packenham died also on board of Cochrane: that on the 10th, the enemy had begun to re-embark his artillery and munitions, and appeared to be preparing for a retreat; and that major-general Lambert had the command of the army since the death of the three first chiefs.

12th—This day our artillery on the right side of the river have been unspiked, and mounted upon new carriages; the general sent 2000 men thither; two lines are formed there two miles distant, one at each battery; 260 of our good friends from the other side of Ponchartrain have just arrived.

The two last English deserters arrived on the 11th, agree, that before their departure from their camp, and on the night of the 10th, it was a general rumor that the British loss in the terrible affair of the 8th had been stated at 3000 men, hors de combat, killed, prisoners and deserters, and of about 4,500 since their arrival at Ship Island on the 14th December to the 8th instant.

13th—Three hundred men of the 44th regiment of regulars have just arrived; we are about 15,000 strong, distributed in five or six posts, including general Jackson's camp in front of the enemy, of about 9000.

Extract of a letter, dated—New Orleans, Jan. 9.

"A few moments only are at my disposal, and in that time, I can give no detail—the enemy have been defeated with great loss on their side, and but little on ours—except the local militia, who were placed under general Morgan. All the troops here have behaved admirably; the Baratarians, who were relieved from prison on condition of service, have been of infinite use, they manned several guns which were most faithfully and skilfully served, and did great execution. The enemy behaved like soldiers on this occasion, and their example had much effect upon many of our people, who had not been before in any action. If we fought well before, we shall fight better next time, such is the confidence prevailing."

Camp, 4 miles from New-Orleans, January 13.

We have had another and most glorious battle. On Sunday morning, the 8th inst. at day light the enemy advanced in regular columns with nearly their whole force, and commenced a most vigorous and gallant attack, within twenty paces of our lines, at the same time keeping up a constant cannonading from two batteries, and throwing Congreve rockets to cover their light troops; but we, expecting an attack, were ready to receive them, and gave them such another reception as they have not experienced since the war; in fact, the annals of history scarce bear testimony of such another. The enemy left on the field of battle better than five hundred killed, seven hundred wounded, (mostly dangerous, being generally from our cannon) and three hundred prisoners. Nearly all the killed and three hundred and fifty of the wounded fell into our hands, besides the three hundred officers and men prisoners, unhurt, and astonishing as it may appear to you, but not more so than true, our loss on that ever memorable day, was but six privates killed and two wounded.

The enemy's loss in officers was immense, from 50 to 60 in killed, wounded and prisoners, and those the best in their army. Lieutenant general Packenham, their commander in chief, was killed early in the action, by a cannon ball. Generals Keane and Gibbs, were both wounded, and said to be dangerously so. Colonel Raney and several other field officers that paid you a visit at Washington, were killed on our breast works; the enemy took possession of one of our batteries on the right, but were soon killed or taken prisoners and the battery regained; the battle lasted about an hour and a half, and while glory covered our arms on this side of the river, we had a party of militia that disgraced themselves on the other. The enemy sent over a party of 600 men, making an attack at the same time that they engaged us at this, when the militia made a shameful retreat after their first fire. The enemy advanced a mile or two towards Orleans on that side, took three batteries, burnt several valuable sugar plantations, spiked three or four guns that were there, burnt their carriages and retreated down the river opposite their main force and recrossed, before we could get a reinforcement across. Had our militia over the river done their duty, they would have taken the whole force opposed to them. In the afternoon after the battle, the enemy sent in a flag of truce, for the purpose of burying their dead; general Jackson gave them until 12 o'clock next day, but that not being enough for them to bury them, they were allowed until 4 o'clock.

Since Sunday, both armies have remained perfectly quiet; the British army is commanded by general Lambert. It is the general opinion in camp, that the enemy are about to leave us; but I think it will depend upon their fleet getting past fort St. Philip.

General Jackson received an express from that place to-day, which left it on the 9th. There were two bomb vessels, and five others anchored two miles from the fort; they had at that time thrown 25 shells in the fort; without injuring any thing. For the last three days, we have heard a constant bombardment in that direction. Should the enemy get by them we shall be in a bad way here. Should they not succeed, as I believe they will not, Orleans is safe.

P. S. You will perceive by my calculation the enemy's loss to be 1500; but I believe I have underrated it—two deserters that have just come in, say it was two thousand on Sunday last, and it is supposed by some of our officers to be nearly 3000.

A letter dated January 2, says—"Our troops are in great spirits and have universally beat the picket guards in their skirmishes. General Coffee's rifle corps are dressed in long coats, something like a full trim quaker, and the British did not know what to make of them upon our first attack—they said they had heard of and seen quakers in other parts of the United States, but that the Louisiana quakers were the d—st fighting fellows they had ever seen. We have numerous anecdotes of these fellows, but one thing is very certain, that they fight equal to the old veterans of Rome—general Jackson is their God—he is as cool as the duke of Abrantes, and upon a similar occasion displayed something of the same presence of mind—a ball passed near him on the night of the battle—he bowed his head and smiled, and observed to Mr. Livingston, one of his aids, that it was not customary with him to salute the balls en passant, but that the one which had just gone by, was the first British ball he had noticed, and he could not do less than pay his respects to it."

Another of the 7th says—"We have become so used to the sound of cannon within these two weeks past that no one appears to attach any importance to it, and even women who never heard of a camp before, will enter it in the heat of battle without fear. I think now, all that I have read of wars and battles is mere stuff—that its terrors are more horrid in imagination than in reality. Some of our most cowardly fellows are among our first rate warriors, and have achieved deeds equal in valor to some of Bonaparte's great feats of bravery—but practice makes every thing familiar to the human mind, and I do really believe that our troops are now so familiarized to scenes of blood, that they would not hesitate, if commanded, to march in column up to the mouth of a cannon. I cannot conceive how the men at Washington allowed the same cowardly Englishmen to alarm them when they attacked at Bladensburg, but they * * * * *. You will laugh at my calling the British soldiers cowardly. I don't know how if the epithet may be applicable to the whole army, but to the division we have seen, it appertains with great justice. On the first assault the enemy made upon our entrenchments, on the 28th ult. they came on in three columns, first on the right, second to the centre, and third to the extreme left; they marched up in solid mass, until they came within about 400 yards, they then halted and displayed; we then saluted them with grape and canister shot; they immediately formed solid column again, but with all the thrashing that the officers could give them, not a man would advance another inch—in this situation they stood until we gave them another round of canister and grape, when down they fell upon their bellies and laid there until dark, and then sneaked off under cover of the night, as Drummond says, "that the fashion of ducking may have answered in Spain," but among the Yankees it is disgraceful, and our Tennessee men go out now, and fire upon the picket guards and beckon them to come up and not to fall down in the weeds and lay there like snipes!"

A letter from Mr. A. Henderson, says—"The enemy made a most desperate charge—they came in solid column—one in the centre and the other on the right of our battery. Each man had a bundle of brush or sugar cane on his shoulders for the purpose of filling up our ditch. They were so warmly met that they were thrown into confusion, and retreated, formed and returned a third time to the charge.—They succeeded in getting possession of the bastion with three pieces of cannon in it, but they were soon dislodged, and the most of them taken prisoners. So intent were they in getting over our work that they pulled off their shoes for the purpose of climbing it. There were a number of officers of distinction killed, and it has been ascertained that their commanding general officer was mortally wounded. In the pocket of one of the officers who was killed, was found a journal, in which is mentioned that on the night of the 23d they lost 224 killed and an immense number wounded; and on the 28th they lost 15 officers killed, and mentions only that they had a great number of privates killed."

Another letter has the following paragraph—"The sight was a terrible one to see a field covered with dead and wounded laying in heaps, the field was completely red. It was a very pleasing sight to see how kind our men were to the wounded—would take them upon their backs and carry them to the hospital."

One letter says that col. Brooke who led the attack upon Baltimore after the death of Ross, is wounded. The enemy came to the charge on our works with a shout like that of their red allies, the Indians. "The killed and wounded on our part were chiefly of the New-Orleans colored regiment, who were so anxious for glory that they could not be prevented from advancing over our breast works and exposing themselves. They fought like desperadoes and deserve distinguished praise."

"A captain, one of our prisoners, told me for the time the action lasted, it was the hottest he ever witnessed in Spain or France, he led 60 grenadiers to the charge, and but 5 escaped."

It appears to have been the design of the enemy, in crossing the river, to have turned the cannon on our line. They were spiked, however, before our people retired and the English burnt the carriages; but they were made useful again the next day.

When we noticed the arrival of the Dictator, 64, at Havana from the neighborhood of New-Orleans, in our last number, we were at a loss to discover her errand: but it now appears, that she brought there about four hundred passengers, soldiers wives, and sick and wounded or disabled soldiers, to relieve the enemy's camp of its ineffectives, and also to obtain a supply of provisions for those that remained. The captain of the Dictator immediately contracted for, and began to take on board, with all haste, 4000 barrels of flour, at 23 dollars per barrel. This may corroborate the intelligence received direct from New-Orleans, that the enemy was short of provisions, having doubtless believed that in the city there was enough and to spare, and that he had little else to do than to march in and eat! However there is this in his favor: the affair of the 8th ult. will much reduce the quantity of rations required!

It is also said, that a brig from New-Providence had been permitted to take from the "royal" arsenal at Havana, 18 pieces of brass cannon for the use of the enemy at New-Orleans, and that they were carried thence in the night to save appearances.

Letters from New-Orleans say, on the information of deserters and prisoners, that lieutenant-general Packenham had with him a special commission as governor of Louisiana, and a whole regiment of magistrates, custom-house officers, merchants and dealers!—little thinking that his title to it would be so warmly disputed by the cannon law.

A British colonel mounted our works and shot one of our soldiers with his pistol—but in one instant he was pierced by twelve balls.

There are good reasons to believe that the whole three, Packenham, Keane and Gibbs, were killed, or died immediately of their wounds; and that the whole loss of the enemy, including his fight with the gun-boats, in killed, wounded and missing up to the 9th ult. was at least 4,500 men. This estimate is made from a journal that was found in the pocket of a dead officer.

The British appear to have received a reinforcement of about 3000 under general Lambert since their first landing at Orleans; and before the battle of the 8th their entire force may have been about 12,000 men.

It was the very flower of the enemy that attacked our lines, and they were cut down as the grass falls before the mower's scythe!

We have a report that two of the enemy's vessels have been blown up at Fort Plaquemine, or St. Philip. Two explosions were heard in that direction, which, possibly may have given rise to it. The fort was under charge of an able officer, with a garrison well supplied with all things needful for defence. But if even that fort should be reduced, there are, we trust, other insuperable obstacles to his progress to the city.

It is worth observation, that the moment the enemy obtained an advantage on the right bank of the river, he began to shew his vandal spirit in burning and destroying private property, in the mere wantonness of barbarity.

There is a manifest superiority in the management of our artillery over that of the enemy at Orleans; as, indeed, appears to have been the case every where, at land or at sea. This is an extraordinary fact.

A letter of Jan. 13, says—"We are in possession of papers by which we know their original force, was, including sailors and marines about 11,000 men; that we have killed disabled and made prisoners upwards of 3000, and we are informed that the dysentery is prevailing to a great extent amongst them; that I think their force is not exceeding 6000 effective men; and ours in high health and spirits, and confident of success, at least 15,000 effective. In case they should carry our first intrenchment, we fall back to our next fortified camp two miles nearer the city, and in case of being again beaten, we fall back to our next, a mile from the latter, both having strong batteries fronting the river.

Last evening by a scouting party it was found that in one of their principal batteries they had spiked 8 pieces of cannon, and since my leaving camp there is said to be an express from Plaquemine to general Jackson, stating they had beaten the enemy having blown up a gun brig and two bomb ketches. It is highly probable, as Jackson considered the fort so strong that he would not block up the mouth of the river. The fort has 44 cannon, is bomb proof, 500 men and commanded by major Overton an excellent officer, and having under him several experienced artillery officers. If Plaquemine is safe, you may be assured we are safe; as if they could not beat us the 8th, they never can do it afterwards; as their force is daily decreasing by desertion, &c. and ours is daily receiving reinforcements. It is the opinion of the whole camp, that they will retreat if they are not now doing so, unless their fleet get up the river, which I have no idea of. To give an idea of the security we feel, cotton was sold this day at 10 cents, notes at 6 months, and no more could be had at that." Extract of a letter from a very respectable gentleman in New Orleans, to his friend in Philadelphia, dated.

NEW-ORLEANS, Jan. 13, 1815.

On Sunday, the 8th inst. at 6 o'clock in the morning, the enemy attacked us with such fury, that we have very few examples of. They were formed in two solid columns. Their left marched alongside the river, composed of two thousand picked men, grenadiers, flank companies, &c. Their right column, consisting of 3500 fusileers. Our left was defended by the brave Tennesseans, commanded by Coffee, Carroll, &c. Our centre and right was defended by the New-Orleans militia, and the colored men of St. Domingo, commanded by the brave col. Savary, and a detachment of the 7th and 44th, U. S. troops. The whole of our artillery was served by the Baratarians and other Frenchmen. The enemy developed his columns, and the carnage began. Our artillery was served with the greatest skill and bravery, and carried destruction into the ranks of the enemy, who nevertheless did reach our entrenchments, from which they were driven at the point of the bayonet. The slaughter lasted one hour and a quarter. What you will hardly believe, is, that in that ever memorable day, enormous as the loss of the enemy has been, ours has not proved beyond three men killed and thirty wounded. You will think the following statement of the loss of the enemy exaggerated, but you may depend upon its veracity, viz.

Sir Edward Packenham, general and commander in chief, cut asunder by a cannon ball.

Major general Gibbs, killed.

Major Pringle, do.

Colonel Reynar, do.

Major Whitaker, do.

Brigade major Wilkinson, do.

482 men killed in the American lines and delivered to the English to be buried.

460 wounded, which remain in our power,

250 prisoners,

20 officers prisoners,

500 killed or wounded, carried off by the British.

1712 total.

The enemy requested a truce of three days, to bury his dead; but our indefatigable general would only grant them 24 hours. And it was during that interval, that the enemy's sentries and ours have had intercourse, by which means we have been able to ascertain the loss of the enemy, independent of the above statement, is about 600 men hors de combat.—It is our opinion the loss of the enemy in that memorable day, is not less than two thousand men hors de combat.

Their losses in the former engagements has been ascertained to be no less than 1500 men hors de combat; besides the two black regiments in their service have been found unfit for duty, and not able to stand the severity of the climate. These two regiments have been re-embarked and sent back.

The English have destroyed the plantations below their camp, and carried away the slaves and behaved generally like vandals.

There is a strong indication that the enemy are re-embarking, and it is even said that their heavy pieces of ordnance have been dismounted and sent on board their ships, as also their sick and wounded.

Our capital resembles a Place de Guerre.—The greatest union prevails among all classes, and every military post is well secured.

Louisville, Ky. Jan. 12.—Passed the falls, January 6th, a keel boat, commanded by John Pollard, loaded with public stores consisting of 300	bags of catridges,

100	barrels of powder,
500	18 pound balls,
500	12 do. do.

MANDATE

Of the Apostolical administrator of the Diocese of Louisiana, to the clergy and faithful of the city of New-Orleans, to order public prayers.

Dear beloved brethren—

Whilst our brave warriors, led on by the hero of the Floridas, prepare to defend our altars and fire-sides against foreign invasion, it behoves us, ministers of the most High, and all you, christians, whom the weakness of your sex or whose age prevents your taking an active part in this important struggle, to unite under the banners of religion, and implore the Divine Protection on the arms of our defenders.—Just and holy as is our cause; well founded as is our confidence in the intrepidity of our soldiers, and in the experience of the chief who commands them—we must not however, forget, that victory as well as defeat, is in the hands of the Supreme Arbiter of human destinies, and that if he does not watch over our interests, in vain are thousands of arms raised to protect them. What cause was ever more holy, more adequate to inspire perfect confidence in its defenders, than that of the Israelites? God himself had promised to deliver their enemies into their hands, and yet Moses, whilst looking from the top of the mountain on the host of Israel, engaged with that of Amalec on the plain, did not cease to keep his suppliant hands raised to Heaven, as long as the combat remained undecided; and victory was declared to be the reward of the prayers of the just, rather than the valor of the combatants.

I have said of the just, dearly beloved brethren, because our prayers, in order to be efficacious, ought to proceed from a pure heart. "The prayer of the impious, (says the Lord) is an abomination in my eyes." Alas! dare we flatter ourselves, that the scourge which is at our doors, is not the punishment of our iniquities? Let us then put an end to the cause of our evils, if we wish to see those evils terminate. Ah! how irritated soever Heaven may be, we know how much a contrite and humble heart may contribute to disarm its vengeance. It was that which procured for the guilty Ninevah the revocation of that fatal decree which seemed to deprive her of every hope. Like her, dearly beloved brethren, "let us humble ourselves under the powerful hand of God, so that he may raise us up on the day of his visitation;" let us enter with a firm step into the ways of justice. We may then hope every thing from the clemency of this God of goodness, who even in height of his anger, desires only to shew mercy.

To enter into these views, and to offer, by the union of our petitions, a holy violence to Heaven, we order, that on Monday, Tuesday, and Wednesday of this week, public prayers shall be said in the two churches of this city. The blessed Sacrament shall be exposed in each church from the beginning of the first Mass to the end of the last, when the psalm Miserere shall be sung, and Benediction given. In the afternoon, the blessed Sacrament shall be again exposed from 4 o'clock until 5; during which time the same psalm will be sung, together with the Litany of the blessed Virgin, and any other prayers may be said, that the Pastor may think proper; the whole to be terminated, as in the morning, by the solemn Benediction of the blessed Sacrament.

And this our present mandate shall be read in the two churches of this city, at the morning and evening offices of this day.

Given at New-Orleans the 18th day of December, 1814. WM. DUBOURG, Adm. Apost.

Extract of a note from the adjutant-general.

Major-general Jackson directs me, sir, to express to you his high approbation of the mandate you have submitted to his inspection, and requests you cause it to be printed and circulated.

(Signed) THOMAS L. BUTLER,
Aid-de-camp.

GENERAL ORDER,

Adjutant-general's office, head-quarters, 4th and 10th
Military district, Baltimore, February 5, 1815.

Lieut. colonel ARMISTEAD, commanding at fort M'Henry, will cause a national salute to be fired to-morrow morning at ten o'clock, from the guns of the fort, in honor of the splendid victory obtained by the arms of the United States under major-general JACKSON, over the enemy in the attack made by the latter on the defences of New-Orleans, on the 8th ult. in which attack the enemy lost, besides his commander-in-chief, who was killed, 2600 men in killed, wounded and prisoners.

The whole line of troops will turn out under arms at the hour at which the salute is to be fired.

By command,

FRANCIS W. BELTON,
Assistant adjutant-general.

The city of Washington was illuminated on the 4th inst. in consequence of the following proclamation of the mayor:

Whereas, it has pleased the Almighty Disposer of events, to signalize our arms, under the command of the gallant general JACKSON, at Orleans, by a victory over the invading foe, unparalleled in the annals of nations.

And whereas, it becomes a people relying on the favor of Heaven for support, to rejoice in every manifestation of divine goodness; and a number of the citizens of this corporation having expressed to me a wish to celebrate our brilliant triumph by an illumination of this city, in which I most heartily accord; I do, therefore, hereby recommend to the citizens of this corporation to illuminate their houses this evening at 7 o'clock, and to continue until 10 o'clock. And I do enjoin upon all the officers of the police to be vigilant in preserving order and preventing mischief.

General JACKSON, in his official account of the above glorious battle, states the killed left on the field 700; wounded left on the field, 1,400; prisoners 500; total 2,600; our loss, only seven killed and six wounded.

Given under my hand at the city of Washington, this 4th day of February, 1815.

At twelve o'clock, on Monday last, at Philadelphia, a national salute, in honor of the VICTORY AT NEW-ORLEANS, was fired from the United States' frigate Guerriere, commodore RODGERS, now lying in that harbor.

By the president of the United States of America.

A PROCLAMATION.—Among the many evils produced by the wars, which, with little intermission, have afflicted Europe, and extended their ravages into other quarters of the globe, for a period exceeding twenty years, the dispersion of a considerable portion of the inhabitants of different countries, in sorrow and in want, has not been the least injurious to human happiness, nor the least severe in the trial of human virtue.

It had been long ascertained, that many foreigners flying from the dangers of their home, and that some citizens, forgetful of their duty, had co-operated in forming an establishment on the island of Barrataria near the mouth of the river Mississippi, for the purpose of a clandestine and lawless trade. The government of the United States caused the establishment to be broken up and destroyed: and, having obtained the means of designating the offenders of every description, it only remained to answer the demands of justice, by inflicting an exemplary punishment.

But it has since been represented, that the offenders have manifested a sincere penitence; that they have abandoned the prosecution of the worst cause for the support of the best; and particularly, that they have exhibited, in the defence of New-Orleans, unequivocal traits of courage and fidelity. Offenders, who have refused to become the associates of the enemy in the war, upon the most seducing terms of invitation; and who have aided to repel his hostile invasion of the territory of the United States; can no longer be considered as objects of punishment, but as objects of a generous forgiveness.

It has, therefore, been seen with great satisfaction, that the general assembly of the state of Louisiana earnestly recommend those offenders to the benefit of a full pardon: And in compliance with that recommendation, as well as in consideration of all the other extraordinary circumstances of the case, I James Madison, president of the United States of America, do issue this proclamation, hereby granting, publishing and declaring, a free and full pardon of all offences committed in violation of any act or acts of the congress of the said United States, touching the revenue, trade and navigation thereof, or touching the intercourse and commerce of the United States with foreign nations, at any time before the eighth day of January, in the present year one thousand eight hundred and fifteen, by any person or persons whatsoever, being inhabitants of New Orleans and the adjacent country, or being inhabitants of the said island of Barrataria, and the places adjacent: Provided, That every person claiming the benefit of this full pardon, in order to entitle himself thereto, shall produce a certificate in writing from the governor of the state of Louisiana, stating that such person has aided in the defence of New-Orleans, and the adjacent country, during the invasion thereof as aforesaid.

And I do hereby further authorise and direct all suits, indictments, and prosecutions, for fines, penalties, and forfeitures, against any person, or persons, who shall be entitled to the benefit of this full pardon forthwith to be stayed, discontinued and released: And all civil officers are hereby required, according to the duties of their respective stations, to carry this proclamation into immediate and faithful execution.

Done at the city of Washington, the sixth day of February, in the year one thousand eight hundred and fifteen, and of the independence of the United States the thirty-ninth.

JAMES MADISON.

By the president,
JAS. MONROE, Acting secretary of state.

Previous to the army under general Carroll leaving Nashville, for the lower Mississippi, the troops were formed and the following address delivered.

Fellow citizens,

This address will be handed to you by colonel Hynes, adjutant general of the militia of Tennessee.

The degree of satisfaction felt by the executive of the state at the promptitude and equipment on their part of the militia, in attending the call to arms, upon the present occasion, ready to act, commands an expression to them, to be given of his grateful sense of their patriotism and zeal—his gratification is great indeed; and their promptitude is duly appreciated—it is a sure pledge of future good conduct—no evidence, short of good conduct in battle, could be a stronger one of true love of country.

Go forth, meet, vanquish the enemy to your peace, and at the end of your service, return crowned with laurels, well entitled to the plaudits of your countrymen, whose good opinion, with the liberality and justice of government in your favor, together with self approbation for good conduct, constitutes a full reward for any services.

To be useful to our country should be the motto of each man. Your pride will be, in all you do, to realize the high expectations entertained of your valor. Each should bear in mind, at all times, that he goes into the service of his country as a patriot, as a distinguished citizen, and a good soldier, to contend with his enemy, in a just war, declared by his government, in support of all that is dear to freemen, who deserve to be free. More need not be said to meritorious men who are determined to do their duty. Your general, seconded by the brave, will lead you to the post of honor, and will maintain it to the last.

The elevated rank held by the citizens of Tennessee throughout the union, founded not less on their promptitude and regard for subordination, than their warlike achievements, is a sure pledge that it will be preserved by the present army, and it will be their pleasure to afford to the world, an additional evidence, that the people of Tennessee will surrender their liberties and independence but with their lives.

Wherever the war may require the march of this army, it will have my most ardent and anxious wishes to Heaven for its success, and for the honorable and safe return in due time, of all attached to it.

WILLIE BLOUNT.

Nashville, Nov. 20, 1814.

HONORABLE.—Marshall's office, New-York, February 6, 1815.—In consequence of the following letter from the commissary general of prisoners, the marshal liberated the five seamen lately saved from the wreck of the British sloop of war Sylph; and such of them as are disposed to go to Halifax will be sent there by the cartel Jane and Martha, which will depart for that place in the course of a few days.

(COPY.)

Office of Commissary General of Prisoners,
Washington, February 1st, 1815.

SIR—I have seen in the National Intelligencer of this date, under the New-York head, (to which I beg leave to refer you) an account of the shipwreck of the British sloop of war Sylph, on the east end of Long Island, under circumstances afflicting to humanity, by which the greater part of the crew were lost, and that a purser and some few men were saved by the benevolent and spirited exertions of the inhabitants.

In war, as in peace, calamities like this give a claim to the survivors on the hospitality and protection of the country on whose shores they may be cast. It is not the desire of this government to consider as prisoners of war unfortunate men who thus come into its power.

If the facts be stated correctly you will be pleased to provide the seamen with what may be necessary for their subsistence and comfort, and to liberate them without exchange as soon as possible. The purser being a non-combatant, under any circumstances, is entitled to be returned that way.

If this reaches you in time to send them to Halifax by the British cartel now at New York, you are requested to do so, otherwise to convey them, as soon as can conveniently be done, by a flag to one of the ships off your harbor.

I have the honor to be, sir, your most obedient servant,
J. MASON.

General John Smith,

Marshal of the state of New-York.

ENEMY IN THE CHESAPEAKE.—On Sunday, the 29th ult. some barges of the enemy came into Hampton roads, and captured five small craft, one laden with tobacco. Captain Gordon sent out his barges, but they were too late to check the depredations of the enemy. On the 31st the whole of the enemy's vessels left Lynnhaven bay, and put to sea, supposed on account of the weather.

MILITARY.

A complete regiment of North Carolinians have been called out on the requisition of gen. Pinckney, for the defence of the southern coast.

Old soldiers.—The following list of old soldiers who now hold commissions in the army of the United States, is given in an eastern paper.

Names.	Years of service.	Ages.
General Wilkinson	32	63
General Burbeck	30	62
General Cushing	32	56
General M. Porter	35	57
General Bissel	27	59
Colonel Freeman	27	63
Colonel Kingsbury	38	37
Colonel Sparks	27	53
Major Pike, father of the late gen. Z. M. Pike, ...	32	64
Major Whistler	26	58
Major Beall	25	59

Many of these officers entered the revolutionary army as privates,—most of them were subaltern officers at the close of the war.

Capt. John A. Bard, of the United States cavalry, has been brevetted a major, for his gallant charge on the enemy, at Herring bay, on the 31st Oct. 1814, to take rank from that time.

The legislature of Maryland has passed the bill for raising 5,000 state troops.

The legislature of Ohio has loaned to the general government 30,000 dollars, for the purpose of defraying the expense of transporting provisions for the supply of the frontier posts.

The bill for the organization of a body of state troops in Pennsylvania, has failed in the house of representatives.

Savannah, Jan. 28. An official despatch reached town this morning to gen. Floyd, which states that the enemy evacuated St. Mary's and Point Petre on Tuesday last, after burning the barracks and blowing up the fort at the latter place; and that there is no doubt Savannah is ultimately their object.

A private letter to a gentleman in this place, from Amelia, states that the enemy evacuated St. Mary's on Tuesday last, after plundering every thing they could lay their hands on—that they intended occupying Cumberland island as their head-quarters—that the incendiary Cockburn commands them—and that they say Savannah is the only place worth holding or taking care of. The writer adds he is assured the impression that the enemy will pay our city a visit is not confined to the ignorant and unthinking. Be vigilant, be watchful.

We will merely observe that for the last four or five days, hundreds of our country brethren have arrived in this place to aid in its defence. Our city is now garrisoned with numerous troops—our works are completing with spirit and our means increasing daily, which will enable us to defend our rights, and fire sides, our holy sanctuaries, and all that is dear to us.

Major general Pinckney and suite reached our city yesterday morning.

☞ The amount of the enemy's force on the southern coast, appears to have been greatly exaggerated. Major-general Pinckney discharged, on the 29th ult. the whole of the militia this afternoon, by a general order on parade. A draft is to take place of 200 men from the militia of the city, and of 200 more of the country militia in camp—all the rest to go home. This looks well.

Charleston, Jan. 31. We learn that a gentleman has arrived from Edisto island, who states that the detachment from maj. Robertson's battalion on John's island, consisting of fifty men, and twenty of the island militia, having joined the militia of Edisto, attacked and succeeded in capturing the whole of the marauders, to the number of seventy, who where on that island "sinking wells and killing cattle."

NAVAL.

Copy of a letter from commodore Dent to the secretary of the navy, dated

Charleston, S. C. January 31st, 1815.

SIR—I had the honor in my letter of the 28th, to inform you, that from the information received by the commanding general of the situation of the enemy near North Edisto, and the great alarm of the inhabitants, I had decided to visit that place.—On my arrival at the camp on John's island, I sent an express to lieut. Kearney, commanding the flotilla, (then on his way with the army transport to Savannah) to meet me with the flotilla in North Edisto river.

From light winds and contrary tides, lieut. Kearney did not arrive there until half past 2, P. M. on Sunday, when I was informed the enemy were watering with their barges and about 80 men on the opposite island. I immediately directed the three barges to be manned with volunteers, and ordered lieut. Kearney to proceed outside and endeavor to cut them off, while a body of volunteers and militia, by order of the general, were landed on the island. A little after three of the barges moved, and on turning the point were discovered by the regate, (laying to an anchor about 4 miles from the land) when she fired several guns and made the signal of recall to her boats, and immediately got under way and opened a heavy fire on our barges.—

The wind about this time changed from the westward to the east, and very light, enabled our barges to cut off the tender, which was discovered working out of a small bay with two barges. The enemy's barges, after putting men on board the tender, moved directly to windward and ahead of our barges, to the frigate. After a close running fight of one hour and a half, and in the act of boarding, I had the satisfaction to see the tender surrender. The exertions of the frigate to save the tender were great; and when she saw her two boats leave her, she opened a heavy fire on them, and obliged them to pursue our barges, with a third that left the ship about the same time. After the surrender of the tender the frigate recalled her boats and soon after ceased firing. Lieut. Kearney, the officers and men engaged in this enterprise, behaved themselves in a manner that does honor to their country and themselves.—Although they had to continue so long under the fire of the frigate, nothing could divert them from their object. As the frigate had cut off their retreat to North Edisto, lieut. Kearney was obliged to proceed to South Edisto with his prize, since which I have not heard any thing from him.—The detachment of militia proceeded to the place where the enemy were watering, and found their launch aground and abandoned, the crew having gone on board the tender. She was filled with water casks, and had mounted a carronade, six brass swivels, with muskets, pistols, &c. She was got off at high water, and I expect her round with the prize.

I have the honor to be, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

J. H. DENT.

The hon. Benjamin W. Crowninshield,
Secretary of the Navy.

Proceedings of Congress.

IN SENATE.

Wednesday, Feb. 1.—A motion was made, virtually, to reject the bill for repairing or rebuilding the public edifices in the city of Washington and lost, as follows:

For it—Messrs. Dana, German, Hunter, King, Lambert, Mason Wells—7.

Against it—Messrs. Barbour, Bibb, Brown, Chase, Condit, Daggett, Fromentin, Gaillard, Giles, Goldsborough, Horsey, Kerr, Lacey, Morrow, Roberts, Smith, Tait, Taylor, Turner, Varnum Walker, Wharton—22.

Thursday, Feb. 2.—The senate resumed the consideration of the bill returned by the president of the United States "to incorporate the subscribers to the bank of the United States," together with his objections thereto; and, after some debate, the question was again put—"Shall the bill pass?" and decided as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Brown, Daggett, Dana, Fromentin, German, Giles, Goldsborough, Gore, Horsey, Hunter, King, Lambert Mason, Tait, Thompson—15.

NAYS—Messrs. Anderson, Barbour, Bibb, Barry, Chase, Condit, Gaillard, Kerr, Lacey, Morrow, Roberts, Robinson, Smith, Talbot, Taylor, Turner, Varnum, Wells, Wharton—19.

So the senate refused to pass the bill, (to do which, after the refusal of the president to sanction it, would have required the votes of two-thirds of all the members present) and the bill is therefore lost.

Friday, Feb. 3.—The bill for repairing the public buildings, &c. was ordered to be engrossed for third reading.

Saturday, Feb. 4.—Mr. Barbour of Va. gave notice that on Monday he should ask leave to introduce a bill to incorporate the subscribers to the bank of the United States of America.

The bill for the repairing or rebuilding the public buildings in the city of Washington, was read a third time, and the blank therein for the amount of appropriation having been filled with five hundred thousand dollars, was passed and sent to the house for concurrence.

The bill from the house to amend the act to establish a navy department, by adding thereto a board of commissioners, was read a third time as amended, and passed by the following vote:

YEAS—Messrs. Barbour, Chase, Daggett, Fromentin, Gaillard, German, Giles, Gore, Horsey, Kerr, Mason, Morrow, Tait, Taylor, Thompson, Wharton—16.

NAYS—Messrs. Bibb, Coudit, Lacock, Lambert, Roberts, Smith, Turner, Varnum—8.

The amendments yet require the concurrence of the house.

The bill for the better regulation of the ordnance department, was read a third time as amended, and passed.

Monday, Feb. 6.—The bill from the house to amend the act laying a duty on licences to retailers, was read a third time and passed.

Agreeably to notice, Mr. Barbour, leave being given, introduced a bill "to incorporate the subscribers to the bank of the United States of America;" which was read and passed to a second reading.

[The principal features of this bill are as follows: the capital to consist of fifty millions of dollars, payable, twenty millions in treasury notes, fundable at the pleasure of the government in stock to bear an interest of 6 per cent.; fifteen millions in any public stock bearing 6 per cent. interest; five millions in specie; and ten millions to be subscribed by the government in stock bearing an interest of 4 per cent. per annum; the government to have the capacity to borrow thirty millions of the bank at 6 per cent. interest; the directors not to be obliged to pay specie until the last payment on the stock shall be completed; and, upon the petition of the directors, the government may introduce any regulation which shall be thought proper in regard to the specie payments of the bank; the subscriptions to be opened on the first Monday in April, at which time the first payment of one-fifth of the whole amount of subscription shall be payable, and the remaining four-fifths in four quarter-yearly instalments; the bank to go into operation as soon as twenty millions are thus paid in. The directors for the first year are named in the bill.]

The president laid before the senate the annual report of the commissioners of the sinking fund.

Tuesday, February 7. The bill to authorize the purchase for the use of the United States, of a tract of land near Plattsburg, was read a third time and passed.

Wednesday, February 8. The senate was accupied this day on the bill to establish a national bank.

Mr. Giles moved an amendment, the object of which was to confine the stock (payable on account of subscriptions to the capital of the bank) to such stock as should be hereafter created.

After an animated and interesting debate, this motion was negatived—

For the motion	15
Against it	18

And the senate adjourned at sun-down.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Thursday, February 2.—Mr. Kilbourn submitted for consideration the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the committee of claims be instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing by law for the paying to the mounted volunteers and drafted militia, who have served in the south-western army under the command of generals Jackson and Floyd, against the Creek Indians, or to their heirs or assigns, the value of the horses by them lost in said service, in consequence of the men being dismounted and separated from their horses, by order of their respective commanding officers, on any expedition, or in consequence of the riders being killed, or wounded in battle, deducting from the original value of such horses respectively, as received into the service, the amount of which may have been paid for the use thereof in any of the cases, prior to the loss of the same as aforesaid."

The resolution was amended, on motion of Mr. Hall of Geo. by inserting after the words "wounded in battle," the words—"or who have lost their horse or horses whilst in the service of the United States, by any unavoidable accident;" and

On the adoption of the resolution as amended, the vote, after debate, stood as follows:

For the resolve	67
Against it	49

So the resolve was passed.

The engrossed bill making appropriations for the support of government for the year 1815; the engrossed bill concerning the courts of justice in the Indiana territory; and the engrossed bill authorizing the president of the United States to receive into the service certain volunteer corps, which may be raised and organized by any state, in lieu of the detachments of the militia thereof, were severally read a third time, passed and sent to the senate for their concurrence.

The bill supplementary to the act confirming certain claims to land in the Illinois territory, and the bill for taxing lotteries, passed through committees of the whole, were severally amended, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

Friday, Feb. 3. The bill for laying a duty or tax on lotteries was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, as was also the bill for laying a duty on gold and silver plate, jewelry and paste work.

Saturday, Feb. 4. The engrossed bills for taxing lotteries, and for laying a duty on gold, silver and plated ware and jewelry, were each read a third time and passed, and sent to the senate for concurrence.

The order of the day on the report of the committee of investigation (usually so named) having been called over, it was, on motion, ordered that the further consideration thereof be postponed indefinitely.

The bill for the relief of [Amey Dardin] the representative of David Dardin, deceased, passed through a committee of the whole, was widely debated, and at last (perhaps for the twentieth time in one or other branch of the legislature) ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, by the following vote:

For the bill	69
Against it	59

The amendments of the senate to the bill, to amend the act, establishing the navy department, by adding thereto a board of commissioners, were read and concurred in.

The amendments of the same body, to the bill for the better regulation of the ordnance department, were also read and committed.

The bill from the senate, making appropriations for repairing or re-building the public buildings, in the city of Washington, was twice read and committed.

Monday, Feb. 6. Mr. Troup from the committee on military affairs, made a report recommending the adoption of the following resolve:

Resolved, by the senate and house of representatives of the United States of America in congress assembled, That the thanks of congress be and they are hereby presented to major general Jackson, and through him to the officers and men under his command, for their gallantry and good conduct, in defeating the enemy before the city of New-Orleans, in successive battles fought on the 23d of December, 1814, and 1st and 8th of January, 1815; in which a British veteran army, formidable in number as in discipline, commanded by renowned generals, was thrice beaten and driven back with great loss, and in the battle of the 8th of Jan. with immense slaughter, by a militia force hastily collected to the defence of that city, aided by a small body of regular troops; thus illustrating the patriotic defence of the country with brilliant achievement, and signaling the Americans by steady perseverance, incessant vigilance, patient suffering, undaunted firmness, and in victory moderation and clemency: And that the president of the United States be requested to cause a gold medal to be struck with suitable emblems and devices, and presented to major-general Jackson, in testimony of the high sense entertained by congress of events so memorable, and of services so eminent.

The resolves were twice read and referred to a committee of the whole.

Mr. Rich, of Vermont, after a handsome address, introduced the following resolutions:

Resolved, That the committee on military affairs, be instructed to enquire into the expediency of providing by law, for arranging the citizens subject to the direct tax, into classes in such manner that each shall, as far as may be practicable, consist of persons residing contiguous to each other, and from which together — hundred dollars shall be due; and of permitting each class to furnish one man for the regular army, within a given number of days, in lieu of the said tax.

Resolved, That the said committee be instructed to enquire into the expediency of augmenting the direct tax for the present year, so that it may be sufficient to procure — thousand men at — hundred dollars each.

The house having agreed to consider the resolutions, Mr. R. supported their general propositions in a speech of considerable length and pungency. Mr. Webster opposed the resolves generally. Mr. Goldsborough wished the subject referred to a committee of the whole. Mr. Wright was sorry that the resolutions were introduced, as they would consume time, and produce no good, intimating that a supply of money would be more useful for the recruiting service. Mr. Grosvenor was opposed to the resolution in principle, and thought it was also impracticable. Mr. Gholson, without offering an opinion on the resolutions, thought the subject required serious attention. Mr. Fisk of Vt. opposed a postponement of the resolutions; he thought they were susceptible of modifications that might make them efficient. Mr. Lowndes objected to the plan of making the direct tax a means of raising men. Mr. Troup, the chairman of the military committee, spoke at length. He expressed no opinion on these resolutions, but said the committee were prepared to report measures provided they saw a disposition in the house to support them, to answer the purposes of these resolves—or words to this effect: and he hoped that the house would so decide on them as to shew its real views. At length the resolves were ordered to be printed 58 to 39.

The engrossed bill for the relief of the Anacosta bridge company, and the engrossed bill for the relief of the heirs of David Dardin, deceased, were read a third time, passed and sent to the senate.

Tuesday, Feb. 7.—Mr. Shipherd, of N. Y. submitted a motion with a view to raise the pay of the members of congress—in explanation he alledged as one of his reasons that the money in which they received their compensation had greatly depreciated.—Among other remarks, Mr. Hall, of Geo. said that the doings of congress had depreciated at least as much as the paper with which they were paid. The motion was lost—for it 8, against it 99.

[Those who voted in the affirmative were Messrs. Boyd, Davis of Mass. Fisk of Vt. Grosvenor, Hopkins of Ky. Shipherd, Sturges, Thompson.]

The engrossed bill making provision for subsisting the armies of the United States by authorising the appointment of commissioners of subsistence, was read a third time and passed.

The house then, in committee of the whole, took up the bill from the senate appropriating $ 500,000 for the repair of the public buildings—after considerable debate the committee rose and reported progress, &c. [The money for this purpose has been offered at 6 per cent. by certain banks and individuals.]

Wednesday, Feb. 8.—Mr. Troup, from the military committee, offered certain resolutions [which we have not room for at present] in honor of the memory of generals Pike and Covington, honorable to gen. Harrison, lieu. col. Beatty, lieu. col. Croghan, generals Jackson, Floyd and Coffee, lieu. col. Armistead, and major Lawrence, which were twice read and referred to a committee of the whole. Several reports were received and a good deal of business forwarded. The bill to repair the public edifices (on the present scites) was ordered to a third reading, by yeas and nays: yeas 67, nays 55.

Thursday, Feb. 9. The bill for rebuilding the public edifices was passed by yeas and nays—yeas 78—nays 63.

POSTSCRIPT.

New York, Feb. 8. Extract of a letter from Boston, dated Feb. 6.—“The privateer Harpy, arrived at Salem this morning, having captured seven vessels—has a full cargo of dry goods, and brings London dates to the 2d, and verbal accounts to the 25th December.—The negotiations were still going on, and peace was expected immediately. Petitions from upwards of sixty manufacturing towns in England had been sent to parliament for a peace with America—that the prince regent mentioned in his speech to Parliament that there was every prospect of a peace with the United States, highly honorable to the British crown, &c. &c. The mail is closing.

[It will be recollected, that parliament was to meet on the 10th November, and that our former dates were only to the 5th of Nov.]

☞ We give the above for just as much as it is worth. It may be true.

☞ We have a report of a complete revolution in Spain. That gen. Mina had entered Madrid at the head of 140,000 men. That Ferdinand the fool and the ungrateful, had fled—that old Charles was “restored.”

From the Savannah Republican, Jan. 31.
NEW ORLEANS.

Richard Richardson, esq. of this place, arrived here, a few minutes since, from Darien, at which place he saw and conversed with captain Edward F. Tannah, of the United States' army, who informed him that a British bomb-ship arrived at St. Mary's, on Friday last, (27th) from the squadron off New-Orleans, in a passage of six or seven days, the officers of which stated, that a general engagement had taken place [meaning no doubt that of the 8th ult.] between the American and British armies, in which the latter was totally defeated—the destruction of the British officers was so great that there were scarcely any left to conduct the balance of the British army off the field; that the expedition against New-Orleans had been abandoned, and that the remainder of it would be turned against Savannah.

Glorious News!

Orleans saved and peace concluded.

"The star spangled banner in triumph shall wave
"O'er the land of the free and the home of the brave."

The matters detailed and recorded in the present number of the REGISTER, are of incalculable importance. The enemy has retired in disgrace from New-Orleans, and peace was signed at Ghent on the 24th December, on honorable terms: At least, so we believe from the dolefuls of the British ministerialists. For particulars, see the several heads.

In our next paper, as we hope by that time to be a little more composed under those joyful tidings, we shall endeavor to arrange a great mass of interesting matter that lies over for insertion.

Who would not be an American? Long live the republic! All hail! last asylum of oppressed humanity! Peace is signed in the arms of victory!

✂ The present number was held back on the hope of obtaining a copy of the TREATY. See page 397.

New Orleans preserved.

Copy of a letter from major-general Jackson to the secretary of war, dated

Head-quarters, 7th military district,
Camp 4 miles below New-Orleans, 19th Jan. 1815.

Last night at 12 o'clock, the enemy precipitately decamped and returned to their boats, leaving behind him, under medical attendance, eighty of his wounded including two officers, 14 pieces of his heavy artillery, and a quantity of shot, having destroyed much of his powder. Such was the situation of the ground which he abandoned, and of that through which he retired, protected by canals, redoubts, entrenchments and swamps on his right, and the river on his left, that I could not without encountering a risk, which true policy did not seem to require, or to authorize, attempt to annoy him much on his retreat. We took only eight prisoners.

Whether it is the purpose of the enemy to abandon the expedition altogether, or renew his efforts at some other point, I do not pretend to determine with positiveness. In my own mind, however, there is but little doubt that his last exertions have been made in this quarter, at any rate for the present season; and by the next I hope we shall be fully prepared for him. In this belief I am strengthened not only by the prodigious loss he has sustained at the position he had just quitted, but by the failure of his fleet to pass fort St. Philip.

VOL. VII.

His loss on this ground, since the debarkation of his troops, as stated by the last prisoners and deserters, and as confirmed by many additional circumstances, must have exceeded four thousand; and was greater in the action of the 8th than was estimated, from the most correct data then in his possession, by the inspector-general, whose report has been forwarded to you. We succeeded, on the 8th, in getting from the enemy about 1000 stand of arms of various descriptions.

Since the action of the 8th, the enemy have been allowed very little respite—my artillery from both sides of the river being constantly employed, till the night, and indeed until the hour of their retreat, in annoying them. No doubt they thought it quite time to quit a position in which so little rest could be found.

I am advised by major Overton, who commands at fort St. Philip, in a letter of the 18th, that the enemy having bombarded his fort for 8 or 9 days from 13 inch mortars without effect, had, on the morning of that day, retired. I have little doubt that he would have been able to have sunk their vessels had they attempted to run by.

Giving the proper weight to all these considerations, I believe you will not think me too sanguine in the belief that Louisiana is now clear of its enemy. I hope, however, I need not assure you, that wherever I command, such a belief shall never occasion any relaxation in the measures for resistance. I am but too sensible that the moment when the enemy is opposing us, is not the most proper to provide for them.

I have the honor to be, &c.

ANDREW JACKSON,

Maj. gen. comd'g.

P. S. On the 18th our prisoners on shore were delivered us, an exchange having been previously agreed to. Those who are on board the fleet will be delivered at Petit Coquille—after which I shall still have in my hands an excess of several hundred.

20th—Mr. Shields,* purser in the navy, has to-day taken 54 prisoners; among them are four officers.

A. J.

*I have the honor to claim the gallant Shields as one of my most respected friends. I have letters from him of the 16th and 17th ult. He says, "the day after the gun-boats were taken I was sent down under a flag of truce to ascertain the fate of our officers and men, with power to negotiate an exchange, especially for the wounded. But the enemy would make no terms—they treated the flag with contempt, and myself and the surgeon, who was with me, as prisoners, until the 14th inst. He has now lowered his tone, and begs the exchange that we offered. Defeat has humbled the arrogance of the enemy, WHO HAD PROMISED HIS SOLDIERS FORTY-EIGHT HOURS PILLAGE AND RAPINE OF THE CITY OF NEW-ORLEANS!"

"Our beloved Jackson deserves immortality. He was always in the hottest and thickest of the fight; and although his health is much impaired he still sticks to his post. We pray the Almighty to spare him."

"Every movement of the enemy indicates a retreat. I am just starting on a secret business to avenge myself. If I succeed, the affair will be creditable to me—if I fail, the world, at least, shall say 'there lived a man.'"

We have not yet the particulars of Mr. Shields' successful enterprise; but, I flatter myself when they come to hand, they will redound no little to the honor of my generous high-minded friend, and perhaps add a ray of glory to the blaze that encircles the American navy. Mr. S. was a volunteer.

He states that our five gun-boats had a complement of 200 men—they were attacked by forty-five boats carrying 1200 men. The fight against such fearful odds lasted one hour and fifty minutes—we had only five killed and thirty wounded; the enemy acknowledge a loss of 100; but Mr. Shields adds "we may with perfect safety double that number."

New-Orleans, January 16, 1815.

Copy of a letter from an officer in the U. S. army to his friend in this city, dated Camp, near New-Orleans, January 20, 1815.

The enemy have at length taken their departure, after having remained on the banks of the Mississippi for four weeks, within five miles of New-Orleans. They left their encampment on the night of the 18th instant, in the most secret and precipitate manner; they left on the field 16 pieces of cannon, their equipments and an immense number of ball; their dead were left in the most shameful manner, not half buried. They left 70 of their wounded in their camp, and two surgeons, with a request from general Lambert to general Jackson to consider them as prisoners of war; they being mangled in such a manner on the morning of the 8th by our cannon, that they found it impossible to take them off.—Among the number are several officers. We had an exchange of prisoners a day or two before they left here, those taken in the gun-boats and about 40 we lost on the night of the 23d ult.—We also received an express from fort St. Philip yesterday.—The British fleet left there and returned down the river on the morning of the 17th inst. after a bombardment of nine days, during which time they threw better than 1000 shells in and about the fort; we have ascertained the enemy's loss to be better than two thousand on the 8th, and by their own accounts since the evening of the 23d they have lost 3,600 men, while ours does not amount to 100 in killed and wounded; we are also perfectly acquainted with their regiments and strength, they had landed 9,400. General Gibbs is also dead.

From the Mississippi Republican—Extra.

NEW ORLEANS, Jan. 20, 1815.

Messrs. Isler and McCurdy—Gentlemen—Immediately after the repulse of the British forces, on the 8th inst. they commenced active preparations for a re-embarkation of the troops. All the sick and wounded were sent on board, together with such baggage and munitions of war as could be safely spared. During these operations, the enemy kept up a menacing attitude—frequent indications were given of an intention to renew the attack on our lines, and vigorous works of defence were thrown up in front of our camp. The rear of their army retired first, while they displayed a numerous body of men to our view, and at night their fires seemed rather to increase than diminish. They had erected batteries to cover their retreat, in advantageous positions, from their original encampment, to the bayou through which they entered Lake Bourgne. The cannon placed on these batteries could have raked a pursuing army in every direction, and any attempt to storm them would have been attended with great slaughter indeed. Having made the necessary arrangements, on the night of the 18th inst. the whole army precipitately retreated to their boats, which were prepared to receive them, leaving behind about 20 pieces of artillery, which were spiked, and from 120 to 130 prisoners, including the wounded who could not be conveniently removed. On the morning of the 19th, the cavalry, commanded by maj. Hinds, were ordered to pursue the enemy, and make prisoners of such as could be overtaken, and ascertain whether the enemy had re-embarked his whole force or not. This duty was performed by that valuable officer with his usual vigilance and promptitude. I joined in the pursuit, and had the pleasure of receiving the surrender of about ninety prisoners, including the wounded who had been left by the British commander to the mercy of general Jackson. I accompanied the surgeon who remained with those sent to the head-quarters of the general, who confirmed the assurances I had previously given that the unfortunate wounded prisoners, who had thus fallen into our hands, should be treated with the utmost humanity. The watch-word and counter-sign of the enemy on the morning of the 8th was, BEAUTY and BOOTY. Comment is unnecessary on these significant allusions held out to a licentious soldiery. Had victory declared on their side, the scenes of Havre de Grace, of Hampton, of Alexandria, and of St. Sebastians, would without doubt have been re-acted at New Orleans, with all the unfeeling and brutal inhumanity of the savage foe with whom we are contending. But Heaven be praised, we are relieved from all apprehension; our arms have been crowned with triumphant success; the enemy is driven in disgrace from our soil, and I trust ere long our shores will be redeemed from the desolating visits of his majesty's army and navy.

Information has this moment arrived, that Thomas Shields, who was lately confined on board the British fleet, has made an attack on some of the boats of the enemy, and taken fifty-four prisoners.

I am, gentlemen, your obedient servant,
GEO. POINDEXTER.

Copy of a letter from captain Henley, commanding late United States' schooner Carolina, to commodore Patterson, dated

New-Orleans, December 28th, 1814.

SIR—I have the honor to inform you, that after you left here on the 26th instant, in pursuance to your order, every possible exertion was made to move the schooner Carolina higher up the river and near general Jackson's camp, without success; the wind being at N. N. W. and blowing fresh and too scant to get under way, and the current too rapid to move her by warping, which I had endeavored to do with my crew.

At day-light on the morning of the 27th, the enemy opened upon the Carolina a battery of five guns from which they threw shells and hot shot; returned their fire with the long 12-pounder, the only gun on board which could reach across the river, the remainder of her battery being light 12 pound cannonades.

The air being light and at north, rendered it impossible to get under way; the second shot fired by the enemy lodged in the schooner's main hold under her cables, and in such a situation as not be come at, and fired her, which rapidly progressed; finding that hot shot were passing through her cabin and filling room, which contained a considerable quantity of powder; her bulwarks all knocked down by the enemy's shot, the vessel in a sinking situation, and the fire encreasing, and expecting every moment that she would blow up, at a little after sunrise I reluctantly gave orders for the crew to abandon her, which was effected, with the loss of one killed and six wounded; a short time after I had succeeded in getting the crew on shore, I had the extreme mortification of seeing her blow up.

It affords me great pleasure to acknowledge the able assistance I received from lieutenants Norris and Crowley, and sailing-master Hatter, and to say that my officers and crew behaved on this occasion, as well as on the 23d when under your own eye, in a most gallant manner.

Almost every article of clothing belonging to the officers and crew, from the rapid progress of the fire, was involved in the destruction of the vessel.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

(Signed) JOHN D. HENLEY.

P. S. I have not made out a detailed account of the action on the night of the 23d, as you were on board during the whole action.

Captain Daniel T. Patterson, commanding United States' naval forces on the New-Orleans station.

Copies of letters from commodore Patterson, commanding our naval force on the Orleans station, to the secretary of the navy, dated

U. S. ship Louisiana, 4 miles below New-Orleans, 29th December, 1814.

SIR—I have the honor to inform you, that on the morning of the 28th instant, at about half past seven, perceived our advanced guard retreating towards our lines—the enemy pursuing; fired shot, shells, and rockets, from field artillery, with which they advanced on the road behind the levee; sprung the ship to bring the starboard guns to bear upon the enemy; at 25 minutes past 8 A. M. the enemy opened their fire upon the ship, with shells, hot shot, and rockets, which was instantly returned with great spirit and much apparent effect, and continued without intermission till 1 P. M. when the enemy slackened their fire, and retreated with a part of their artillery from each of their batteries, evidently with great loss. Two attempts were made to screen one heavy piece of ordnance mounted behind the levee, with which they threw hot shot at the ship, and which had been a long time abandoned before they succeeded in recovering it, and then it must have been with very great loss, as I distinctly saw, with the aid of my glass, several shot strike in the midst of the men (seamen) who were employed dragging it away. At 3 P. M. the enemy were silenced; at 4 P. M. ceased firing from the ship, the enemy having retired beyond the range of her guns. Many of their shot passed over the ship, and their shells burst over her decks, which were strewn with their fragments; yet, after an incessant cannonading of upwards of seven hours, during which time eight hundred shot were fired from the ship, one man only was wounded slightly, by the piece of a shell, and one shot passed between the bowsprit and heel of the jib-boom.

The enemy drew up his whole force, evidently with an intention of assaulting gen. Jackson's lines, under cover of his heavy cannon, but his cannonading being so warmly returned from the lines and ship Louisiana, caused him, I presume, to abandon his project, as he retired without making the attempt. You will have learned by my former letters, that the crew of the Louisiana is composed of men of all nations, (English excepted) taken from the streets of New-Orleans not a fortnight before the battle; yet I never knew guns better served, or a more animated fire, than was supported from her.

Lieut. C. C. B. Thompson deserves great credit for the discipline to which in so short a time he had brought such men, two-thirds of whom do not understand English.

General Jackson having applied for officers and seamen to work the heavy cannon on his lines furnished by me, lieutenants Norris and Crowley, of the late schooner Carolina, instantly volunteered, and with the greater part of her crew were sent to those cannon, which they served during the action herein detailed. The enemy must have suffered a great loss in that day's action, by the heavy fire from this ship and gen. Jackson's lines, where the cannon was of heavy calibre, and served with great spirit.

I have the honor to be, with great consideration and respect, your obedient servant,

DANL. T. PATTERSON.

The hon. secretary of the Navy, Washington city.

Marine battery, five miles below New Orleans
13th January, 1815.

SIR—I have the honor to inform you, that during the 2d and 3d inst. I landed from the ship and mounted, as the former ones, on the banks of the river, four more 12 pounders, and erected a furnace for heating shot, to destroy a number of buildings which intervened between gen. Jackson's lines and the camp of the enemy, and occupied by him. On the evening of the 4th, I succeeded in firing a number of them, and some rice stacks by my hot shot, which the enemy attempted to extinguish, notwithstanding the heavy fire I kept up, but which at length compelled them to desist. On the 6th and 7th, I erected another furnace, and mounted on the banks of the river two more 24 pounders, which had been brought up from the English Turn, by the exertions of colonel Caldwell, of the drafted militia of this state, and brought within and mounted on the entrenchments on this side of the river, one 12 pounder; in addition to which, gen. Morgan, commanding the militia on this side, planted two brass six pound field pieces in his lines, which were incomplete, having been commenced only on the 4th; these three pieces were the only cannon on the lines, all the others being mounted on the bank of the river, with a view to aid the right of gen. Jackson's lines on the opposite shore, and to flank the enemy should they attempt to march up the road leading along the levee, or erect batteries on the same, of course could render no aid in defence of general Morgan's lines. My battery was manned in part from the crew of the ship, and in part by militia detailed for that service by general Morgan, as I had not seamen enough to fully man them.

During greater part of the 7th, reconnoitered the enemy at Villere's plantation, whose canal, I was informed, they were deepening and opening to the river, for the purpose of getting their launches in, which upon examination with my glass I found to be true, and informed general Jackson of my observations by letters, copies of which I enclose herewith; a reinforcement to general Morgan's militia; was made in consequence, consisting of about 400 militia from Kentucky, very badly armed or equipped, the general not having arms to furnish them, who arrived on this side on the morning of the 8th, much fatigued. At 1 A. M. finding that the enemy had succeeded in launching their barges into the river, I despatched my aid-de-camp, Mr. R. D. Shepperd, to inform general Jackson of the circumstance, and that a very uncommon stir was observed in the enemy's camp and batteries on the banks of the river, and stating again the extreme weakness of this side of the river, and urging a reinforcement. I would have immediately dropped down with the Louisiana upon their barges, but to do so I must have withdrawn all the men from the battery on shore, which I deemed of the greatest importance, and exposed to fire by hot shot from the enemy's batteries, mounting 6 long 18 pounders, which protected their barges; and at this time she had on board a large quantity of powder, for the supply of her own guns, and those on shore, most of which was above the surface of the water, consequently exposed to their hot shot.

General Morgan despatched the Kentuckians immediately on their arrival, about 5 A. M. to reinforce a party which had been sent out early on the night of the 7th, to watch and oppose the landing of the enemy, but who retreated after a few shot from the enemy within the lines, where they were immediately posted, in their station, on the extreme right. At day light, the enemy opened a heavy cannonade upon general Jackson's lines, and my battery, leading their troops under cover of their cannon to the assault of the lines, which they attempted on the right and left, but principally on the latter wing; they were met by a most tremendous and incessant fire of artillery and musketry, which compelled them to retreat with precipitation, leaving the ditch filled, and the field strewn with their dead and wounded. My battery was opened upon them simultaneously with those from our lines, flanking the enemy both in his advance and retreat with round, grape and canister, which must have proved extremely destructive, as in their haste and confusion to retreat they crowded the top of the levee, affording us a most advantageous opportunity for the use of grape and canister, which I used to the greatest advantage. While thus engaged with the enemy on the opposite shore, I was informed they had effected their landing on this side, and were advancing to general Morgan's breast-work. I immediately ordered the officers in command of my guns to turn them in their embrasures, and point them to protect general Morgan's right wing, whose lines, not extending to the swamp, and those weakly manned, I apprehended the enemy's out-flanking him on that wing, which order was promptly executed by captain Henley and the officers stationed at the battery under a heavy and well directed fire of shot and shells from the enemy on the opposite bank of the river; at this time the enemy's force had approached general Morgan's lines, under the cover of a shower of rockets, and charged in despite of the fire from a 12 pounder and field pieces mounted on the lines as before stated, when, in a few minutes, I had the extreme mortification and chagrin to observe general Morgan's right wing, composed as hereinmentioned of the Kentucky militia, commanded by major Davis, abandon their breast work and flying in a most shameful and dastardly manner, almost without a shot; which disgraceful example, after firing a few rounds, was soon followed by the whole of general Morgan's command, notwithstanding every exertion was made by him, his staff and several officers of the city militia, to keep them to their posts; by the great exertions of those officers a short stand was effected on the field, when a discharge of rockets from the enemy caused them again to retreat in such a manner that no efforts could stop them. Finding myself thus abandoned by the force I relied upon to protect my battery, I was most reluctantly and with inexpressible pain, after destroying my powder and spiking my cannon, compelled to abandon them, having only thirty officers and seamen with me. A part of the militia were rallied at a saw mill canal, about two miles above the lines from which they had fled and there encamped. I ordered the Louisiana to be warped up, for the purpose of procuring a supply of ammunition, and mounting other cannon, remaining myself to aid general Morgan. A larger reinforcement of militia having been immediately dispatched by general Jackson to this side, every arrangement was made by general Morgan to dislodge the enemy from his position, when he precipitately retreated, carrying with him the two field pieces and a brass howitz, after having first set fire to the platform and gun carriages on my battery, two saw mills, and all the bridges between him and general Morgan's troops, and re-crossed the river, and secured his boats, by hauling them into his canal. On the 9th, we re-occupied our former ground, and recovered all the cannon in my battery, which I immediately commenced drilling and re-mounting. And on the evening of the 10th, had two 24 pounders mounted and ready for service, on the left flank of a new and more advantageous position. From the 10th to the present date, I have been much engaged in mounting my 12 pounders, along the breast work erected by general Morgan on this new position, having three 24 pounders (with a furnace) to front the river, and flank general Jackson's lines on the opposite bank, from which we fired upon the enemy wherever he appeared; our present position is now so strong, that there is nothing to apprehend should the enemy make another attempt on this side.

To captain Henley, who has been with me since the destruction of his schooner, and who was wounded on the 8th, I am much indebted for his aid on every occasion, and to the officers commanding the different guns in my battery, for their great exertions at all times, but particularly on the trying event of the 8th. The exertions of general Morgan, his staff and several of the officers of the city militia, excited my highest respect; and I deem it my duty to say that had the drafted and city militia been alone on that day, that I believe they would have done much better; but the flight of the Kentuckians, paralyzed their exertions and produced a retreat, which could not be checked. The two brass field pieces, manned entirely by militia of the city, were admirably served, nor were they abandoned till deserted by their comrades, one of which was commanded by Mr. Hosmer, of captain Simpson's company, the other by a Frenchman, whose name I know not. The 12 pounder under the direction of acting midshipman Phillibert, was served till the last moment, did great execution, and is highly extolled by general Morgan. The force of the enemy on this side amounted to 1,000 men, and from the best authority I can obtain, their loss on this side, I have since learned, was 97 killed and wounded; among the latter is colonel Thornton who commanded; of the former five or six have been discovered buried, and lying upon the field; our loss was one man killed and several wounded.

I have the honor to be, with great consideration and respect, your obedient servant,

DANIEL T. PATTERSON.

The hon. Secretary of the navy, Washington city

Marine Battery, 5 miles below New-Orleans, 20th Jan. 1815.

Sir—I have great satisfaction in informing you, that the enemy, after having been several days sending off his sick, wounded and baggage, retreated with his whole force on the night of the 18th, and, as I learn, completed the embarkation of his troops about midnight yesterday; leaving in his hospital 83 wounded, who could not be removed, with a surgeon and surgeon's mate to attend to them. He has also left fourteen pieces of cannon, 10 long eighteen pound ship guns, and four 24 pound carronades.—Six of the eighteen pounders are only spiked, and can easily be rendered fit for service; the other four, with the carronades, cannot be made serviceable—the former having their trunnions broken off, the latter the promillions. A great number of shot have also been left, which can easily be collected. I have every reason to believe, that they have also left behind the brass pieces taken from this side the river. From the date of my last to the retreat, I have fired from my battery on the enemy whenever opportunity offered, and with a 9 pound brass field piece, which I sent two miles below my battery to rake their camp, continuing my fire till eleven o'clock at night on the 18th, directly into their camp, from which they suffered much.

By a letter received last evening from acting lieutenant Cunningham, commanding gun vessel No. 65, stationed at Plaquemine to aid fort St. Philip, who had drawn his crew on shore and manned two 32 pounders, I learn that the enemy's vessels, viz. three ships, one brig and schooner, two of which were bomb vessels, had departed after bombarding the fort from the sixth, during which time they threw one thousand shells, without injury to the fort, killing only one man, and wounding seven in the fort. He states his vessel's spars and rigging to be much cut to pieces but none of his men hurt. He had sent his boat to watch their movements; and should I learn by her that they have not left the river, I shall immediately proceed with fire vessels and endeavor to destroy them.

In a few days I will have the pleasure of stating to you the names of my officers who have distinguished themselves, and merit the notice of the department.

I have the honor to be, with great consideration and respect, your obedient servant,

DANIEL T. PATTERSON.

The hon. secretary of the navy, Washington city.

FROM THE KENTUCKY PALLADIUM.

Extract of a letter from gen. John Adair to governor Shelby dated,

Head-Quarters, 5 miles below Orleans,
January 13th, 1815.

DEAR SIR—When we arrived at this camp on the 5th inst. only a part of our men could be armed.—Major general Thomas was unwell. I was ordered by maj. gen. Carroll's command, who defended the centre of our works, which was the most vulnerable. This detachment consisted of col. Slaughter's regiment and major Harrison's battalion. Lieut. col. Davis, who commanded the 13th regiment, was soon after ordered to cross the river with 400 men to reinforce gen. Morgan. In this situation we continued until the morning of the 8th, when the enemy attacked us in our lines. His main column was led against our centre, as we expected; a column was led at the same time against our right. Their columns were formed and led on with a degree of bravery that, at least, commanded our respect—three times they were repulsed. On their second charge they entered our ditch—our men, both Kentuckians and Tennesseans, sustained the attack, and repelled them with a bravery never surpassed, and when the enemy entered our ditch, many of our men jumped on the breast work to meet them and killed them one on another. It would not be proper for me to distinguish any by name—the detachment under my command, both officers and men, have done their duty faithfully, and honorably sustained the character of the state to which they belong. The detachment on the other side of the river, under lieut. col. Davis, were obliged to retreat before a superior force. They have been calumniated by those who ought to have fought with them, but did not—some of them have perhaps behaved improperly, but I have no doubt col. Davis did his duty as far as was in his power—an investigation is about to take place when I trust the blame will fall where it ought.

Desert to the news from New Orleans.

ENGLISH extracts and sayings, with a few remarks—and also some interesting scraps.

From the Democratic Press. The following circumstance has been this day communicated to me, accompanied with such evidence as commands my implicit belief; and the government of the United States may be furnished with a statement of the fact, on such testimony as shall command their credence.

The day after the news of the burning of Washington city reached Paris, a member of the French government expressed to lord Castlereagh his doubts as to the fact, to which his lordship (who to the American minister talked of his "friends in congress") replied—"Sir, it is true beyond all doubt, and I expect that at this time most of the large sea port towns in America are laid in ashes—that we are in possession of New Orleans, and have command of all the waters of the Mississippi and the lakes, so that the Americans are now little better than prisoners at large, in their own country."

"Our towns in ashes!"—here is the "religion" of the British government! who ever heard of such a war, except in the history of barbarians, that of the British in India excepted? "Our towns in ashes!"—here is the "magnanimity" of "high-souled" England, the nation that is held up to us as the pattern of all that is virtuous and good. "Our towns in ashes!"—"What more would Goths and Vandals do? I believe lord Castlereagh may have said this—for admiral Cochrane officially proclaimed it as the intention of his government "to destroy all places found assailable." Well—Baltimore and New Orleans were not "assailable."

If I could dare to put upon paper the things I have heard, from gentlemen of unquestioned truth, of the Fanulism of the British soldiery, especially those who boast of being Wellington's "invincibles," the sober thinking people of the United States would be horror-struck with their depravity. So long accustomed to scenes of horror, they appear to have lost every thing that belongs to civilization; their manners are bestial, and their language shocking.—I wish I knew how to describe their conduct, without horrifying my readers. I cannot do it—yet the facts ought to be known. It may be added that the officers encouraged the men in brutalizing themselves; indeed, that many of them are little better than the common soldiers. Take the following in evidence—an elderly gentleman, taken prisoner at North Point, surrendered to a British officer, (with two epaulets) on horse back. "Deliver your watch!" cried the officer, "or I'll cut off your head, you d—d old villain." "I have no watch, sir," returned the prisoner. "Out with your money, you d—d rascal," at the same time striking him a very severe blow with the back of his sword. The money was "delivered," and by this time others came up who took charge of him. He was soon stripped nearly naked, and so remained for a considerable time. I am satisfied that this statement is entirely correct.

To proceed to another subject—

I apprehend that every man, whose blood is not as cold as a serpent's, is inclined to believe what he wishes. It may be there are some of such lugubrious minds, as never to anticipate good. But good and evil are mere comparative terms; and what is evil to the United States is good to Great Britain and her faction here; and that the latter wished the fall of Orleans, I have no more doubt of than that I myself live, and move, and have being. "Their party rises as their country sinks," observes the author of the Olive Branch. This is a truth that applies with singular force to the Jacobins of the United States. We might select a hundred articles like the following:

From the Federal Republican of Jan. 14, 1815.—"Mr. Madison has scarcely raised his little finger to preserve New Orleans." "New Orleans—The suspicion gains ground that the government is in possession of the OFFICIAL account of the capture of this important city."

From the same of January 17.—"That Mr. Madison will find it convenient, and will determine finally to abandon the state of Louisiana, we entertain no doubt. Let the issue decide whether we do the man injustice. An enquiry by congress into the cause of the fall of New Orleans or of Mobile, WHEN THE INTELLIGENCE TRANSPIRES, will fix the blame upon the executive."

From the same of January 20.—"A few African and West India regiments, accustomed to such a climate, will be sufficient to garrison New Orleans, while the Wellington troops will return to the Chesapeake, and those in Canada, like another horde, rush into New York, and overrun the north-west."

On Friday evening, the 3d of Feb. instant, a member of congress said, absolutely, that government was in possession of information that the British had taken New Orleans.

A correspondent of the New York Evening Post, under date of Washington, Jan. 30, after dilating on the terrible management of government in permitting the Kentuckians to arrive without arms, &c. says "It is the general opinion here that the city (Orleans) must fall."

Ag. in—

In the year 1781, admiral Rodney captured the island of St. Eustacia—he made prize of the property of individuals to an immense amount. All the world cried out shame—and Rodney, who had gained one of the greatest and most important naval victories that Englishmen had ever achieved; was completely disgraced for it. He died miserably, and so poor that he did not leave behind him enough to bury himself, and no man pitied his fate.

But things are strangely altered. Gordon made prize of what he pleased at Alexandria, and it was universally supposed that all the cotton, sugar, &c. &c. at New Orleans, the property of private persons, would be plundered and carried off by the British, if they got possession of the place. The London Courier, a little while since, consoled the English manufacturers with an assurance that they would soon receive a supply of cotton, it being the design of the government to take a certain district where it abounded—and a fellow at Jamaica placed large funds at Bermuda, in readiness to speculate on the spoils of Orleans!

And a writer in the New York Evening Post, taking it for granted, also, that such goods would be plundered, made the following calculation of the value of the "booty:—"

Correction.—In our paper of Friday last, we made a rough and hasty estimation of the amount of property at New Orleans. Since then, a friend, who has long resided at that place in the capacity of a merchant, informs us, that our estimate was egregiously incorrect. He says—"The quantity of cotton you mention as being stored at New Orleans, is not far from correct—say 100,000 bales, averaging 320 pounds each bale, at least; which is 32,000,000 pounds of cotton, all paid for at from eight up to fourteen cents a pound, and belonging chiefly to the merchants of the Atlantic states. Therefore, if we put the average price at ten cents a pound, it will be about right, and this will amount to 3,200,000 dollars—Say that cotton is worth in England two shillings per pound—32,000,000 pounds, at two shillings sterling, is fourteen millions two hundred and twenty thousand two hundred and twenty-two dollars. Independent of the above 100,000 bales, there must be added this last year's crop, which remains mostly in the hands of the planters. I should say 40,000 bales at least. Also this last year's crop of sugar, say 10,000 hogsheds, averaging 1400 pounds each hogshedd, at nine cents a pound, (at which rate it ought, I think, to be valued) would be 1,260,000 dollars. The shipping might be valued at from 300 to 500,000 dollars. The Kentucky produce at that market, such as whiskey, flour, pork, cordage, hempen yarn, cotton bagging, &c. &c. must be very considerable. Of tobacco there is but very little. There are a variety of other articles, such as pig lead, copper, mahogany and logwood, which will serve to ballast the vessels that will take the cotton away if they capture the place; which God forbid."

From a Montreal paper of Jan. 14. "An evening paper of the 3d, from New-York adds, that an express had arrived from the southward stating the British force to have passed the Balize, to the number of 150 sail of vessels of all descriptions; the master of the schooner affirms that he actually saw 70 of them from his vessel.—It may be concluded in consequence, that hot work would soon follow, or that the place would be an easy conquest. We may calculate upon the latter, as it is well known that the bulk of the population is averse to the tyranny which has been exercised by the American government in that quarter. In fine, the occupation of New Orleans will be the means of securing the friendship and commerce of the states west of the Appalachia mountains, which contain more than a million of inhabitants, whose ruling passion is interest. They will be loyal to the nation which can best protect them and secure to them the most gain. We see an example of this in the late acquisition east of the Penobscot river where the people are already (on appearance at least) become loyal through interest.—Castine is the key of protection to them, as New Orleans is to the country above it.—The western states according to a law now pending in congress, will be saddled with war taxes to the amount of 823,000 dollars annually, which they may elude by declaring neutrality. There cannot be much doubt of their disposition to resist taxes as much as they would the British arms. We might enlarge on this subject, but shall for the present close our speculations, and wait another period when things will be better developed."

Another paper of the same date, printed at the same place, says—"The taking of New-Orleans may not be accomplished as soon or so easy as is expected by many, but that it will be taken before there is any treaty formed at Ghent, is confidently believed."

Barbadoes, Nov. 7. On Friday last, arrived at this port in 48 days from Plymouth, [having taken a route for secrecy, different from that usually followed by vessels from Europe,] his majesty's ships Bedford, Norge, Alceste, Bucephali, Belle Poule, Dover, Hydra, Gorgon, (a store ship,) and Norfolk, [a transport, with 230 troops, and military stores—under the command of major general Keene.] Dr. Thompson, formerly deputy inspector of Hospitals on this station, is attached to the division as inspector of hospitals.

The expedition, it is supposed, will leave this in the course of the present week. At this place they take on board about 1200 troops, and then proceed to collect those at Martinique, Guadalupe, St. Thomas and Santa Cruz; comprising in total about 6000 men.—They then proceed direct to Jamaica, and take in munitions and stores for their final destination.

As this is only the van of a grand expedition which must ere this have left England, consisting of 300 sail of men of war and transports, it develops an extensive and magnificent system of operations, highly creditable and consistent with the grandeur of the British empire. And as there is no other point in these latitudes, to afford an ample field for the exercise of so large an armament, their destination is undoubtedly for New Orleans, the capital of Louisiana; and it is but fair to conjecture that it is the purpose of our ministers to extend the line of military operations along up the Mississippi and Ohio rivers till they meet and communicate with our forces contiguous to lakes Michigan, Erie and Ontario, on Upper Canada—and thus completely encircle the U. States."

Since a knowledge of events at Orleans have disappointed the hopes of our factionists—they who would have ascribed all the dishonor to the government, if the place had fallen—give all the credit to the people for its preservation—on which the Columbian happily observes—"They [the Jacobins] say that government has done nothing and deserve no credit for the defence of New-Orleans—to the people all is due. They say also that government has done nothing for the defence of Castine and our eastern frontier—to the people, then, in that quarter what is due, or rather not due?"

British Parliament.

PRINCE REGENT'S SPEECH.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Tuesday, November 8.—This day, at 2 o'clock, the prince regent went in the usual state, to the house of peers, and being seated on the throne, pronounced the following most gracious speech to Parliament.

My lords and gentlemen,

It is with deep regret that I am again obliged to announce the continuance of his majesty's lamented indisposition.

It would have given me great satisfaction to have been enabled to communicate to you the termination of the war between this country and the United States of America.

Although this war originated in the most unprovoked aggression on the part of the government of the United States, and was calculated to promote the designs of the common enemy, against the rights and independence of all other nations, I never have ceased to entertain a sincere desire to bring it to a conclusion on just and honorable terms.

I am still engaged in negotiations for this purpose; the success of them, must, however, depend on my disposition being met with corresponding sentiments on the part of the enemy.

The operations of his majesty's forces by sea and land in the Chesapeake in the course of the present year, have been attended with the most brilliant and successful results.

The flotilla of the enemy in the Patuxent has been destroyed. The signal defeat of their land forces enabled a detachment of his majesty's army to take possession of the city of Washington; and the spirit of enterprize which has characterized all the movements in that quarter has produced on the inhabitants a deep and sensible impression of the calamities of a war in which they have been so wantonly involved.

The expedition directed from Halifax to the northern coast of the United States has terminated in a manner not less satisfactory. The successful course of this operation has been followed by the immediate submission of the extensive and important district, east of the Penobscot river, to his majesty's arms.

In adverting to these events, I am confident you will be disposed to render full justice to the valor and discipline which have distinguished his majesty's land and sea forces; and you will regret with me the severe loss the country has sustained by the fall of the gallant commander of his majesty's troops in the advance upon Baltimore.

I availed myself of the earliest opportunity afforded by the state of affairs in Europe, to detach a considerable military force to the river Saint Lawrence; but its arrival could not possibly take place till an advanced period of the campaign.

Notwithstanding the reverse which appears to have occurred on lake Champlain, I entertain the most confident expectation, as well from the amount as from the description of the British force now serving in Canada, that the ascendancy of his majesty's arms throughout that part of North America will be effectually established.

The opening of the congress at Vienna has been retarded from unavoidable causes, to a later period than had been expected.

It will be my earnest endeavor, in the negotiations which are now in progress, to promote such arrangements as may tend to consolidate that peace which, in conjunction with his majesty's allies, I have had the happiness of concluding; and to re-establish that just equilibrium amongst the different powers, which will afford the best prospect of permanent tranquility to Europe.

Gentlemen of the house of Commons,

I regret the necessity of the large expenditure which we must be prepared to meet in the course of the ensuing year; but the circumstances under which the long and arduous contest in Europe has been carried on and concluded, have unavoidably led to large arrears, for which you will see the necessity of providing; and the war still subsisting with America renders the continuance of great exertions indispensable.

His royal highness having finished the reading of the speech, and retired, the earl of Abingdon, after a variety of observations, concluded by moving the address, which, as is usual, was a mere echo of the regent's speech.

Lord Darnley could not approve of the terms used in the speech with respect to America. He conceived that the naval administration of the country had been badly conducted, and gave notice that he should feel it his duty to bring the subject forward as early as possible.

Lord Melville replied.

The duke of Norfolk reprobated the glowing terms in which the American war was spoken of in the regent's speech, which war he considered as truly disastrous.

Lord Grenville, in a speech of considerable length, opposed the address, and condemned the measures pursued in America. He said, the war with that country had assumed a new character, and described the burning of the civil buildings at Washington as an act of barbarous warfare, inconsistent with European manners.

Lord Liverpool replied to Lord G. and the address was carried without amendment.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

In the debate on the address to the regent, Mr. Whitbread said,

"It might not be useless to ask, what was the ground of difference between the two countries—for what England was fighting with America? Before they were called on to pay the price of the battle, he thought it would be wisdom to ascertain for what the battle was to be fought. Was it respecting boundary—the principle governing the impressment of seamen—or the general question of maritime rights? If they were fighting for the maritime rights of England—maritime rights, which, no doubt, would be defined by the congress at Vienna—it ought to be ascertained whether they did not wish to exact more from America than they desired from any other power. The effects resulting from the attack on Washington were very different from what it had been attempted to make this country believe; as it had enabled Mr. Madison to obtain those militias which were before withheld, and conciliated those parties which had been hostile to the war and the government. They heard nothing now of the separation of the states—of the increased spread of the spirit of disunion; for, since the attack on Washington, all had united to revenge this common wrong. The destruction which took place at Washington, the capital of a rising empire—conduct so unlike that of the Goths before the walls of Rome—whether or not there was any ground for retaliation, was quite unworthy of a great, dignified and powerful nation.

The chancellor of the Exchequer in reply, and in justification of the burning at Washington, said, "What did the Americans at York, the capital of Upper Canada? Why, they not only burnt the house of the governor, but also every house belonging to the meanest individual, even to a shell, and left the populace in a most wretched condition! !—[A gross falsehood.]

AMERICAN NEGOCIATION.

HOUSE OF LORDS, Nov. 19.—The marquis of Landsdown called the attention of the house to an official paper said to have been published by the American government, relative to the pretensions set up by the British government in the negotiations at Ghent, which, if authentic, called loudly for the interference of parliament; and required on the part of ministers, a justification of measures so new and extraordinary as were thus set forth in the American statement.

The earl of Liverpool had seen with much surprise the paper alluded to. With respect to the authority by which such a statement had appeared, he was ignorant. He believed it quite unprecedented in the history of negotiations to publish any separate articles of them until the whole were either agreed to or rejected. The negotiations were still pending, and he was sure the house would perceive the impropriety of entering into any discussion of the subject under such circumstances.

The marquis of Landsdown observed, that it not only charged the government of this country with setting up new and unheard-of claims but such as put an entirely different complexion on the quarrel, from that with which it commenced, and exposed every thing to doubt, uncertainty, and political distraction. The treaty with the Indians was a violation of all those former treaties by which this country had been connected with America.

The earl of Liverpool could assure the noble marquis and the house, that at the time at which the paper alluded to was dated, the negotiations between the governments were going forward; that they were still going forward, and at no intermediate time had ceased.

The earl of Donoughmore was by no means satisfied with the answer. The recent events on the other side of the Atlantic were such as called loudly for explanation, and the British people never had so much season to demand it. They had been taught to think they were contending for a vital principle, their marine independence; and it turned out at length that it was for extended territory.

HOUSE OF COMMONS, Nov. 19.

[The following remarks respecting America were made in debate on the army estimates.]

Mr. Whitbread remarked, that the news from America must naturally incline the house to ask, were the negotiations at Ghent still proceeding? (hear, hear.) Melancholy it was to reflect, that it now appeared on the authority of ministers themselves, that at the commencement of the contest, a large proportion of the American population were decidedly with us; but that we had so fought and so negotiated, that party had become extinct in the United States, and that but one common mind existed for directing the whole force of the republic against this country. (hear, hear.) Upon these points, he desired to be better informed before he gave his vote for going into the committee.

Mr. Vansittart said, it gave him great satisfaction to say, that the conferences at Ghent were not broken off; but he did not think it necessary to say any thing more at present.

Mr. Homer said, as to the subject of America, if the principle of war was entirely changed, and it was now wished to make conquests from America, he believed that the war would not meet with the same support from the feelings of the house or the public.

Mr. Ponsonby wished to ask the right hon. gentlemen, whether the papers purported to have been laid before the congress of America by Mr. Madison, were correct statements of what had passed at the negotiation at Ghent?

No reply was made from the treasury bench.

Mr. Baring conceived that the extraordinary measures they had pursued, and the extraordinary pretensions they had set up as to America, were subjects which made it necessary that the house should have more information than they were now in possession of. He thought that no man in the country could have expected that America would ever have yielded to such pretensions, at a time that we had gained no advantages over her in the war.

Mr. Stephen insisted that America had departed from the usual conduct of civilized governments, in publishing papers before the negotiation was terminated.

HOUSE OF LORDS, Nov. 26.
Congress at Vienna.

The earl of Donoughmore gave notice of his intention to bring under their lordship's consideration a subject, upon which it was of the utmost importance that the opinion of that house should be speedily and distinctly known. He wished the subject had fallen into hands better calculated to do it justice, and he had waited for a considerable time to see whether any one else was inclined to take it up before the recess; but not finding that it was the intention of any other person to call their lordships' attention to the matter at so early a period, he felt it his duty to do so: and, therefore, gave notice that on Thursday next he should submit a resolution to this effect,—that it was the duty of that house promptly and decidedly to declare its opinion upon the system of SPOILATION AND AGGRANDISEMENT which appeared to be pursued at the congress at Vienna: and he moved that the lords be summoned for that day; which was ordered accordingly.

In the HOUSE OF COMMONS, Nov. 14, the chancellor of the exchequer, after a high eulogium upon the late general Ross, moved that the prince regent be humbly requested to give directions for the erection of a monument to his memory. The motion was unanimously agreed to.

In the course of his remarks, the chancellor of the exchequer said, "He could not help expressing a hope, that this vengeance, thus signally inflicted, [alluding to the capture of Washington] would be the last, and that no aggravation would render a recourse to similar measures necessary. He also would take that opportunity of stating, that instructions had been sent out to the coast of America, to abstain from further inflictions, unless rendered necessary by fresh enormities—an order which he was satisfied, gen. Ross, had he lived, would have felt sincere pleasure in promulgating."

[We (many in Baltimore) have also had an idea of erecting a monument to the memory of the destroyer of the capitol, on the spot where his crime was retributed. The editor has had a plan of it in MS for several months.]

Important from Europe.

The British sloop of war Favorite arrived at New-York on Saturday evening last—passengers Mr. Carrol, one of the secretaries to our ministers at Ghent, and Mr. Baker, secretary to the British legation to the United States. The former with a copy of the TREATY OF PEACE concluded and signed by the British commissioners at Ghent on the 24th December, and the latter with the same ratified by the prince regent, and which being approved by the president and senate, is immediately to be communicated by him to the British fleets and armies in this quarter of the globe.

Copies and extracts from the papers brought by these gentlemen are inserted below—to which we have added a summary of things that room is not allowed to notice in detail.

From the London "Times" of December 30.

The state of the funds may be said to afford a most striking comment on the text of those who have the front to call the treaty of Ghent honorable to this country. What? An honorable peace, with the last of our adversaries, with a populous and commercial nation; and yet a depression in the public funds! the thing is impossible. There is a moral inconsistency in the facts. But the truth, unhappily, peeps out in the course of the eulogy bestowed on the famous specimen of diplomatic ingenuity. The peace is, like that of Amiens, a peace of necessity—and upon what grounds? "A leaning to certain points" it seems has been "hinted" at the congress of Vienna. Now, let us put this mysterious language into plain English. It can bear no other construction than this—that Russia, or Austria, or Prussia, has avowed an inclination to support the innovations on public law which Mr. Madison asserts. Might not this have been foretold; was it not foretold in this paper six months ago? Was it not the very argument we urged for pushing the war in America with the utmost vigor, whilst yet the field was open, and our adversary without allies? And is it not a motive for the same conduct, even at this late period? If any of the powers who have received our subsidies, or have been rescued from destruction by our courage and example, have had the baseness to turn against us, it is morally certain, that the treaty of Ghent will confirm them in their resolution. They will reflect that we have attempted to force our principles on America, and have failed. Nay, that we have retired from the combat with the stripes yet bleeding on our backs—with the recent defeats at Plattsburgh, and on lake Champlain, unavenged. [Miserable man!—what will he say when he hears of Orleans!] To make peace at such a moment, they will think betrays a deadness to the feelings of honor, and shows a timidity of disposition, inviting further insult. If we could have pointed to America overthrown, we should surely have stood on much higher ground at Vienna, and every where else, than we possibly can do now—Even yet, however, if we could but close the war with some great naval triumph, the reputation of our maritime greatness might be partially restored; but to say, that it has not hitherto suffered in the estimation of all Europe, and what is worse, of America herself, is to belie common sense and universal experience. "Two or three of our ships have struck to a force vastly superior!"—No, not two or three, but many, on the ocean, and whole squadrons on the lakes; and the numbers are to be viewed with relation to the comparative magnitude of the two navies.

Scarcely is there an American ship of war, which has not to boast a victory over the British flag; scarcely one British ship in thirty or forty, that has beaten an American. Our seamen, it is urged, have on all occasions fought bravely. Who denies it? Our complaint is, that with the bravest seamen and the most powerful navy in the world, we retire from the contest, when the balance of defeat is so heavy against us. Be it accident, or be it misconduct, we enquire not now into the cause; the certain, the inevitable consequences are what we look to, and these may be summed up in few words—the speedy growth of the American navy—and the recurrence of a new and much more formidable American war. From that fatal moment when the flag of the Guerriere was struck, there has been quite a rage for building ships of war in the United States. Their navy has been nearly doubled, and their vessels are of extraordinary magnitude. The people, naturally vain, boastful and insolent, have been filled with an absolute contempt of our maritime power, and furious eagerness to beat down our maritime pretensions. Those passions, which have been inflamed by success, could only have been cooled by what in vulgar but emphatic language has been termed "a sound flogging;" but, unfortunately, our christian meekness has induced us rather to kiss the rod, than to retaliate its exercise. Such false and feeble humanity is not calculated for the guidance of nations. War is, indeed, a tremendous engine of justice; but when justice wields the sword, she must be inflexible. Looking neither to the right nor to the left, she must pursue her blow, until the evil is rooted out. This is not blind rage or blinder revenge; but it is a discriminating, a calm and even a tender calculation of consequences. Better is it, that we should grapple with the young lion, when he is first fleshed with the taste of our flocks, than wait until, in the maturity of his strength, he bears away at once both sheep and shepherd.

The Chatham of 74 guns (built in memory of the Walcheren expedition) is ordered to be manned, and will, it is supposed, be sent to America to strengthen the preparations for that extended system of warfare, which must take place if the president should delay the ratification of the treaty. We are well convinced that every ship, and every soldier employed in maintaining the vital contest for our maritime ascendancy, far from diminishing, will add a proportional weight to our influence at Vienna; but in truth Vienna and all its fetes, and all its negotiations, are infinitely insignificant to us now compared with the growth of an American navy, and the probable loss of our transatlantic provinces. With respect to the latter point, it is certain that the present treaty will produce the most serious discontent among the Canadians, when they find that the great object of their wishes, a secure frontier communication, is referred to the decision of commissioners. They know, if the British public does not, what is the honesty of American commissioners; but, indeed, we ought to know it too, for we cannot well have forgotten the conduct of those appointed under the treaty of 1794. By that treaty two boards were established—one in England, to judge of American claims. The other in America to judge of English claims. The former proceeded with all justice and regularity, and actually adjudged to various claimants above a million and a half of money, which was paid by this country. The latter met, and received British claims to the amount of five millions and a half, but never proceeded to a single award. At this board were two American commissioners, the presence of whom at least was necessary to form a quorum; but these despicable swindlers, for their conduct entitles them to no better name, no sooner perceived that justice required a decision in favor of a British claimant, than they withdrew; and of course put an entire stop to the business. After this experience, it does seem a little extraordinary, that we should commit the future safety of Canada to a board of commissioners.

From the same, of Dec. 31.

Whether Mr. Madison may or may not ratify the treaty of Ghent will, perhaps depend on the result of the expedition to New-Orleans. The force from Falmouth and Cork, supposed to be destined on that expedition, appears from letters brought by the Amphion, not to have touched at Bermuda, but to have proceeded direct to the mouth of the Mississippi, whither admiral Cockburn followed them with such vessels as he could collect. The permanent occupation of Orleans would be a fatal blow to the American views of aggrandizement on the side of Louisiana; but that blow Mr. Madison has it now in his power to parry by a mere stroke of the pen. [Gen. Jackson, and his gallant companions, have done it by cannon and rifle balls.] On the other hand, if the expedition should encounter any serious obstacles, he would probably delay, if not wholly refuse to ratify the treaty. We therefore trust that he is strictly limited to its immediate ratification or rejection; besides being required to retract the insolent and menacing expressions in Munroe's official letter. The more disgraceful the treaty is to us in its terms, the more careful must we be to repel any aggravations of our dishonor. It is in vain that we are still told of the great satisfaction every where produced, "not merely because peace has been made, but because it has been made on such terms."—Look at the funds. Instead of rising 10 or 12 per cent, as might well have been expected from a secure and honorable peace, they keep a dead heavy level. Indeed, in the early part of yesterday, they drooped nearly one per cent. but recovered a little towards the close of the market. We learn from our correspondents, that the satisfaction expressed at the news was by no means so great or general in the country as has been asserted. At Birmingham, Manchester, and one or two other manufacturing places, the mails which brought intelligence of the peace were received, it is true, with many demonstrations of joy; but it is not true that the terms excited any satisfaction at Liverpool. The merchants of that place, most of whom are pretty well acquainted with the true complexion of American politics, indulged the gloomiest presages of the result; and the general opinion there was, that if Madison could by any means find resources to carry on the war, he would rejoice in adding to the indignities he has heaped on us, that of refusing to ratify the treaty.

From the London Courier, of Dec 27.

We have the great satisfaction to announce a peace with America. We announced it yesterday; but the intelligence did not arrive time enough to be inserted in the whole of our impression. Mr. BAKER, the bearer of the treaty, did not reach London till late in the day. At four o'clock nothing had transpired at the public offices. Soon afterwards, however, a letter was sent to the lord-mayor, and we procured a sketch of the terms upon which peace had been concluded, which was read to the audience at the Theatres. The fact (however it might be expected) was known in the city before government were in possession of it. It was about one o'clock that the rise in the funds began, and immense purchases were made.

The peace came probably very unexpectedly upon our readers; for the last American documents had assumed such a tone, had unfolded such pretensions, and held forth such menaces, that no one supposed that the same breath that blew the blast of war could have been playing to the American commissioners the dulcet dotes of peace. Such, however appears to have been the case. The despatches carried out by the John Adams, containing the documents relative to the negotiation, which the American government thought proper to publish, led to an immediate change in their intentions, and, however they might bluster and talk big, and propose new taxes and conscriptions, they were determined to make peace upon those terms of which we have subjoined a sketch. And those terms, we do not hesitate to pronounce, to be most honorable for this country.

Now what are the terms upon which the treaty has been concluded?

"The Americans have waived any stipulation on the subject of maritime rights, as well as respecting compensation for captures under the orders in council, or on any other account.

"The interests of the indians, allies to Great Britain, in the war, are provided for in this treaty by a stipulation that they are to be restored to all their possessions, rights and privileges, which they enjoyed, or to which they were entitled antecedent to the year 1812.

"All the disputed questions of territory and the boundary are to be referred to commissioners, to be respectively appointed under the conditions named in the treaty, and until the differences respecting them are decided, the islands in the bay of Passamaquoddy, are to remain in the possession of Great Britain.

"All other conquests on both sides are to be restored.

"There is to be no renewal of the right of fishery on the Newfoundland coast and no trade to our India possessions."

If the commissioners disagree, a friendly power is to be the umpire.

It cannot be said that we were at all influenced by the threat of raising 100,000 men and driving us out of Canada, for that was not known at Ghent when our commissioners signed the treaty.

No one will suspect us of undue partiality for America, and considering the circumstances under which Mr. Madison made his wanton aggression on this country, we certainly should not deplore any chastisement which he might receive.

In considering, however, the conditions of the peace, as we have been informed of them, we cannot but regard them as completely honorable to this country.

The American government began the war on account of the orders in council, and to enforce the relinquishment of impressment on board their merchant vessels.

The orders in council were repealed by our government before they knew the commencement of the war. The war was continued by America after she knew of the repeal of the orders in council, to compel us to relinquish the right of impressment.

It was America, and not Great Britain, which claimed a stipulation on this point.

The war is concluded by a peace in which no such stipulation is made.

OFFICIAL.

Extract of a letter to the lord mayor.

"It is my duty to acquaint your lordship, that a treaty of peace was signed at Ghent, 24th December instant. By the treaty hostilities will cease on its ratification by the president of the United States as well as by the prince regent.

(Signed)

BATHURST."

From the same of December 30.

We have been more anxious than usual to examine the different provincial papers in order that we might ascertain the effect of the peace with America. Wherever it has been made known, it has produced great satisfaction, not merely because peace has been made, but because it has been made upon such terms. The manner of its reception in Ireland and Scotland cannot, of course, be yet known. At Birmingham, an immense assemblage witnessed the arrival of the mail, and immediately took the horses out and drew the mail to the post-office with the loudest acclamations.

On the news arriving at Manchester, the greatest joy was expressed throughout the town.

The same feeling was exhibited at Liverpool, Bristol, and all other places from whence accounts have been brought either by the provincial papers or by the private letters.

From the Morning Chronicle of Dec. 30.

The speculators of the American produce, and bears in the cul de sac of the stock of exchange, are incessant in their croakings against the peace with America. Their attachment to the ministers, though strong, cannot reconcile them to this one step, though surely if they would look back with an impartial eye on the imbecility and error with which their idols conducted the war, they must acknowledge their prudence in putting an end to it. One of them very honestly said two days ago, that if they had not put an end to the war, the war would have put an end to their ministry. Instead then of deploping the peace, The Times, and its principles, ought to condemn the choice of the prince regent, in trusting the reins of government in hands so incapable of wielding the energies of the empire.

Certainly America might have been successfully attacked in many parts, if the force of Great Britain had been wisely directed. In a valuable sketch of the United States of North America, written by the late French consul general, and translated by WILLIAM WALTON, esq. we find this truth particularly acknowledged. "The United States," says the French consul, "are vulnerable on many points, but mortally so on three, viz. in the bay of Newport, or Rhode Island; in that of New-York, and also in the Chesapeake bay. Since the Americans have become possessed of Louisiana, they can no longer be invaded in the southern states; but they can be easily invaded in the northern states, situated on the east of the Hudson, by the European power that may be mistress of Canada, and have the command of the left bank of the river St. Lawrence." The author enters into detail, and explains the facility of the operations of a skillful soldier. But did our ministers avail themselves of the means in their hands to take advantage of this facility? Or, having so completely failed in every thing they undertook, would their friends desire that they should have gone on plunging themselves deeper in disgrace?

The Times is solicitous of drawing an argument against the popularity of the peace from the state of the public funds. The editor certainly forgets his former doctrine, that the stock exchange was no more to be relied on as a thermometer of public opinion than a tap-room. But certainly when it is recollected that the speculators anticipated this event; that purchases to an immense amount were made on the expectation of it; that there is the greatest bull account which has been known for years; and that this (though called the week of the feast of fools) is the week of the year when money is the scarcest, from its being the general week of balance, as well as the week of the payment into the bank of the collected revenue by the receivers—the operation on the funds is no criterion of public feeling on the peace.

The best means of ascertaining the fact of its being palatable, or the contrary, will be from the returns of the manufacturing districts throughout the empire, from the demand of hands, and the state of the custom-house books.

AMERICAN AFFAIRS.—SCRAPS.

Petitions signed by great multitudes of manufacturers, were presented to the prince regent in November, praying for peace with America. The publication of the despatches from Ghent had a most powerful effect on the honest part of the English people. Our demands were so reasonable, and the British so extravagant, that a change in our favor appears to have been made with electrical rapidity. Our ministers are to remain in Europe until spring. Cockburn whose memory will be infamous until history is lost in the "crush of matter and the wreck of worlds," is spoken of in England as a "second Nelson," and it is said he will have the "red ribbon"— that is, be made a knight of the Bath. American stocks advanced fifteen per cent. in Holland on the moment it was known that a treaty was signed.—The Favorite-sloop of war it is stated was selected on account of her name as the bearer of the news of peace, though she was not fit for sea; but she was completely caulked, and had her sails bent and her provisions and water on board and was ready for the voyage in 17 hours!

The proclamation of captain Thomas Boyle, of the Chasseur, [see Weekly Register page 290] declaring the strict blockade of the ports and harbors, &c. of the united kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, is published in the London Courier of the 24th December.

The London Gazette of Nov. 17, has a list of American vessels captured, burnt and destroyed by the squadron under rear admiral Hotham from 6th August to 9th October last, being eighty three vessels.—[These were chiefly small coasting vessels—the most of them wood-flats and fishing boats.]

The cargoes from Amelia, seized in England, have been restored. It is stated that permission to send cargoes from England to the United States had been refused until the ratification of the treaty by our government is known.

CONTINENTAL AFFAIRS.

A great many hints are thrown out that the congress at Vienna may not end harmoniously; but what they have done, (if any thing, conclusively) is unknown. If what is reported is to be believed, there will be great "cutting and carving" of Saxony, Poland, Italy, &c. It seems probable that something has been said about maritime rights that do not quite please the English; and a Hamburg paper of December 28, says that "discord [at Vienna] increased daily." As we know nothing of a certainty, we shall not register reports, being pressed so much for room. But a full history of the proceedings of this congress may be expected shortly, which shall have place.

The Italian troops, in the possessions of the emperor of Austria in Italy, had been ordered to Germany—discontent and desertion to great extent was caused by the procedure; and seems if the emperor shall insist on its execution that he will be compelled to send another army to enforce it.

Italy, generally, is much disturbed and unsettled. It is thought that Murat will be invited to resign the throne of Naples.

Switzerland is all commotion. The king of England has added to his titles that of "King of Hanover." The French are recruiting their army by an additional force of 100,000 men. A London paper of November 24, says—"The general opinion of the public respecting the Duke of Wellington's embassy to Paris, will, we have reason to suppose, be verified by his Grace's recall. His life is even said to be exposed to some danger in the French capital, from the evil passions which his presence there has excited; and the most ordinary civilities or proposals are received with coolness and caution, only because they come from him." We hear nothing of Bonaparte, except that he was indisposed, and a report that his wife is to be married to the king of Prussia. It is stated that the British have 75,000 men in Belgium. The "sovereign prince of the Netherlands" is to assume the title of King of Belgium. Malta will probably become a great commercial depot, in the possession or dependance of England. It is said that the congress at Vienna, will not interfere with or take up the slave trade—France, Spain, and Portugal appear determined to pursue it. We have nothing particular of the affairs of Spain; but suppose the late report of a new revolution there is not correct. We have many instances of the dislike of the French to the English—it is said that the populace drove out the British merchant vessels from the port of St. Maloes.

The coronation of Louis XVIII. is expected to take place in June next, at Rheims, where preparations are making for the ceremony.

The press on the river (says a London paper of December 26) continues very hot, and the service will, it is understood, be continued until 10,000 able bodied seamen have been obtained. [What for?]

Talleyrand, it appears, as archbishop of Rheims, has charge of the ecclesiastical affairs of France!

Soult, duke of Dalmatia, is dissatisfied, and has expressed his wish to return into private life. But another account adds that he has been charged with the management of the armies of France, and that his rigid enforcement of orders has caused no little confusion. The state of France is, certainly, unsettled. A Madrid paper of December 17, says, "it is certain that a good understanding does not subsist between the courts of Madrid and St. James." Persons who had purchased national property in Spain, have not only been deprived of it, but have been mulcted in heavy fines.

Treaty of Peace with England,

Adjutant-general's office, 3d Ward,
New York, 11th February, 1815.

AFTER ORDERS.—The commanders of the several forts within the harbor of New-York, will permit his Britannic majesty's ship Favorite, commanded by the honorable James A. Mude, under a flag of truce, with Anthony St. John Baker, esquire, bearer of a treaty of peace between Great Britain and the United States, to pass up to the city to such anchorage as may be deemed desirable to the commander of said ship.

Mr. Baker and suite will be permitted to land at such place as he may deem proper, and pass to Washington city, the seat of government. The honorable captain Mude is requested to report his arrival in the harbor, to the commanding officer of the district.

By command of colonel B. Bogardus, commanding 3d military district.

(Signed)

THOS. CHRYSTIE,
Assistant adjutant-general.

Head-quarters, 4th and 10th Military District, Baltimore, February 15.

SIR—I have the honor to inform you, that I have this moment received a letter from the secretary for the department of war, advising me of the receipt of a treaty of peace with Great Britain, and of the probability of its being ratified by the proper authority.

I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servant,
W. SCOTT.

The mayor of the city of Baltimore.

From the New-York Gazette.

A friend who has conversed with Mr. CARROLL has obligingly favored us with the following:
Messrs. Lang, Turner & Co.

At such an important epoch, every word relating to the great subject seems to have consequence; I therefore hasten to give you a summary of the news I have collected from a hasty glance at the London papers of the 28th and 31st December, and in an interview with my friend Mr. C——, the welcome messenger.

Peace was concluded on the 24th of December and ratified on the 28th by the prince regent—the terms highly honorable to America. Affairs remain as they were before the war. Not an inch of territory ceded. The negotiations flagged until the great victory of McDonough, which gave a spur to the ministers of England. I may add, that the destruction of Washington was a happy event for this country. It united the whole continent in expressing their abhorrence of such savage warfare; and a Paris paper goes so far as to say, each of their capitals had in turn been in possession of an enemy, but all therein was respected; and Paris was not burnt because England had not the sole control. [Mark this.]

The British papers give as a reason for making a peace, that as Russia and Prussia appear at the general congress to be sticklers for maritime rights, it would be advisable and prudent to detach America from joining the contest.

Ministers much abused for the manner of conducting the war—America is now respected by the world—Louis the XVIIIth sits insecurely on his throne; there was a conspiracy formed to assassinate him on entering the Thuilleries, which was discovered by Marmont, and the necessary steps taken to suppress it.

Bonaparte is restless, and desires much to go to England.

Treaty of Peace.

JAMES MADISON,

PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA,
To all and singular to whom these presents shall come,
GREETING:

WHEREAS a treaty of peace and amity between the United States of America, and his Britannic majesty was signed, at Ghent, on the twenty-fourth day of December, one thousand eight hundred and fourteen, by the plenipotentiaries respectively appointed for that purpose; and the said treaty having been, by and with the advice and consent of the senate of the United States, duly accepted, ratified, and confirmed, on the seventeenth day of February, one thousand eight hundred and fifteen; and ratified copies thereof having been exchanged agreeably to the tenor of the said treaty, which is in the words following, to wit:

Treaty of peace and amity between his Britannic majesty and the United States of America.

His Britannic majesty and the United States of America, desirous of terminating the war which has unhappily subsisted between the two countries, and of restoring, upon principles of perfect reciprocity, peace, friendship, and good understanding between them, have, for that purpose, appointed their respective plenipotentiaries, that is to say: his Britannic majesty, on his part, has appointed the right honorable James lord Gambia, late admiral of the white, now admiral of the red squadron of his majesty's fleet, Henry Goulburn, esquire, a member of the imperial parliament and under secretary of state, and William Adams, esquire, doctor of civil laws:—And the president of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the senate thereof, has appointed John Quincy Adams, James A. Bayard, Henry Clay, Jonathan Russell and Albert Gallatin, citizens of the United States, who, after a reciprocal communication of their respective full powers, have agreed upon the following articles:

ARTICLE THE FIRST.

There shall be a firm and universal peace between his Britannic majesty and the United States, and between their respective countries, territories, cities, towns, and people, of every degree, without exception of places or persons. All hostilities, both by sea and land, shall cease as soon as this treaty shall have been ratified by both parties, as hereinafter mentioned. All territory, places, and possessions whatsoever, taken from either party by the other, during the war, or which may be taken after the signing of this treaty, excepting only the islands hereinafter mentioned, shall be restored without delay, and without causing any destruction, or carrying away any of the artillery or other public property originally captured in the said forts or places, and which shall remain therein upon the exchange of the ratifications of this treaty, or any slaves or other private property. And all archives, records, deeds, and papers, either of a public nature, or belonging to private persons, which, in the course of the war, may have fallen into the hands of the officers of either party, shall be, as far as may be practicable, forthwith restored and delivered to the proper authorities and persons to whom they respectively belong. Such of the islands in the bay of Passamaquoddy as are claimed by both parties, shall remain in the possession of the party in whose occupation they may be at the time of the exchange of the ratifications of this treaty, until the decision respecting the title to the said islands shall have been made in conformity with the fourth article of this treaty. No disposition made by this treaty, as to such possession of the islands and territories claimed by both parties, shall, in any manner whatever, be construed to affect the right of either.

ARTICLE THE SECOND.

Immediately after the ratifications of this treaty by both parties, as hereinafter mentioned, orders shall be sent to the armies, squadrons, officers, subjects and citizens, of the two powers to cease from all hostilities: And to prevent all causes of complaint which might arise on account of the prizes which may be taken at sea after the said ratifications of this treaty, it is reciprocally agreed, that all vessels and effects which may be taken after the space of twelve days from the said ratifications, upon all parts of the coast of North America, from the latitude of twenty-three degrees north, to the latitude of fifty degrees north, and as far eastward in the Atlantic ocean, as the thirty-sixth degree of west longitude from the meridian of Greenwich, shall be restored to each side: That the time shall be thirty days in all other parts of the Atlantic ocean, north of the equinoctial line or equator, and the same time for the British and Irish channels, for the Gulf of Mexico and all parts of the West Indies: forty days for the North seas, for the Baltic, and for all parts of the Mediterranean: sixty days for the Atlantic ocean south of the equator as far as the latitude of the Cape of Good Hope: ninety days for every part of the world south of the equator: and one hundred and twenty days for all other parts of the world, without exception.

ARTICLE THE THIRD.

All prisoners of war taken on either side, as well by land as by sea, shall be restored as soon as practicable after the ratification of this treaty, as hereinafter mentioned, on their paying the debts which they may have contracted during their captivity. The two contracting parties respectively engage to discharge in specie, the advances which may have been made by the other for the sustenance and maintenance of such prisoners.

ARTICLE THE FOURTH.

Whereas it was stipulated by the second article in the treaty of peace, of one thousand seven hundred and eighty-three, between his Britannic majesty and the United States of America, that the boundary of the United States should comprehend all islands within twenty leagues of any part of the shores of the United States, and lying between lines to be drawn due east from the points where the aforesaid boundaries, between Nova Scotia, on the one part, and East Florida on the other, shall respectively touch the Bay of Fundy, and the Atlantic ocean, excepting such islands as now are, or heretofore have been, within the limits of Nova Scotia; and whereas the several islands in the Bay of Passamaquoddy, which is part of the Bay of Fundy, and the island of Grand Menan in the said Bay of Fundy, are claimed by the United States as being comprehended within their aforesaid boundaries, which said islands are claimed as belonging to his Britannic majesty, as having been at the time of, and previous to, the aforesaid treaty of one thousand seven hundred and eighty three within the limits of the province of Nova Scotia: In order, therefore, finally to decide upon these claims, it is agreed that they shall be referred to two commissioners, to be appointed in the following manner, viz: one commissioner shall be appointed by his Britannic majesty, and one by the president of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the senate thereof, and the said two commissioners so appointed shall be sworn impartially to examine and decide upon the said claims according to such evidence as shall be laid before them on the part of his Britannic majesty and of the United States respectively. The said commissioners shall meet at St. Andrews, in the province of New Brunswick, and shall have power to adjourn to such other place or places as they shall think fit. The said commissioners shall, by a declaration or report under their hands and seals, decide to which of the two contracting parties the several islands aforesaid do respectively belong, in conformity with the true intent of the said treaty of peace of one thousand seven hundred and eighty-three. And if the said commissioners shall agree in their decision, both parties shall consider such decision as final and conclusive. It is further agreed, that in the event of the two commissioners differing upon all or any of the matters so referred to them, or in the event of both or either of the said commissioners refusing, or declining, or wilfully omitting, to act as such, they shall make, jointly or separately, a report or reports, as well to the government of his Britannic majesty as to that of the United States, stating in detail the points on which they differ, and the grounds upon which their respective opinions have been formed, or the grounds upon which they, or either of them, have so refused, declined, or omitted to act. And his Britannic majesty, and the government of the United States hereby agree to refer the report or reports of the said commissioners, to some friendly sovereign or state, to be then named for that purpose, and who shall be requested to decide on the differences which may be stated in the said report or reports, or upon the report of one commissioner, together with the grounds upon which the other commissioner shall have refused, declined, or omitted to act, as the case may be. And if the commissioner so refusing, declining, or omitting to act, shall also wilfully omit to state the grounds upon which he has so done, in such manner that the said statement may be referred to such friendly sovereign or state, together with the report of such other commissioner, then such sovereign or state shall decide ex parte upon the said report alone. And his Britannic majesty and the government of the United States engage to consider the decision of some friendly sovereign or state to be such and conclusive on all the matters so referred.

ARTICLE THE FIFTH.

Whereas neither that point of the high lands lying due north from the source of the river St. Croix, and designated in the former treaty of peace between the two powers as the northwest angle of Nova Scotia, now the north-westernmost head of Connecticut river, has yet been ascertained; and whereas that part of the boundary line between the dominion of the two powers which extends from the source of the river St. Croix directly north to the abovementioned north-west angle of Nova Scotia, thence along the said highlands which divide those rivers that empty themselves into the river St. Lawrence from those which fall into the Atlantic ocean to the north-westernmost head of Connecticut river, thence down along the middle of the river to the forty-fifth degree of north latitude; thence by a line due west on said latitude until it strikes the river Iroquois or Cataraguy, has not yet been surveyed:—It is agreed, that for these several purposes two commissioners shall be appointed, sworn, and authorized, to act exactly in the manner directed with respect to those mentioned in the next preceding article, unless otherwise specified in the present article. The said commissioners shall meet at St. Andrews, in the province of New Brunswick, and shall have power to adjourn to such other place or places as they shall think fit. The said commissioners shall have power to ascertain and determine the points abovementioned, in conformity with the provisions of the said treaty of peace of one thousand seven hundred and eighty three, and shall cause the boundary aforesaid, from the source of the river St. Croix to the river Iroquois or Cataraguy, to be surveyed and marked according to the said provisions. The said commissioners shall make a map of the said boundary, and annex to it a declaration under their hands and seals, certifying it to be the true map of the said boundary, and particularizing the latitude and longitude of the north-west angle of Nova Scotia, of the north-westernmost head of Connecticut river, and of such other points of the same boundary as they may deem proper. And both parties agree to consider such map and declaration as finally and conclusively fixing the said boundary. And in the event of the said two commissioners differing, or both, or, either of them, refusing or declining, or wilfully omitting to act, such reports, declarations, or statements, shall be made by them, or either of them, and such reference to a friendly sovereign or state, shall be made, in all respects as in the latter part of the fourth article is contained, and in as full a manner as if the same was herein repeated.

ARTICLE THE SIXTH.

Whereas, by the former treaty of peace that portion of the boundary of the United States from the point where the forty-fifth degree of north latitude strikes the river Iroquois or Cataraguy to the lake Superior, was declared to be "along the middle of said river into lake Ontario, through the middle of said lake until it strikes the communication by water between that lake and lake Erie, thence along the middle of said communication into lake Erie, through the middle of said lake until it arrives at the water communication into the lake Huron, thence through the middle of said lake to the water communication between that lake and lake Superior." And whereas doubts have arisen what was the middle of said river, lakes and water communications, and whether certain islands lying in the same were within the dominions of his Britannic majesty or of the United States: In order, therefore, finally to decide these doubts, they shall be referred to two commissioners, to be appointed, sworn, and authorized to act exactly in the manner directed with respect to those mentioned in the next preceding article, unless otherwise specified in this present article. The said commissioners shall meet, in the first instance, at Albany, in the state of New-York, and shall have power to adjourn to such other place or places as they shall think fit:—The said commissioners shall, by a report or declaration, under their hands and seals, designate the boundary through the said river, lakes, and water communications, and decide to which of the two contracting parties the several islands lying within the said river, lakes, and water communications, do respectively belong, in conformity with the true intent of the said treaty of one thousand seven hundred and eighty-three. And both parties agree to consider such designation and decision as final and conclusive. And in the event of the said two commissioners differing, or both, or either of them, refusing, declining, or wilfully omitting to act, such reports, declarations or statements, shall be made by them, or either of them, and such reference to a friendly sovereign or state shall be made in all respects as in the latter part of the fourth article is contained, and in as full a manner as if the same was herein repeated.

ARTICLE THE SEVENTH.

It is further agreed that the said two last mentioned commissioners, after they shall have executed the duties assigned to them in the preceding article, shall be, and they are hereby authorized, upon their oaths impartially to fix and determine, according to the true intent of the said treaty of peace, of one thousand seven hundred and eighty-three, that part of the boundary between the dominions of the two powers, which extends from the water communication between lake Huron, and lake Superior, to the most north-western point of the lake of the Woods, to decide to which of the two parties the several islands lying in the lakes, water communications, and rivers, forming the said boundary, do respectively belong, in conformity with the true intent of the said treaty of peace, of one thousand seven hundred and eighty-three; and to cause such parts of the said boundary, as require it, to be surveyed and marked. The said commissioners shall, by a report or declaration under their hands and seals, designate the boundary aforesaid, state their decision on the points thus referred to them, and particularize the latitude and longitude of the most north-western point of the lake of the Woods, and of such other parts of the said boundary as they may deem proper. And both parties agree to consider such designation and decision as final and conclusive. And, in the event of the said two commissioners differing, or both, or either of them refusing, declining, or wilfully omitting to act, such reports, declarations, or statements, shall be made by them, or either of them, and such reference to a friendly sovereign or state, shall be made in all respects, as in the latter part of the fourth article is contained, and in as full a manner as if the same was herein repeated.

ARTICLE THE EIGHTH.

The several boards of two commissioners mentioned in the four preceding articles, shall respectively have power to appoint a secretary, and to employ such surveyors or other persons as they shall judge necessary. Duplicates of all their respective reports, declarations, statements and decisions, and of their accounts, and of the journal of their proceedings, shall be delivered by them to the agents of his Britannic majesty, and to the agents of the United States, who may be respectively appointed and authorized to manage the business on behalf of their respective governments. The said commissioners shall be respectively paid in such manner as shall be agreed between the two contracting parties, such agreement being to be settled at the time of the exchange of the ratifications of this treaty.—And all other expences attending the said commissioners shall be defrayed equally by the two parties. And in the case of death, sickness, resignation, or necessary absence, the place of every such commissioner respectively shall be supplied in the same manner as such commissioner was first appointed, and the new commissioner shall take the same oath or affirmation, and do the same duties. It is further agreed between the two contracting parties, that in case any of the islands mentioned in any of the preceding articles, which were in the possession of one of the parties prior to the commencement of the present war between the two countries, should, by the decision of any of the boards of commissioners aforesaid, or of the sovereign or state so referred to, as in the four next preceding articles contained, fall within the dominions of the other party, all grants of land made previous to the commencement of the war by the party having had such possession, shall be as valid as if such island or islands, had by such decision or decisions, been adjudged to be within the dominions of the party having had such possession.

ARTICLE THE NINTH.

The United States of America engage to put an end immediately after the ratification of the present treaty to hostilities with all the tribes or nations of indians, with whom they may be at war at the time of such ratification; and forthwith to restore to such tribes or nations, respectively, all the possessions, rights and privileges, which they may have enjoyed or been entitled to in one thousand eight hundred and eleven, previous to such hostilities: Provided always, that such tribes or nations shall agree to desist from all hostilities, against the United States of America, their citizens and subjects, upon the ratification of the present treaty being notified to such tribes or nations, and shall so desist accordingly. And his Britannic majesty engages, on his part, to put an end immediately after the ratification of the present treaty, to hostilities with all the tribes or nations of indians with whom he may be at war at the time of such ratification, and forthwith to restore to such tribes or nations, respectively, all the possessions, rights, and privileges, which they may have enjoyed or been entitled to, in one thousand eight hundred and eleven, previous to such hostilities: Provided always, that such tribes or nations shall agree to desist from all hostilities against his Britannic majesty, and his subjects, upon the ratification of the present treaty being notified to such tribes or nations, and shall so desist accordingly.

ARTICLE THE TENTH.

Whereas the traffic in slaves is irreconcilable with the principles of humanity and justice, and whereas both his majesty and the United States are desirous of continuing their efforts to promote its entire abolition, it is hereby agreed that both the contracting parties shall use their best endeavors to accomplish so desirable an object.

ARTICLE THE ELEVENTH.

This treaty, when the same shall have been ratified on both sides, without alteration by either of the contracting parties, and the ratifications mutually exchanged, shall be binding on both parties, and the ratifications shall be exchanged at Washington, in the space of four months from this day, or sooner if practicable.

In faith whereof, we the respective plenipotentiaries have signed this treaty, and have thereunto affixed our seals.

Done, in triplicate, at Ghent, the twenty fourth day of December, one thousand eight hundred and fourteen.

(L. S.) GAMBIER,
(L. S.) WILLIAM ADAMS;
(L. S.) JOHN QUINCY ADAMS,
(L. S.) J. A. BAYARD,
(L. S.) H. CLAY,
(L. S.) JONA. RUSSELL,
(L. S.) ALBERT GALLATIN.

Now, therefore, to the end that the said treaty of peace and amity may be observed with good faith, on the part of the United States, I, James Madison, president as aforesaid, have caused the premises to be made public; and I do hereby enjoin all persons bearing office, civil or military, within the United States, and all others, citizens or inhabitants thereof, or being within the same, faithfully to observe and fulfil the said treaty and every clause and article thereof.

In testimony whereof, I have caused the seal of the United States to be affixed to these presents, and signed the same with my hand.

Done at the city of Washington, this eighteenth day of February, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and fifteen, and of the sovereignty and independence of the United States the thirty-ninth.

JAMES MADISON.

By the president,

JAMES MONROE, Acting secretary of state.

THE REGENT'S SPEECH is miserably maigre. Hard was his royal highness put to it when he had to impress the destruction of our "flotilla in the Patuxent" into it, for something to boast of. The world should know that that flotilla, whose destruction was a matter of so great moment as to be announced from the throne—was not destroyed by the English, and carried, in the whole, only 14 or 16 guns. He also boasts about Washington. Posterity will hate him for it. He likewise talks about the country "east of the Penobscot." That's an affair between him and his friends.

ADVERTISEMENT EXTRAORDINARY.—From the London Public Advertiser.—

WANTED—The spirit which animated the conduct of Elizabeth, Oliver and William.

—Better negotiators and more gun-powder.

LOST—All idea of national dignity and honor.

FOUND—That any insignificant state may insult that which used to call herself the mistress of the waves.

The news of peace with America has received a general rejoicing at Yarmouth. The bells have been rung for two days, and colors hoisted in various parts of the town; and there has been several convivial parties at the taverns to celebrate the event.

American privateers in the East Indies.

London, Nov. 26. The East India company ship Adels, has been captured by an American privateer off Pontana—other privateers were cruising off the coast of Sumatra.

Portsmouth, (Eng.) Nov. 21. On Wednesday the Regent, Seatham, Lousdale, Kent and Caroline, valuably laden with spices from the Molucca Islands, and the Bonetta, from the South seas, went past for the Downs.—The Steatham left Amboyna about the 19th of May, arrived at Batavia on the 28th, and was detained there till the 26th of July, in consequence of an embargo which the government had impressed, on account of some American privateers being in that quarter, and which had made one or two captures. One of the privateers, of 20 guns, and 200 men, had been lately captured by the Owen Glendower frigate, capt. Brian Hodgson. A prize to the Hyder-Alley, American privateer, had ran into Saldene Bay, (Cape of Good Hope) in distress, and was there taken possession of by the troops in garrison—she was captured on the coast of Sumatra.

The Harpy privateer, arrived at Salem, after a great cruise, heard that the Wasp was off the Canaries carrying on a mighty business.

It is stated that the British have lately captured an American privateer (supposed to be the Lyon) in the Tagus, which she entered in distress, dismantled. The destruction of the Gen. Armstrong at Fayal had excited great sensibility at Lisbon. An account of it was speedily sent to Brazil by a frigate.

ILLUMINATION.—In consequence of the following proclamation, the city of Baltimore was, indeed, splendidly illuminated on Wednesday evening last: having some note of the chief things worthy of notice, an account of it may be published hereafter. The scene was delightful and enjoyed by the mildness of the evening, to its fullest extent. It went off with, perhaps, unprecedented order and harmony.

PROCLAMATION,

By the mayor of the city of Baltimore.

It is hereby respectfully recommended to the citizens of the city and precincts of Baltimore, to testify their high sense of the illustrious and unparalleled achievements of the arms of our country, under the command of major-general Andrew Jackson, at New Orleans, by an illumination. And that the same may be made in an orderly and peaceable manner, it is further respectfully recommended, that it commence precisely at the hour of 7 p. m. this evening, and be extinguished precisely at 9 o'clock thereafter.

It is confidently expected, that in this manifestation of public joy, no inconsiderate dissatisfaction will occur, of those worthy citizens whose religious opinion do not permit them to join therein; and those whose indisposition or absence prevents them from a like avowal of their gladness.

All officers are enjoined vigilantly to discourage and prohibit any interruption of the public harmony.

EDWARD JOHNSON, mayor.

Mayor's office, Baltimore, Feb. 15, 1815.

A Burlington, Vt. paper says, that captain (commonly called commodore) Macdonough, is to take command of the steam frigate at New York. His late promotion entitles him to command a vessel of this class.

It is stated to be acknowledged by the officers of the Majestic, that the President silenced the Endymion before the other ships came up. The latter appears to have been terribly mauled; and, it is said, really struck her colors.

The famous privateer True Blooded Yankee, or, as the British papers call her, the Bloody-minded Yankee, has at length been captured and sent into Gibraltar.

CHARLESTON.—A letter from Charleston dated Feb. 1, says "We have 90 pieces of ordnance mounted on the lines in the rear of the city—32's, 24's, 18's and 12's."

The delay that has occurred in the usual receipt of the REGISTER will be compensated by its contents. See the treaty of peace between the United States and Great Britain.

It is understood that the treaty of peace was unanimously (or nearly so) approved by the senate. A great deal of matter, in type, lies over.

NILES' WEEKLY REGISTER.

No. 26 of VOL. VII.]

BALTIMORE SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 25, 1815

[WHOLE NO. 162.]

Hæc olim meminisse juvabit.—VIRGIL.

Printed and published by H. NILES, South-st. next door to the Merchants' Coffee House; at $5 per ann.

Files of the Register.

While laboring under the difficulties incident to the war, the editor was ever consoled with the prospect that at the restoration of peace, he would be able soon to dispose of the copies of the WEEKLY REGISTER that might then be on hand. The great demand for complete files within these few days past, convinces him that hope will be realized much sooner than he expected.

But it is found that some are disposed to receive only those volumes which contain the documents, facts and incidents belonging to the period of the war (which are, certainly, the most precious and cost me more labor, than any I ever may publish)—and those being obtained, they will care nothing further for me or the REGISTER.

I do not value such patrons. I am morally certain that every complete copy I have will sell on fair terms, and thank no man to assure me that the demand will be greater than I can supply.

Every one has a right to fix the value on a commodity he has for sale—but he should not be unreasonable because he feels that he has the monopoly of it. I know that the WEEKLY REGISTER cannot be supplanted, or supplied, as to things that have past in the moral, civil and political world since its establishment—but the conditions on which it may be had shall not subject me to the charge of covetousness.

Let this fact be remarked—in consequence of being compelled to reprint the first and second volumes—they have cost (or will cost) me, at least one dollar more, for each, than those of the same volumes delivered to my old friends and subscribers. For this I should have some indemnification.

All I ask is this—that those who wish files shall pay 27 dollars for each—that is to say:

For the 3 years completed in September last $15

Supplement to Vol. V. (extra.) 1

Current year to September next, now payable, according to the conditions, by the original subscribers. 5

For the supplement to vol. VII. (extra.) 1

For the year in advance from Sept. 1815 to 1816. 5

Which is only to exact 5 dollars in advance for one year, to indemnify me for the extraordinary expense I have been at as aforesaid, and for laying so long out of the money which the stock of books cost me. No man will say that this is unreasonable.

These terms will be our guide until September next—after which, if any files remain to be disposed of, the advance will be increased.

The close of the volume.

The present number completes the 7th volume, or half year, of the WEEKLY REGISTER. An index for it, on an enlarged and improved plan, will be delivered this day fortnight, and the SUPPLEMENT be sent to those who ordered it, in a few days thereafter.

It is a great pleasure and, he hopes, an honest pride, that the editor seizes this happy occasion to tender his thanks for the distinguished liberality

VOL. VII.

It is an unlooked-for and exceedingly mortifying necessity, that compels us to issue this number on paper of an inferior quality after waiting several days for a supply.—Thursday evening, March 2 in which this favored work has been cherished and supported. It is now to be found in many of the public libraries, and is working its way into the private collections of our most illustrious citizens, with increasing rapidity—

Mobilitate viget, et vires acquirit eundo.

As has been heretofore observed, the prevailing idea (founded, indeed, on frequent experience) that works of this kind could not be supported or continued in the United States, has materially affected my interest. The repeated failure of periodical publications amongst us, some of them with much higher pretensions to patronage than my opinion of myself led me to aspire to, plead powerfully against the hope of our friends, that we could “weather the storm” with which negligence and procrastination is always ready to buffet the new beginner. This prevented many subscriptions, chiefly among that class of the people that would have been the most useful to us, because a calculation might have been made upon them as permanent and regular patrons. We trust, however, that our orifice, like that of our beloved republic, is passed in triumph. If we have been assailed by open enemies without, and “blue lights” within the pale of our subscription list, we have also had our Brown’s, Jackson’s and Scott’s—Garnes’, Coffey’s and Carroll’s; our Rodgers’, Decatur’s and Hull’s—and Perry’s, Muddonough’s and Blakeley’s to support and encourage us; and say, in the language of Lawrence, but with more fortunate effect, “Don’t give up the ship.” Thus sustained, we have persevered, and the REGISTER has now acquired a standing and value, that, in any reasonably-to-be-expected event, will insure its continuance on its present plan—which, I have the satisfaction to believe, has not essentially changed from the original prospectus, except that the political matter, by the “events of the war,” transcended the bounds we would have allotted it.

It shall be the constant care of the editor to guard a reputation that has been established by incessant labor and unwearied industry. Every effort shall still be made to ascertain the truth, and it shall be inserted with fairness and impartiality, affect whom it may. We shall be especially cautious against inattention, a sin by which we have suffered so much for others.

The return of peace will have a considerable effect on the general contents of this work; which, as a record of passing events, had assumed more of the nature of an ordinary news-paper than I wished—leading many to expect earlier intelligence than a weekly publication is capable of conveying, and to others giving large portions of what they considered stale articles; which, however, I hope, in general, they will read with pleasure and profit a little while hence. But a mighty mass of matter, honorable to our country or to individuals, or useful in a thousand different ways, relating to the war, yet remains to be noticed. We shall proceed with it regularly, as opportunity offers, until our valuable stock is exhausted. Of things past, we shall speak as they deserved; of things to come, as we think they merit; and, upon the whole, perhaps, be able to publish a more interesting work in peace than in war; as, relieved from the severe drudgery of collecting solitary fact from million-murder, much time may be spent in those statistical enquiries that have met the universal approbation. Among the things of this kind we have planned, is a very extensive chronological table or general index of the events of the war, with reference to the REGISTER for the matters stated at length; which, it is believed, will be very useful. It is also in contemplation to have written for this work, by a gentleman of fine talents, A HISTORY OF THE WAR.

The want of a common index begins to be felt. I the editor should live so long (and if he does not, he hereby enjoins it on his successor) he proposes, after the 10th volume is finished, to have made and to publish, a very minute and general index, in which every item in the preceding volumes shall be inserted under all the probable heads that it can be looked for, to collect together all the facts belonging to one thing. It will make several sheets, and shall be printed on a good large type and fine strong paper, to be bound by itself, for more easy reference.

While the editor thus pours out his gratitude and promises his friends to endeavor to deserve a continuance of their support, he has, for the last time, to many at least through this medium, to speak on a subject as mortifying as painful. Payment for the current year is now due from all who have not anticipated the time (and they, I thankfully acknowledge, are not a few) and no doubt it will be immediately made, with its accustomed promptitude. But there are four or five hundred persons who will receive no more papers from me until they pay up their arrearages of two, three or four years! I have had the patronage of their names long enough; and, as entreaty has failed to convict them of the dishonesty of their conduct, means shall be taken to coerce them to a sense of justice. If in this purgation of my Augean stable, any mistake should arise, the editor bespeaks the liberality of the person injured, and promises the amende honorable when informed of his error. And, as frequent failures or delays of the mails take place, he would respectfully caution those who are conscious that they have dealt fairly with the REGISTER, not to impute a mistake to him, until time shall be allowed to give assurance of the fact. The fault of non-payment I believe has, in some cases, been owing more to the negligence of agents whose ordinary business did not admit a due attention to mine; and a list of those who have declined the management of my affairs, or shall be "dismissed the service," may be inserted for the information of our subscribers.

President's Message.

To the senate and

House of representatives of the United States.

I lay before congress copies of the treaty of peace and amity between the United States and his Britannic majesty, which was signed by the commissioners of both parties at Ghent, on the 24th of December, 1814, and the ratifications of which have been duly exchanged.

While performing this act, I congratulate you, and our constituents, upon an event which is highly honorable to the nation, and terminates with peculiar felicity a campaign signalised by the most brilliant successes.

The late war, although reluctantly declared by congress, had become a necessary resort, to assert the rights and independence of the nation. It has been waged with success which is the natural result of the legislative counsels, of the patriotism of the people, of the public spirit of the militia, and of the valor of the military and naval forces of the country. Peace, at all times a blessing, is peculiarly welcome, therefore, at a period when the causes for the war have ceased to operate; when the government has demonstrated the efficiency of its powers of defence; and when the nation can review its conduct without regret, and without reproach.

I recommend to your care and beneficence, the gallant men whose achievements, in every department of military service, on the land and on the water, have so essentially contributed to the honor of the American name, and to the restoration of peace. The feelings of conscious patriotism and worth will animate such men, under every change of fortune and pursuit; but their country performs a duty to itself, when it bestows those testimonials of approbation and applause, which are, at once, the reward, and the incentive, to great actions.

The reduction of the public expenditures to the demands of a peace establishment, will doubtless, engage the immediate attention of congress. There are, however, important considerations which forbid a sudden and general revocation of the measures that have been produced by the war. Experience has taught us, that neither the pacific dispositions of the American people, nor the pacific character of their political institutions, can altogether exempt them from that strife which appears, beyond the ordinary lot of nations, to be incident to the actual period of the world; and the same faithful monitor demonstrates that a certain degree of preparation for war, is not only indispensable to avert disaster in the onset, but affords also the best security for the continuance of peace. The wisdom of congress will, therefore, I am confident, provide for the maintenance of an adequate regular force; for the gradual advance of the naval establishment; for improving all the means of harbor defence; for adding discipline to the distinguished bravery of the militia, and for cultivating the military art, in its essential branches, under the liberal patronage of government.

The resources of our country were, at all times, competent to the attainment of every national object; but they will now be enriched and invigorated by the activity which peace will introduce into all the scenes of domestic enterprize and labor. The provision that has been made for the public creditors, during the present session of congress, must have a decisive effect in the establishment of the public credit, both at home and abroad. The reviving interests of commerce will claim the legislative attention at the earliest opportunity; and such regulations will, I trust, be seasonably devised as shall secure to the United States their just proportion of the navigation of the world. The most liberal policy towards other nations, if met by corresponding dispositions, will, in this respect, be found the most beneficial policy towards ourselves. But there is no subject that can enter with greater force and merit into the deliberation of congress, than a consideration of the means to preserve and promote the manufactures which have sprung into existence, and attained an unparalleled maturity throughout the United States during the period of the European wars. This source of national independence and wealth, I anxiously recommend to the prompt and constant guardianship of congress.

The termination of the legislative session will soon separate you, fellow-citizens, from each other, and restore you to your constituents. I pray you to bear with you the expressions of my sanguine hope, that the peace which has been just declared will not only be the foundation of the most friendly intercourse between the United States and Great Britain, but that it will also be productive of happiness and harmony in every section of our beloved country. The influence of your precepts and example must be every where powerful: and while we accord in grateful acknowledgments for the protection which Providence has bestowed upon us, let us never cease to inculcate obedience to the laws and fidelity to the union, as constituting the palladium of the national independence and prosperity.

JAMES MADISON.

Washington, February 18, 1815.

Further from New-Orleans.

[From the Louisiana Gazette extra.]

Address, directed by major general Jackson to be read at the head of each of the corps composing the line below New-Orleans, Jan. 21, 1815.

Citizens and fellow-soldiers! The enemy has retreated, and your general has now leisure to proclaim to the world what he has noticed with admiration and pride—your undaunted courage, your patriotism, and patience, under hardships and fatigues. Natives of different states acting together, for the first time in this camp; differing in habits and in language, instead of viewing in these circumstances the germ of distrust and division, you have made them the source of an honorable emulation, and from the seeds of discord itself have reaped the fruits of an honorable union. This day completes the fourth week since fifteen hundred of you attacked treble your number of men, who had boasted of their discipline, and their services under a celebrated leader, in a long and eventful war—attacked them in their camp, the moment they had profaned the soil of freedom with their hostile tread, and inflicted a blow which was a prelude to the final result of their attempt to conquer, or their poor contrivances to divide us. A few hours was sufficient to unite the gallant band, though at the moment they received the welcome order to march they were separated many leagues, in different directions from the city. The gay rapidity of the march, and the cheerful countenances of the officers and men, would have induced a belief that some festive entertainment, not the strife of battle, was the object to which they hastened with so much eagerness and hilarity. In the conflict that ensued, the same spirit was supported and my communication to the executive of the United States have testified the sense I entertained of the merits of the corps and officers that were engaged. Resting on the field of battle, they retired in perfect order on the next morning to these lines, destined to become the scene of future victories, which they were to share with the rest of you, my brave companions in arms. Scarcely were your lines a protection against musket shot, when on the 28th a disposition was made to attack them with all the pomp and parade of military tactics, as improved by those veterans of the Spanish war.

Their batteries of heavy cannon kept up an incessant fire; their rockets illuminated the air; and under their cover two strong columns threatened our flanks. The foe insolently thought that this spectacle was too imposing to be resisted, and in the intoxication of his pride he already saw our lines abandoned without a contest—how were those menacing appearances met?

By shouts of defiance, by a manly countenance, not to be shaken by the roar of his cannon, by the glare of his firework rockets; by an artillery served with superior skill, and with deadly effect. Never, my brave friends, can your general forget the testimonials of attachment to our glorious cause, of indignant hatred to our foe, of affectionate confidence in your chief, that resounded from every rank, as he passed along your line. This animating scene damped the courage of the enemy; he dropped his scaling ladders and fascines, and the threatened attack dwindled into a demonstration, which served only to shew the emptiness of his parade, and to inspire you with a just confidence in yourselves.

The new year was ushered in with the most tremendous fire his whole artillery could produce: a few hours only, however, were necessary for the brave and skilful men who directed our own to dismount his cannon, destroy his batteries, and effectually silence his fire. Hitherto, my brave friends, in the contest on our lines, your courage had been passive only; you stood with calmness, a fire that would have tried the firmness of a veteran, and you anticipated a nearer contest with an eagerness which was soon to be gratified.

On the 8th of January the final effort was made. At the dawn of day the batteries opened and the columns advanced. Knowing that the volunteers from Tennessee and the militia from Kentucky were stationed on your left, it was there they directed their chief attack.

Reasoning always from false principles, they expected little opposition from men whose officers ever were not in uniform, who were ignorant of the rules of dress, and who had never been cased into discipline—fatal mistake! a fire incessantly kept up directed with calmness and with unerring aim, strewn the field with the bravest officers and men of the column which slowly advanced, according to the most approved rules of European tactics, and was cut down by the untutored courage of American militia. Unable to sustain this galling and unceasing fire, some hundreds nearest the entrenchment called for quarter, which was granted—the rest retreating, were rallied at some distance, but only to make them a surer mark for the grape and canister shot of our artillery, which, without exaggeration, mowed down whole ranks at every discharge; and at length they precipitately retired from the field.

Our right had only a short contest to sustain with a few rash men who fatally for themselves, forced their entrance into the unfinished redoubt on the river. They were quickly dispossessed, and this glorious day terminated with the loss to the enemy of their commander in chief and one major-general killed, another major general wounded, the most experienced and bravest of their officers, and more than three thousand men killed, wounded and missing, while our ranks, my friends, were thinned only by the loss of six of our brave companions killed and seven disabled by wounds—wonderful interposition of Heaven! unexampled event in the history of war!

Let us be grateful to the God of battles who had directed the arrows of indignation against our invaders, while he covered with his protecting shield the brave defenders of their country.

After this unsuccessful and disastrous attempt, their spirits were broken, their force was destroyed, and their whole attention was employed in providing the means of escape. This they have effected: leaving their heavy artillery in our power, and many of their wounded to our clemency. The consequences of this short, but decisive campaign, are incalculably important. The pride of our arrogant enemy humbled, his forces broken, his leaders killed, his insolent hopes of our disunion frustrated—his expectation of rioting in our spoils and wasting our country changed into ignominious defeat, shameful flight, and a reluctant acknowledgment of the humanity and kindness of those whom he had deto all the horrors and humiliation of a conquered state.

On the other side, unanimity established, disaffection crushed, confidence restored, your country saved from conquest, your property from pillage, your wives and daughters from insult and violation—the union preserved from dismemberment, and perhaps a period put by this decisive stroke to a bloody and savage war. These, my brave friends, are the consequences of the efforts you have made, and the success with which they have been crowned by Heaven.

These important results have been effected by the united courage and perseverance of the army; but which the different corps as well as the individuals that compose it, have vied with each other in their exertions to produce. The share they have respectively had will be pointed out in the general order accompanying this address. But the gratitude, the admiration of their country, offers a fairer reward than that which any praises of the general can bestow, and the best is that of which they can never be deprived, the consciousness of having done their duty, and of meriting the applause they will receive.

GENERAL ORDERS.

Head Quarters, 7th Military District,

Camp below New Orleans,

Adjutant General's office, January 21.

Before the camp at these memorable times shall be broken up, the general thinks it a duty to the brave army which has defended them, publicly to notice the conduct of the different corps which compose it. The behavior of the regular troops, consisting of parts of the 7th and 44th regiments of infantry, and the corps of marines, all commanded by colonel Ross, has been such as to merit his warm approbation.—The 7th regiment was led by major Peyre and the 44th by captain Baker in the action of the 23d in a manner that does those officers the highest honor. They have continued through the campaign to do their duty with the same zeal and ability with which it was commenced. On that occasion the country lost a valuable officer in the death of lieutenant McClellan of the 7th infantry, who fell while bravely leading his company. Lieutenant Dupuy of the 44th, although severely wounded in this action returned in time to take a share in all the subsequent attacks.

To the Tennessee mounted gunmen, to their gallant leader brigadier-general Coffee, the general presents his warmest thanks, not only for their uniform good conduct in action, but for the wonderful patience with which they have borne the fatigue, and the perseverance with which they surmounted the difficulties of a most painful march, in order to meet the enemy—a diligence and zeal to which we probably owe the salvation of the country. Ordinary activity would have brought them too late to act the brilliant part they have performed in the defeat of our invaders. All the officers of that corps have distinguished themselves; but the general cannot avoid mentioning the name of lieutenant-colonel Linderdale who fell on the night of the 23d—and those of colonels Dyer, Gibson and Elliott, who were wounded, but disdaining personal considerations remained firm to their duty.

The cavalry from the Mississippi territory, under their enterprising leader major Hinds, was always ready to perform every service which the nature of the country enabled them to execute. The daring manner in which they reconnoitered the enemy on his lines, excited the admiration of one army and the astonishment of the other.

Major general Carroll, commanding the detachment of West Tennessee militia, has shewn the great est zeal for the service, a strict attention to duty and in ability and courage that will always recommend him to the gratitude of his country. His troops have, since the lines were formed, accepted and defended the weakest part of them, and borne, without a murmur, an encampment on a marshy and unhealthy soil. In the memorable action of the 8th January, the chief effort of the enemy was directed against them; but their valor, and that of the brave men who supported them, (general Coffee's brigade on the left, and a part of the Kentucky troops on the right) soon made it clear that a rampart of high-minded men is a better defence than the most regular fortification.

General Adair, who, owing to the indisposition of general Thomas, brought up the Kentucky militia, has shewn that troops will always be valiant when their leaders are so. No men ever displayed a more gallant spirit than these did under that most valuable officer. His country is under obligations to him.

The general would be ungrateful or insensible to merit, if he did not particularly notice the conduct of the officers and men who so bravely supported and so skilfully directed his artillery. Colonel McRea, in the action of the 23d, shewed, as he always does, great courage. Lieutenant Spotts, under whose immediate direction our artillery had been placed, led it to action with a daring courage worthy of admiration. Captain Humphrey commanded the first battery on our right—the service is greatly indebted to that officer, not only for the able and gallant manner in which he directed his fire, but for the general activity he displayed in his department.

Lieutenant Norris of the navy, with Mr. Walker Martin and a detachment of seamen, was stationed at the 2d battery; and lieutenant Grawley, with Mr. W. Livingston (master's mate) with a similar detachment, were stationed at a 32 pounder, which was remarkably well directed—they performed their duty with the zeal and bravery which has always characterized the navy of the United States. Captains Dominique and Belluche, lately commanding privateers at Barrataria, with part of their former crew and many brave citizens of New Orleans, were stationed at Nos. 3 and 4. The general cannot avoid giving his warm approbation of the manner in which these gentlemen have uniformly conducted themselves while under his command, and of the gallantry with which they have redeemed the pledge they gave at the opening of the campaign to defend the country. The brothers Lafitte have exhibited the same courage and fidelity; and the general promises that the government shall be duly apprized of their conduct. Colonel Perry, deputy quarter-master-general, volunteered his services at No. 6—he was aided by lieutenant Kerr of the artillery—his battery was well served, bravely supported, and greatly annoyed the enemy. Nos. 8 and 9 were directed by lieutenant Spotts with his usual skill and bravery, assisted by Mr. Chevaillon.

The general takes the highest pleasure in noticing the conduct of general Garigue de Flauger, commanding one of the brigades of militia of this state, and member of the senate. His brigade not being in the field as soon as the invasion was known, he repaired to the camp and offered himself to volunteer for the service of a piece of artillery, which he directed with the skill which was to be expected from an experienced artillery officer, disdaining the exemption afforded by his seat in the senate, he continued in his subordinate but honorable station; and by his example as well as his exertions rendered essential services to his country. Mr. H. has been Hiram of the same body, set the same example, served a considerable time in the ranks of the volun-geer battalion, and afterwards as adjutant of the colored troops. Major Plauche's battalion of volunteers, though deprived of the valuable services of major Carmac, who commanded them, by a wound which that officer received in the attack of the 28th of December, have realized all the anticipations which the general had formed of their conduct. Major Plauche, and major St. Geme of that corps, have distinguished themselves by their activity, their courage, and their zeal; and the whole corps have greatly contributed to enable the general to redeem the pledge he gave, when at the opening of the campaign he promised the country, not only safety, but a splendid triumph over its insolent invaders. The two corps of colored volunteers have not disappointed the hopes that were formed of their courage and perseverance in the performance of their duty. Major Laboste and Daquin, who commanded them, have deserved well of their country. Captain Savary's conduct has been noticed in the account rendered of the battle of the 23d, and that officer has since continued to merit the highest praise. Captain Beale's company of the city riflemen has sustained by its subsequent conduct the reputation it acquired in the action of the 23d. Colonel de la Roubie, of the Louisiana militia, has been extremely serviceable by his exertions, and has shewn great courage, and an uniform attachment to the cause of the country.

General Humbert, who offered his services as a volunteer, has continually exposed himself to the greatest dangers, with his characteristic bravery, as has also the Mexican field marshal, Don Juan de Anayer, who acted in the same capacity. The general acknowledges the important assistance he has received from commodore Patterson, as well by his professional exertion, as the zealous co-operation of his department during the whole course of the campaign. Captain Henly, on board of the Caroline, and afterwards in directing the erection of several batteries at the Bayou and on the right bank of the river, was of great utility to the army. Lieutenant Alexis, of the navy, stationed in the navy arsenal, was indefatigable in exertions to forward to the army every thing which could facilitate its operations—his zeal and activity deserve the notice of the government. Major Nicks, who, by an accidental wound was deprived of the pleasure of commanding the 7th regiment during the campaign, was continually employed in the fort, and furnished the ammunition and the artillery that was wanted, with the greatest activity and promptitude. To the volunteers of the Mississippi territory, and to the militia of the remoter parts of this state, who have arrived since the decisive action of the 8th, the general tenders his thanks, and is convinced that nothing but opportunity was wanting to entitle them to the praises that have been merited by the rest of the army. Captain Ogden's troop of horse was peculiarly useful by their local knowledge of the ground on which they acted; and the small detachment of the Attacapas dragoons, stationed near head-quarters, were indefatigable in performing all the duties which devolved on them.

The general would not do justice to his staff if he did not bestow deserved praise on the adjutant-general, colonel Butler, and his assistant, major Chotard, for their zeal and activity in the important department of service confided to them, and for the bravery which led them wherever danger or duty required their presence. The vigilance, courage, and attention to duty, exhibited during the campaign by colonel Haynes, and his two assistants, majors Davis and Hampton, have been appreciated, as they deserved to be, by the general.

The general's aids-de-camp, Thomas L. Butler and captain John Reed, as well as his volunteer aids, Messrs. Livingston, Duncan, Grymies, Duplessis and major Duvezac de Cassara, the judge advocate, have merited the thanks of the general by the calm and deliberate courage they have displayed on every occasion, and in every situation that called it forth. The topographical engineer, major Tatum, exhibited all the ardor of youth in the hour of peril, united to the experience acquired by his long services.—The chief engineer, major Lacartiere de la Tour, has been useful to the army by his talents and bravery. The same praises are due to his assistants, captain Lewis Livingston and Mr. Laurobe. The medical staff has merited well of the country, and the general would not do justice to his own feelings were he to withhold from Dr. Ker, hospital surgeon, who volunteered his services, and Dr. Flood, the just tribute of applause deserved by them for their medical skill and personal bravery. The quartermaster's department, though deprived of the personal exertions of col. Piat, who was wounded in the night action of the 23d, performed well of their duties. Major-general Villere and brigadier Morgan have merited the approbation of the general by their unwearied attention since they took the field.

The large mortar was ably directed by captain Letebvre and by Mr. Gilbert. Captain Blanchard was very useful as an engineer, and merits the general's praise for the celerity and skill with which he erected the battery which now commands the river, on the right of the camp. Mr. Busquet and Mr. Ducoin, of major St. Geme's company, displayed great knowledge and dexterity as artillerymen. To the whole army the general presents the assurance of his official approbation, and of his individual regard. This splendid campaign will be considered as 'entitling every man who has served in it to the salutation of his brother in arms.

By command,

Copy of a letter from com. Patterson to the secretary of the navy.

New-Orleans, 27th January, 1815.

SIR—I do myself the honor to enclose you a letter from Mr Thomas Shields, purser of this station, giving a detailed account of the expedition under his command, sent to annoy the enemy in their embarkation; the successful issue of which is highly honorable to him and those under his command.—The prisoners taken by him, added to those taken by Mr. Johnson, will go far in the exchange of my officers and seamen, captured in the gun-boats.

I have the honor to be, with great consideration and respect, your obedient servant,

DANL T. PATTERSON.

The hon. secretary of the navy, Washington.

Copy of a letter from Mr. Thomas Shields to commodore Patterson, dated

New-Orleans, 27th January, 1815.

SIR—I have the honor to report my arrival in this city last night from the expedition ordered by you on the 17th inst. and which you did me the honor to entrust to my command.

On the night of the 19th I left the Pass Cheuf Menteur, having made the necessary observations on the enemy's situation before sun-set, with five boats and your gig manned and armed with fifty men. At 10 p. m. discovered a boat at anchor, which I captured by surprise, no resistance being made. She had forty men of the 14th light dragoons, including officers, and fourteen seamen of the British navy under command of a master's mate.

The number of troops exceeding my own, I thought it most prudent to convoy them into the picket guard, from whence they could be more conveniently sent to New Orleans by land than by water, and by which means I should also avoid weakening my own force, in its already too limited for the completion of the object in view.

After landing the prisoners and putting them in charge of the army, I again left the Pass about 2 A. M. and stood on to gain the enemy's track, in the hope of intercepting some of them about day-light, but without success. I returned to the Pass on the 20th at 8 A. M. where I was detained until the morning of the 21st. Three gun-boats having arrived from the fleet below with four transports, all of whom were soon filled with troops from the shore, at 4 A. M. 21st, I again got out and fell into their track to the fleet about day-light. Finding it impossible to make any captures without being discovered, I determined to run down among them in disguise and strike at every opportunity—Hoisted English colors and took a transport boat with five men; ordered her to follow and stood on for a transport schooner who was beating up for the army. At 9 I boarded and took her without opposition with 8 men; she had ten on board. From this time until 12 we were in the midst of their boats going up to the army, and during which time we took five others, having on board about 70 men. The wind at this time had unfortunately hauled to N. W. and blew with great violence; ordered the boats with their prizes to make the best of their way to the Rigolets. Finding the transport's draft of water too great to take her over the shoals, having already taken the ground, I set her on fire and joined the boats on shore. The wind still increasing and many boats approaching full of men from the army, induced a belief that they had discovered my character from the burning of the schooner, and meant to attack me. My force was unfortunately divided; the large launch with a 12 pound carronade, and some of my best men, with twenty prisoners, having drifted below, were compelled, from the strength of the current to anchor on the other side nearly half a mile distant. Every disposition was made by our little band to defend ourselves to the last extremity, and fire was prepared to burn the marsh should the enemy land in my rear. Six boats approached us at one time crowded with men, and three made a feint to attack the launch, but a well directed shot from her carronade compelled them to haul off, and a few discharges of our musketry drove the others also. In about two hours we were entirely clear of them. The violence of the wind and tide drove two of the prizes from their anchorage, on board of which were about 20 prisoners, with three of my own men, who were taken off, the prisoners having overpowered them so soon as they got out of the reach of our musketry. This is the only loss I have experienced during the expedition. Finding it totally impracticable to stem the strength of the current, and the wind blowing directly ahead for the fort at Coquille, my own safety and the preservation of the men entrusted to my command, induced me to parole the prisoners and let them go with their boats, particularly as a number of them were officers attached to the civil department, and could not, as I believed, be considered as prisoners of war.

Enclosed I have the honor to transmit a list of their numbers, names and rank.

The damage done the enemy on this occasion, is the loss of a transport, burnt, a large flat boat taken, one sunk and seventy-eight prisoners taken and brought in, with three slaves, two belonging to citizens of this state and one stolen by the enemy from a Mr. Edward Thomas, near Washington city, when they destroyed our capitol.

To captain Newnan, commanding at Coquille, I owe my best thanks for his uniform cheerful and friendly assistance. He furnished me with a boat and eight volunteers under lieut. Brush, of the U. S. artillery, who were of great service. To capt. Collins, commanding the picket guard at Chef Menteur, I am under many obligations. He also assisted me with eight volunteers.

To sailing master Dealy, who commanded the launch, and masters' mate Thomas Boyd, commanding a cutter, I am much indebted. Dr. Morrell, the surgeon who attended me, was particularly active; and though I had fortunately but little use for the exercise of his professional skill, his advice and assistance were always at hand.

Very respectfully, I have the honor to be, your most obedient servant,

THO. SHIELDS.

NEW-ORLEANS, Jan. 7th, 1815.

SIR—I have the pleasure to inform you of my succeeding in burning one of the enemy's transport brigs in lake Borgne yesterday morning at 4 A. M. The following are the particulars: after receiving a reinforcement of the launch and twelve men, and with the assistance of an officer and twelve men from captain Newman, commanding at fort Petite Coquilles, I manned the launch and three small boats, and on the 4th inst. proceeded down Pass Chef Menteur, as far as Bayou Sauvage, where col. Morgan, with a detachment of militia are stationed; we camped there for the night. On the 5th inst. in the afternoon, I proceeded down to east mouth of Pass Chef Menteur, with one of the small boats, to ascertain the position of the enemy in lake Borgne; finding at anchor there one brig, three gun boats, three schooners, and several barges, rowing from vessel to vessel; the brig lying at a distance of about two miles from the other vessels, I returned to the camp, determined on making an attempt to destroy her; I received the assistance of six men from col. Morgan; we then making in number 38 men: with this force I was conscious I should be able to destroy her; though I had been previously informed she mounted four pieces of cannon, and equipped accordingly; at midnight proceeded down Pass Chef Menteur, and on the 6th inst. at 4 o'clock A. M. took possession of the brig, only one man on deck; about 5 minutes after 4 A. M. one of the enemy's launches came along side, fired two muskets into her, when she surrendered; but owing to its blowing very fresh from the northward, making considerable of a sea, she parted her painter and was not able to regain the vessel, and the sea being too heavy to tow her with my boat, I abandoned her. It being near daylight, I immediately ordered the prisoners into the launch and set fire to the brig; at half past 5 o'clock, A. M. she was totally destroyed; she proved to be the British transport brig Cyrus, a captain, a sailing master, and eight men of the British navy on board, laden about half full, with rum, bread, and a quantity of soldiers' clothing for the British army at Bayou Bienvenue; at day light we arrived at the camp at Chef Menteur, delivered to col. Morgan the prisoners, who will be sent to the city, after which I returned to fort Petite Coquilles. Finding my provisions almost out, and being short of arms, I have returned to town with the launch, leaving Mr. Boyd, master's mate, and five men, at Petite Coquilles, to watch the movements of the enemy and give every information in his power.

I have the pleasure to say, that on this occasion the conduct of the officers and men whom I had the honor to command, convinced me clearly, that, had she been of the force expected, we could have burned her with ease.

Sir, I have the honor to be, your obedient humble servant,
WM. JOHNSON:

P. S. I think the brigs lying at anchor at the East mouth of the Rigolets may easily be destroyed.

Commodore Daniel T. Patterson,

Post-office Establishment.

The committee on the post-office and post-roads, to whom were referred sundry petitions and memorials, remonstrating against the usage of transporting and opening the mail on the Sabbath, and the report of the post-master-general relating thereto, report:

That they have had the same under consideration, and deeming it of great national importance, particularly in time of war, that no delay should attend the transportation of the mail, they deem it inexpedient to interfere with the present arrangements of the post-office establishment; and therefore submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That it is inexpedient to grant the prayer of the petitioners.

General post-office, Jan. 16, 1815.

Sir—The post-master-general, to whom was referred sundry memorials against usage of transporting and opening the mails on the Sabbath, has the honor to report the following facts and observations.

The usage of transporting the mails on the Sabbath, is coeval with the constitution of the United States; and a prohibition of that usage will be first considered.

The mail passes every day in the week from Portsmouth, N. H. to Savannah in Georgia, and from Wiscasset in Maine to Schoodick Falls, without resting on the Sabbath. And the same practice prevails on the great route from Washington city to Ohio, Kentucky, and the Missouri territory; and from that city to Tennessee, Mississippi territory, and New-Orleans; and from Charleston, S. C. to Tennessee and Kentucky; and on several other great chains of communication.

If the mail was not to move on Sunday on the first mentioned route, it would be delayed from three to four days in passing from one extreme of the route to the other. From Washington city to St. Louis, M. T. the mail would be delayed two days. From Washington city to New-Orleans the mail would be delayed three days. From New-Orleans to Boston it would be delayed from four to five days; and, generally, the mails would on an average be retarded equal to one-seventh part of the time now employed, if the mails do not move on the Sabbath.

On the smaller cross routes, the transportation of the mail has been avoided on the Sabbath, except when necessary to prevent great delays, and to preserve connexions with different routes.

In relation to opening the mails on the Sabbath, it may be noticed, that the ninth section of the "act regulating the post-office establishment," makes it the duty of the post-masters to attend to the duties of his office "every day" on which a mail shall arrive at his office, and at "all reasonable hours" on every day of the week. When a mail is conveyed on the Sabbath, it must be opened and exchanged at the offices which it may reach in the course of the day; this operation, at the smaller offices, occupies not more than ten or twelve minutes; in some of the larger offices it occupies one hour; and, it is believed, does not very greatly interfere with religious exercises, as to the post-masters themselves.

The practice of "delivering" letters and newspapers on the Sabbath, is of recent origin, and directed by the above quoted section commencing in 1810. Prior to that period, no post-master (except the post-master at Washington city) was required to deliver letters and newspapers on the Sabbath. The "reasonable hours" were to be determined by the post-master general, who established the following regulations, now existing: "At post-offices where the mail arrives on Sunday, the office is to be kept open for the delivery of letters, &c. for one hour after the arrival and assorting of the mail; but in case that would interfere with the hours of public worship, then the office is to be kept open for one hour after the usual time of dissolving the meetings, for that purpose." Also, if the mail arrives at an office too late for the delivery of letters, on Saturday night, the post-master is instructed to deliver them on Sunday morning, at such early hour as not to entrench upon the hours devoted to public religious exercises. If these regulations are not strictly attended to, it must be impenetrable to the urgency of applicants, and the complaisance of post-masters.

After the preceding statement, it is to be observed, that public policy, pure morality, and undefiled religion, combine in favor of a due observance of the Sabbath. Nevertheless, a nation owes to itself an exercise of the means adopted to its own preservation, and for the continuance of those very blessings which flow from such observance; and the nation must sometimes operate, by a few of its agents, even on the Sabbath, and such operation may, as in time of war, become indispensable; so that the many may enjoy an uninterrupted exercise of religion in quietude and safety. In the present state of the nation, it may be supposed necessary, daily, to convey governmental orders, instructions and regulations, and to communicate and receive information. If the daily carriage of the mail be, as relates to this safety of the nation, a matter of necessity, it also becomes a work of mercy.

When peace shall arrive, the necessity will greatly diminish, and it will be, at all times a pleasure to this department to prevent any profanation of the Sabbath as far as relates to its official duty or its official authority.

The preceding statement of facts and observations are submitted with much respect for the memorialists, and with great deference to yourself and the honorable the house of representatives.

Further extracts from English papers.

The London Globe, of Dec. 27, after giving a sketch of the treaty signed at Ghent, has the following remarks:—

"In this description of the treaty we read the humiliation of ministers in every line. It forms indeed a deplorable contrast with the high-sounding threats and boasts of that part of the public press devoted to their service. The waving of some rights and the mere retention of others, is a miserable finale to a war that we were told must not cease until after the Americans had been 'confoundedly well flogged,' which, it was boasted, must dismember the union, overthrow the government and sweep the American navy from the ocean, not leaving a single bit of bunting, a rack or a stick behind! But after the state to which ministers had brought the country by their extravagance, and the war by their incapacity, if they have been able to determine it upon any terms not absolutely dishonorable and ruinous, if they have effected a lasting peace, although not an advantageous one, and not merely purchased a short and precarious respite, with a certainty of the renewal of war with increased force and violence, and at a time when America shall have both internally and in her relations with the European powers many advantages which she does not now possess, we will not be disposed to complain. From them the country had no right to expect any thing better. The war in the Peninsula languished in their hands until a spirit of energy was infused into it by the exertions of the opposition in parliament. The same incapacity has been observable in their management of the transatlantic war, but their tardily exerted vigor did not there promise like success, as the growing spirit of the country was able to meet it with corresponding force.—We understand that a copy of the treaty was laid before the cabinet on Monday last and acceded to with the mere addition of the clause that hostilities shall continue until the ratification. In the interval our readers will recollect Mr. MONROE's letter, with explanatory observations, has been received, in which it is declared that the rights claimed by America shall not be ceded in a single instance; that the ensuing campaign must open with an army of 100,000 men; a force presumed fully competent to expel the English from the American continent, and that for this purpose recourse must be had to a military conscription; to which American papers add that this proposition was so well received that bills for carrying it into effect had been brought into congress and passed through several stages in the space of ten days from its first recommendation.—The advocates for war, who form an active and numerous body in that city, flatter themselves that the determined and inveterate spirit of hostility displayed in these proceedings will generate, both in this country and in America, difficulties and discontents that may prevent the ratification of the treaty.—They think it very hard to have been witnessing two or three dull acts of a tragedy exhibiting only the minor and preparatory incidents and that the curtain should drop abruptly at the very moment when they were expecting the grand dénouement. It certainly is a disappointment that must not a little hurt their feelings and wound their pride; but it is one we apprehend they must endure with the same patience with which they have endured its authors, the present ministers."

"At Covent Garden theatre last evening, prior to the exhibition of The Temple of Concord, a grand display of splendid fireworks took place, and the last transformation, in which the word "PEACE" appeared in the centre of a vivid sun, was received with the utmost applause. In consequence of the intelligence which had very recently arrived of peace with America, Mr. Gramaldi, who played the clown, and sung a song in character with much good humor, introduced into it a verse announcing the cessation of hostilities, which was received with great pleasure, and the song was universally encored."

From the London Times of December 29.

Yesterday being a holiday, no business whatever was transacted at the bank or stock exchange and it was consequently impossible to determine whether or not the funds would suffer any further depression, from the general dissatisfaction at the treaty with America. Probably the stocks may somewhat recover, as it is not uncommon when the first impression of ill news wears off; but still public credit must eventually suffer; for it is the general opinion that nothing but the probability of a new war in Europe could have occasioned the disgraceful compromise of our transatlantic quarrel. Unable as we are to penetrate the thick veil which hangs over the negotiations at Vienna, it is not for us to say, what dark machinations against the honor and interest of England may be brewing there; but urgent and serious, indeed, must those dangers be, if they touch us closer than the defeats which we have received by sea and land from the once despised arms of America. It may suit party writers to make very light of such considerations. The ministerialists may affect to forget that the British flag was ever at risk to the American. The oppositionists may tell you, that in spite of "national humiliation and discredit brought on the country, he rejoices because ministers have humbled themselves in the dust." With the principles which we have uniformly maintained; with a zealous affection for the interest of the country, and for that which is its best interest—its honor—each of these modes of considering this important subject is alike inconsistent. It is inconsistent with common sense to deny that our naval reputation has been blasted in this short but disastrous war.

It is inconsistent with the spirit and feelings of Englishmen not to regret that the means of retrieving that reputation are cut off by a premature and inglorious peace. Is this a "personal hate and revenge against Mr. MADISON?" Is it a wish to "make war in the spirit of personal malice and vengeance?" Oh! no. It is a far different, a far higher sentiment; a feeling innate in English bosoms, which teaches us that for the loss of honor there is no reparation. Therefore, once more we say, that we anxiously look to the non-ratification of this deadly instrument. We trust that it has not been ratified by the PRINCE REGENT, except on condition, that the American government shall solemnly retract the insult contained in Mr. MONROE's letter. That insult is a new offence subsequent to and cancelling all the obligation imposed on us by the treaty. Who can accept an apology accompanied with gestures of contempt and defiance? But it is said to be improbable that the PRESIDENT should refuse to ratify a treaty concluded, as this probably was, in conformity with his own instructions; and yet it is not long since those who argue in this way, assured us, that this same person was one of the most faithless and dishonorable of mankind. If the conscription law should fail; if the doubling of the taxes should prove ineffectual; if the internal divisions and dissatisfaction of the states should increase, Mr. Madison will, no doubt, favor us with a ratification; but these very circumstances will only aggravate the evident impolicy of the treaty on our part. Should a different state of things present itself, he will probably imitate the conduct of Mr. Jefferson, also receiving a treaty signed and sealed, sucked out the very marrow of it, and threw us the mere dry bone. We allude to the treaty of 1806, which as concluded by the American negotiators in this country, contained an express recognition of the known and established law of nations respecting the confiscation of enemy's property on board a neutral ship. Seven months after this treaty was sent to Mr. Jefferson for ratification, he returned with these essential clauses struck out! This example teaches us two lessons. It instructs us not to rely on an American president's ratification; and it farther points out the necessity of stimulating his speedy decision. "Hostilities are not to be suspended." This part of the treaty, at least, we hope, will be religiously attended to by government. Let us yet see one of our first generals sent out. Let us yet behold a British force in America, capable of intimidating Madison and his congress. Let us yet hope to see the war concluded with one blow, that may "not only chastise the savages into present peace, but make a lasting impression on their fears."

The foreign papers, which we have received, sink into comparative insignificance beside the American treaty.

MISCELLANEOUS.

Circular to the Marshals of the United States.

Office of commissary-general of prisoners,
Washington, February 18, 1815.

SIR—In consequence of the conclusion of a peace between the United States and Great Britain, which has been this day proclaimed by the president, British subjects, resident in this country, cease to be alien enemies.

You will therefore consider all restrictions heretofore imposed on persons of that description, (not prisoners of war) on account of the character attached to them by the existence of hostilities, as at an end; and you are requested to take immediate measures to discharge all such persons, within your district, from any and every restraint imposed on that account.

I have the honor to be, sir, your most obedient servant,

NOTICE.

Office of commissary-general of prisoners, Feb. 20, 1815.

A mutual restoration of prisoners of war having been provided for by the treaty of peace recently concluded with Great Britain, all officers belonging to the service of the United States, whether of the army, navy, or militia; and all other persons, citizens or residents of the same, who may have been captured during the late war, and paroled by the enemy, and who are now within the United States, are hereby declared discharged from parole, and as free to do military duty, in any capacity, or to enter into any other service or employment, as if they had never been captured.

J. MASON.

NEW-YORK, FEB. 18.—Yesterday brigadier-general Boyd, the commanding officer of this station, received a letter from the secretary at war, announcing that the president had received and examined the treaty, and that there was no doubt it would be ratified, and directed him to give notice of the fact to the commander of the British squadron off this port. Gen. Boyd immediately wrote to the British officer, and enclosed a copy of Mr. Monroe's letter. These letters were sent down to the squadron by major SPENCER in the revenue cutter, commanded by captain Brewster.

Department of War, Feb. 14, 1814.

SIR—It is with great satisfaction that I have to inform you, that a treaty of peace was concluded between the United States and Great Britain at Ghent, on the 24th Dember last.

A copy of this treaty was received to-day by Mr. Carroll. It has been examined by the president, and will (I have no doubt) be ratified.

I give you this information that hostilities may cease immediately between our troops and those of Great Britain. It will be proper for you to notify this to the British commander in your vicinity.

I have the honor to be, respectfully, your most obedient servant,

JAMES MONROE.

To the officer commanding at N. York.

Head-quarters, 3d Military District, New-York,

February 7, 1815.

SIR—I have the honor to transmit to you, by major Spencer, of the United States army, a copy of a letter I have this morning received from the honorable James Monroe, secretary of war, to congratulate you on the return of peace between Great Britain and the United States, and to offer you such refreshments as your ships may require.

I have the honor to be, with much respect, sir, your most obedient humble servant,

J. P. BOYD, Brig. Gen.

Commanding 3d M. District.

Officer commanding his Britannic majesty's ships of war off New-York.

EXPEDITION.—The news of peace reached Montreal in sixty-four hours from New-York.

PEACE.—The news of peace has been received every where with demonstrations of joy. The people felt that their country had triumphed, and were assured, before they knew the terms of the treaty, that our envoys at Ghent were not the kind of men to put their hand to a dishonorable instrument.—Most of our cities have been, or are about to be, illuminated for the restoration of a blessing which we gave up for a season, I trust, to secure its enjoyment. The intelligence has generally been communicated to the British vessels on our coast, and some of them seem already to have left it.

PEACE.—The news of peace was received at Savannah from the British squadron off Amelia Island, on the 11th inst. and at Charleston on the 13th. So that the object of those eastern merchants who despatched expresses with a view to speculations in produce at those places is completely defeated.

ALGIERS.—A war with Algiers may be expected. These allies of our late enemy have depredated much upon us; and, in the present state of our navy, we have a fine opportunity to drub them into respect. Getting out our 74's, it will be an excellent school for our gallant officers to learn the management of a fleet—they know enough about single ships.

SAVANNAH.—Had Savannah been attacked by the enemy, there would have been a new edition of the work at Orleans. We are happy that the generous Georgians were excused this severe trial of their patriotism; but we never feared the result. It is satisfactorily proved from a multitude of circumstances, that the very mountain tops of that state had been deserted, to rush like a torrent on the foe, to rescue St. Mary's, itself, from the eternal disgrace of Castine, a town of the great and populous state of Massachusetts; which history shall say was held by the British without opposition, from the state authorities, and with the open approbation of British partizans, expressed in the Boston newspapers; and that, also, there was a direct intercourse with it by hundreds of people for treasonable or smuggling purposes—that public stages ran to Castine, while possessed as aforesaid, from places under the jurisdiction of the state, and that the United States' officers, stationed to prevent such intercourse, were incompetent, for want of support from the people, to make the laws respected. When it was known that the enemy had made a decent on St. Mary's, the people of Georgia, as with the soul of one man, seized their arms, and the constituted authorities of the state moved towards the scene of expected action.—When Castine was taken, the boasted "seventy thousand" militia of Massachusetts said "we shall now have some trade," and the governor and council, and board of war, &c. &c. never moved one step either to drive off the invader, or prevent a treasonable intercourse with him. These things must not be forgotten.

TO THE RIGHT ABOUT. The glory of the victory at New Orleans seems to have a strange effect on the minds of some that recently done every thing, legal and illegal, and they could to discount and displace the arms of the United States. The following is from a late Boston Centinel:

"It is possible, the next news from New Orleans will announce the evacuation of the country by the British; and we shall be much disappointed if the effect of this repulse on the British ministry, is not a direction to their envoys in Ghent to sign a preliminary treaty of peace on the basis of the status quo ante bellum. Thus then will the courage and constancy of the American people have restored the political relations of their beloved country, as it regards Great Britain, to the exact state they were in prior to this calamitous war."

"BEAUTY AND BOOTY."—These words, or, in other terms, RAPE AND ROBBERY, were the British watch-word and countersign on their attack of the defences of Orleans, on the ever-to-be-remembered 8th of January. It is a fact, confirmed by the universal testimony, that it was the design of the enemy to have given up that rich city, and its inhabitants, to the lusts of a soldiery, unparalleled, and, possibly, never to be equalled, certainly, not excelled, for their brutalized qualities. Their language, manners and behavior is inexpressible horrible. As observed in another place, I dare not attempt to describe on paper the scenes of bestiality that many gentlemen have told me they saw, openly done, on board the fleet late in the Chesapeake;—and their common conversation is the most blasphemous that can be imagined. Great God!—and these men, if men they may be called, have been held up as champions of "religion and liberty." O miserable perversion of the noblest attributes of the great and good!

"Beauty and booty"—rejoice, virgins of Orleans, that the ravishers of St. Sebastian, and your intended spoilers, have perished. Praise heaven, that many of them have gone "where the wicked cease from troubling;" and that you are unpolluted by the embraces of monsters, remorseless as wolves and ravenous as hyenas, who have robbed the tomb for "booty," and ruined "beauty" in the sanctuary of churches.

Compliment to Americans.—A letter from a person of distinction in Canada is published in a Halifax paper, in defence of sir George Prevost. The following is an extract:—

"The principal cause of lamentation appears to be, that we have lost more men (in proportion) here, than in Spain. Is the commander of the forces to be blamed because the Americans fight obstinately and well; and that this is the real cause of the disproportionate slaughter that has roused the morbid sensibility and peevishness of some, no one here will doubt. The officers of the army from Spain, who have been engaged in Upper Canada, have acknowledged, that they never saw such determined charges as were made by the Americans in the late actions.

"An officer who has been in all the actions on the peninsula, told me the other day, that he never witnessed such obstinate courage as they shewed. His singular, but forcible expression was, "they do not know, sir, when they are beaten, they do not know when they ought to go away." In the action on the 25th July, the Americans charged to the very muzzles of our cannon, and actually bayoneted the artillerymen who were at their guns. Their charges were not once or twice only, but repeated and long, and the steadiness of British soldiers alone could have withstood them. This, added to the woody nature of the country in which the war has been carried on, and which gave the enemy great advantage in using riflemen (a description of force little used in our army), will sufficiently account for the slaughter that has taken place in our ranks."

COURT OF ENQUIRY.—From the National Intelligencer.—The court of enquiry ordered to examine into and to report upon the conduct of brigadier general Winder, so far as it is connected with the capture and destruction of the city of Washington in August, 1814, unanimously submit the following as the result of their investigations.

The court with great attention and much labor have perused the numerous papers and documents referred to them, from whence they collect:—That brigadier-general Winder was appointed to the command of the 10th military district, of which Washington was a part, on the 2d of July, 1814; that immediately thereafter he took every means in his power to put that district into a proper state of defence; that from the period when well grounded apprehensions were entertained that the enemy meditated an attack upon the capital his exertions were great and unremitted, that through these exertions he was enabled to bring into the field on the 24th of August, 1814, the day on which the battle of Bladensburg was fought, about 5 or 6000 men, all of whom excepting four hundred were militia, that he could not collect much more than one half of his force until a day or two previously to the engagement, and 6 or 700 of them did not arrive until fifteen minutes before its commencement; that from the uncertainty whether Baltimore, the city of Washington or fort Washington would be selected as the point of attack, it was necessary that brigadier-general Winder's troops should frequently change their positions, owing to which and alarms causelessly excited in the night of the 23d August, they were all much fatigued and many of them nearly exhausted at the time when the hostile army was crossing the bridge at Bladensburg; that the officers commanding the troops were generally unknown to general Winder, and but a very small number of them had enjoyed the benefit of military instruction or experience.

The members of this court, in common with their fellow citizens lament, deeply lament, the capture of the capital, and they regard with no ordinary indignation the spoliation of its edifices, those public monuments of art and science, always deemed sacred by a brave and generous foe; but, amidst these mingled and conflicting sensations, they nevertheless feel it to be their duty to separate the individual from the calamities surrounding him, and to declare that to the officer, upon whose conduct they are to determine, no censure is attributable. On the contrary, when they take into consideration the complicated difficulties and embarrassments under which he labored, they are of opinion, notwithstanding the result, that he is entitled to no little commendation: before the action he exhibited industry, zeal and talent, and during its continuance a coolness, a promptitude and a personal valor highly honorable to himself and worthy of a better fate.

The court adjourned sine die.

W. SCOTT, major-general and president.

Attest—G. L. NICHOLS, lieutenant and recorder.

GENERALS. The war with America was a fine thing for young officers in the British army, who remain without reach of our rifles, or "rifle-barrelled cannon." We have killed lieutenant gen. Packenham, and major-generals Brock, Ross and Gibbs; wounded major-general Keane; prisoners lieutenant-general Hyslop, and major-general Riall.

It appears that at Orleans the enemy lost an undue proportion of officers. This is as it should be.—The privates ought to be killed only of necessity, but the officers become a mark for our riflemen. It is stated, that several who led on the men received from 8 to 12 separate balls, chiefly in the head, or near the heart. The "Beauty and Booty" lads, or RAPE AND PLUNDER fellows, met a just reward. Let barbarians perish!

NEW-LONDON ANECDOTE. Colonel Benjamin being absent when the flag arrived at fort Trumbull from the British, with the news of the capture of the President, captain M.K. (of N. Y.) being officer of the day, the letters were delivered to him. Captain M.K. wishing to indulge a little familiarity with the bearer, asked him where the battle was fought? to which the English officer answered very shortly, "at sea." I did not suppose (says Mr. M.K. modestly) that it was on Lake Champlain.

BRITISH PRISONERS. It appears that there are in Massachusetts alone, at least two thousand six hundred prisoners of war captured from the enemy, waiting for exchange according to the usages of civilized nations, lately suspended by the British government. It is stated from an official source, January 25th, that there are nearly two thousand prisoners in close confinement, and one hundred and fifty on parole, at Pittsfield, and four hundred and fifty on parole at Salem.—Col.

A GOOD SIGN. The elegant ship UNION was lately launched at Boston, to cruise against the enemies of the United States.

FORT MIMS. A gentleman belonging to the forces of the United States in the Creek country, thus vents his honest indignation at the allied white and red savages—"We look every day for orders to march and meet the enemy. I am heartily willing as one to spend my last gasp for my country. The ruins of fort Mims, two miles from here, through which I have rode with generals Winchester, Taylor, and other officers, are enough to 'harrow up the soul.' The piles of human bones, from aged decrepitude to the infant at the breast, bleached by the rains and winds of Heaven, must arouse a holy rage in every manly bosom. I expect to see the hell hounds of England and their cursed allies in a few days. May the God of Heaven inspire me with an Ajax prayer, or that of Macduff to the manes of a Duncan against Macbeth."

COCKBURN. The editor of the Savannah Republican, says Cockburn is—"a finished buccanier, an accomplished vandal—an outlaw in the code of christian charity." But Cockburn is not such a great deal worse than the rest of his countrymen, else they would not use him. The man who employs an assassin, or purchases stolen goods, is equally an assassin or thief.

NEW ORLEANS. We shall in our next or some future paper, proceed to record many things worthy of remembrance that occurred at New Orleans, with several official articles that yet lie over: The Plantagenet 74, arrived at the Havana a little while since, with the bodies of PACKENHAM and KEANE preserved in hogsheads of rum. GIBBS was buried on the field. There were on board the English ships the acknowledged amount of ONE THOUSAND wounded men, including 80 officers. And it was notorious that they had also with them a comptroller, collector, printing presses and apparatus, and every thing else that belonged to the permanent establishment, they originally designed to have made at New Orleans.—Wofully have they been disappointed.

The British army in its attack on our lines on the 8th of Jan. was led on by one lieutenant general and three major-generals—PACKENHAM, KEANE, GIBBS and LAMBERT—the three first are dead, and latter is said to have suffered a temporary derangement, or insanity, by the havoc that surrounded him, so that the troops were led off by a lieutenant colonel. There is no doubt but that the loss of the enemy is much greater than it has been estimated by gen. JACKSON. In the whole, it may have amounted to 6000 men. What a monitor to Europe!

The dreadful tale has by this time, perhaps reached England, and great will be the sensibility that it must excite! We sympathise with the mourners of the deceased, while we glory in the destruction of the ravishers and plunderers. "BOOTY AND BEAUTY"—PACKENHAM richly deserved his death.

Another account says that the Plantagenet had on board the bodies of PACKENHAM and GIBBS, and that KEANE was recovering of his wounds—also that col. THORNTON, who was wounded at Bladensburg, was again wounded at New Orleans—as is stated in com. PATTERSON's letters, and it is said his life was despaired of. It is added "the British officers who had arrived at Havana, from New-Orleans, said but little on the subject of the invasion of Louisiana, but, acknowledged they were defeated, and that they never witnessed such fighting in Europe as was exhibited by our troops at New-Orleans."

MILITARY.

Several companies of militia, from the interior counties, reached Richmond, Va. about the 14th inst. for the defence of the lower country. They were the advance of a body of 5000 men, chiefly collected from that part of the state beyond the ridge of mountains. A hale, hard, generous people.

There is a report in the southern papers that the British were attacked and defeated at Darien, (Geo.) with the loss of 170 killed and wounded and 300 prisoners—only 50 men of the whole force that landed making their escape. Gen. BLACKSHEAR, with 1000 Georgians, was at or near that place on the 6th inst. The story may be true but—"it wants confirmation." Extract of a letter from an officer in general M'Intosh's army dated,

West of Chatahoochie, 8th Jan. 1815.

"The Tom Bigbie is ordered to be navigated, to convey provisions to New Orleans, as bread stuff will be scarce if the communication should be cut off. We have a battalion and all the artificers we could collect building boats at the Tallipooosa, to convey a detachment with two months provisions to Mobile. I hope they will be ready in a few days to receive us. Every nerve is strained to press on our movements. There is no doubt of the British being in the act of taking possession of the Floridas and are establishing posts at the fork of the Chatahuchie and Flint rivers, and at Appalachicola at Forbes' store."

Extract from the instructions of the war department to commanding generals of districts and armies relative to militia in the service of the United States.

Adjutant and Inspector General's Office,
19th February, 1815.

You will discharge all militia, volunteers and detachments now in service within your command.

Those troops will be previously mustered conformably to the following provisions of the laws and regulations relative to militia drafts. "An act to provide for calling forth the militia," &c. passed April 18th, 1814. Section 11. In all cases where a brigade of militia shall be called forth for actual service, it shall be the duty of the brigade major of such brigade to inspect and muster the same and sign the muster rolls conformably to the provisions of the act entitled "an act more effectually to provide for the national defence by establishing a uniform militia throughout the United States." If less than a brigade be called forth, then it shall be the duty of the brig. major within the district wherein such militia may rendezvous, to inspect and muster the same, and sign the muster rolls. Two musters to be made in the manner aforesaid—one on the assembling, and the other on the discharge of such militia. If there should be no brig. major in the vicinity, the commanding officer may direct any officer under the rank of lieutenant-colonel, whether of the regular troops or militia, to inspect and muster the militia so called forth." "It shall be the duty of the officer so mustering and inspecting militia detachments, to make immediate report thereof to the war department. Payment will be made through the regimental paymaster in all cases in which the corps shall be organized as a regiment; and in all cases in which it shall fall short of the number necessary to that organization, by the paymaster accompanying the army or division to which it may belong."

By order of the secretary of war,

D. PARKER, Adj. and Insp. Gen.
NAVAL.

It was contemplated, by the citizens of Norfolk, to fit out a small vessel with provisions, purchased by subscription, for the benefit and comfort of our brave but unlucky tars, captured in the President. The idea originated from the knowledge of a general scarcity of provisions at Bermuda. On application to the commanding British officer in Lynnhaven, a flag could not be procured, he having no power to grant the same.

The privateer brig Chasseur, Boyle, of Baltimore, has had a tremendous fight with a British sloop of war. The latter is said to have been silenced; but when capt. Boyle was about to take possession, a frigate hove in sight, and he was forced to make his escape. It was reported in the West Indies that one half of the crew of the sloop of war were killed or wounded, and that Boyle's loss in men was very small, though he was much damaged in his sails, spars, &c. and had to put into Martinico to refit.

The brig Macedonian, which sailed in co. with the ill-fated president, has followed her destiny, having been captured a few days out of port. She was to accompany the president as a store ship, on a long cruise to a distant part of the world, and was as fine a vessel as ever sailed from this or any other country. She was built in Connecticut a few months since, for a cruiser, and was upwards of 400 tons burthen.

The President is thought to have been bound for the East Indies. Had she reached the place of her destination, who can count the damage she might have done?

The Constitution, Wasp, Hornet, Peacock and Syren, are the only U. S. vessels now at sea. The latter has been absent twelve months, and was on the coast of Africa in May last, since which time nothing has been heard from her. No certain information has been obtained of the Wasp since the 23d September, when she was cruising of Madeira.

We have also at sea rather more than fifty private armed vessels—many of them on the British coasts. Baltimore has abroad, at or from foreign ports about 40 merchant vessels, that, not having the fear of John Bull before them, respected not his blockade.

Our prize list now amounts to about 1470—it will probably be inserted in our next. We expect to have it yet greatly increased.

An advertisement in a Canada paper announced that "a new frame of a frigate, complete with planks, &c." would be sold at auction on the first day of February, at Murin's ship yard, new point Carriere, Montreal. The sale was to commence precisely at 12 o'clock, by Alexander Henry, king's auctioneer.

Quebec, Jan. 24. On Friday evening Mr. Coudie left town with about 100 workmen for the Isle au Noix, about 150 for Kingston, for the purpose of increasing our wooden walls and floating bulwarks, and, we trust of enabling us to wipe off all stains.

THE SPANIARDS. By the following letter the reader will find that governor Kindelan has refused peremptorily to allow the British the privilege of landing, in East Florida or of carrying on offensive operations in that territory against the frontier of the state of Georgia, and that the Spanish government determine to adhere to the strictest neutrality.

"As soon as you communicated verbally to me the object of your coming to this place, I had the honor of informing you, in the same mode, that I had the strictest orders from my government to observe the most rigid neutrality, and under this supposition, I could not permit you to communicate with the British vessels that might present themselves off this bar; that I would facilitate your going to Providence, and, finally, that you would be pleased to discharge your escort of colored people, who, under the erroneous impression of this province being invaded, you had brought with you from the Seminoles, for the purpose of guarding you on your route to this place; all which I now repeat to you officially for your information and government, to which I add, by the treaty of peace, made in the year 1783, the two Floridas were ceded by treaty to Spain by Great Britain, with all the rights of sovereignty over the soil which it possessed; and by the treaty of St. Ildefonso, made with the United States of America, in the year 1785, the northern limits of said province were defined; these are a line beginning on the east bank of the Mississippi, at 31 degrees of latitude, which from said point proceeds to river Chatahoche, and from the fork of this and Flint river by a right line down to the head of St. Mary's, state of Georgia: therefore all the Indians inhabiting the country south of this line, are under the dominion and protection of the Spanish nation, and that part of them living to the eastward of the river Appalachia, are within the limits of the eastern province, under my command. I must therefore distinctly state to you, that I shall consider any landing of English troops within these limits, or any enterprize coming to this province, with any hostile intentions against the United States, as an aggression on the part of Great Britain, and under this impression, shall act in conformity with my duty. On this occasion I have the honor of offering my respects, and request you will have the goodness to inform me of your intentions. God preserve you many years.

I am, &c. your most obedient,

SEBASTIAN KINDELAN.

To George Woodbine."

Proceedings of Congress.

IN SENATE.

Thursday, Feb. 9. Mr. Giles from the committee reported the following resolution:

"Resolved, That it is inexpedient at this time to provide by a general law for making compensation to individuals whose property may have been destroyed during the war, by the constituted authorities of the United States, or whose property may have been occupied for or appropriated to public purposes."

The senate resumed the consideration of the national bank bill; on which there took place, as on yesterday, much animated debate.

Friday, Feb. 10. The senate resumed the consideration of the bill to incorporate the subscribers to the bank of the United States of America.

Mr. Giles moved to strike out that part of the rules for the government of the bank which follows:

"Until the first Monday of April, 1816, it shall not be obligatory on the said corporation to pay its notes in specie, but all the notes of the corporation, whether payable at the seat of the bank in Philadelphia, or elsewhere, shall be payable in other notes of the said corporation, or in treasury notes at the option of the applicant; if at any time during the continuance of the present war between the United States and Great Britain and a period of one year after the termination of the said war, demand shall be made upon the said corporation for gold or silver coin to an amount, and under circumstances which induce a reasonable or probable belief that the specie capital may be greatly diminished or endangered, it shall be lawful for congress, on the petition of the directors, to authorise the suspension of specie payments, for such time or times as they may deem proper."

After much debate, the question on the motion was decided as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Brown, Daggett, Dana, Fromentin, Garland, German, Giles, Goldsborough, Gore, Hunter, King, Lambert, Mason, Thompson, Wells.—15.

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Barbour, Barry, Bibb, Chace, Condit, Howell, Kerr, Lacombe, Morrow, Roberts, Robinson, Smith, Talbot, Tait, Turner, Varnum, Wharton.—18.

On motion by Mr. Gore to amend the bill, by inserting therein a provision "that the authority of the bank to pay its notes otherwise than by specie, shall be expressed on such note"—the vote stood as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Brown, Daggett, Dana, Fromentin, Gaillard, German, Giles, Goldsborough, Gore, Hunter, Kerr, King, Lambert, Mason, Thompson.—15.

NAYS—Messrs. Anderson, Barbour, Barry, Bibb, Chace, Condit, Howell, Lacombe, Morrow, Roberts, Robinson, Smith, Talbot, Tait, Turner, Varnum, Wells, Wharton.—18.

On the question "shall the bill be engrossed and read a third time as amended?" the vote stood as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Barbour, Barry, Bibb, Chace, Condit, Howell, Kerr, Lacombe, Morrow, Roberts, Robinson, Smith, Talbot, Tait, Turner, Varnum, Wharton.—18.

NAYS—Messrs. Brown, Daggett, Dana, Fromentin, Gaillard, German, Giles, Goldsborough, Gore, Hunter, King, Lambert, Mason, Thompson, Wells.—15.

And the senate adjourned.

Saturday, Feb. 11. The new national bank bill was read a third time, and after debate, passed, by a vote of 18 to 16.

The yeas and nays were as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Barbour, Barry, Bibb, Chace, Condit, Howell, Lacombe, Morrow, Roberts, Robinson, Smith, Talbot, Tait, Taylor, Turner, Varnum, Wharton.—18.

NAYS—Messrs. Brown, Daggett, Dana, Fromentin, Gaillard, German, Giles, Goldsborough, Gore, Hunter, King, Lambert, Mason, Thompson.—15.

So the bill was passed, and the concurrence of the house requested therein.

Monday, Feb. 13. The bill making appropriations for the support of government, was read a third time, as amended, and passed.

The bill "for the relief of the inhabitants of the late county of New-Madrid, in the Missouri territory, who suffered by earthquakes," was ordered to a third reading as amended.

Mr. Giles, from the military committee, reported sundry resolutions expressive of the thanks of congress to general Jackson, and the troops under his command, for their gallantry and good conduct in the defence of New-Orleans; which were read and passed to a second reading.

Mr. Giles also reported sundry resolutions expressive of the high sense entertained by congress of the patriotism and good conduct of the people of Louisiana, and of New-Orleans, during the late military operations before that city; which were read and passed to a second reading.

Mr. Tait reported sundry resolutions expressive of the sense of congress of the gallantry of commodore Patterson, major Carnrick and other naval and marine officers engaged in the defence of Orleans; which were read and passed to a second reading.

The bill from the house concerning Matthew Guy and others, was postponed to the 2d Monday in March next (rejected) 14 to 11.

Wednesday, Feb. 15. After sitting in closed doors (on the treaty) for some time—

The following resolutions, reported the day before yesterday, were unanimously adopted.

Resolutions expressive of the high sense entertained by congress, of the patriotism and good conduct of the people of Louisiana and of New Orleans, during the late military operations before that city.

Resolved, By the senate and house of representatives of the United States of America in congress assembled, That congress entertain a high sense of the patriotism, fidelity, zeal, and courage, with which the people of the state of Louisiana promptly and unanimously stepped forward, under circumstances of imminent danger from a powerful invading army, in defence of all the individual, social, and political rights held dear by man. Congress declare and proclaim, that the brave Louisianians deserve well of the whole people of the United States.

Resolved, That congress entertain a high sense of the generosity, benevolence, and humanity, displayed by the people of New-Orleans, in voluntarily affording the best accommodations in their power, and giving the kindest attention to the wounded, not only of our own army, but also to the wounded prisoners of a vanquished foe.

Resolved, That the president of the United States be requested to cause the foregoing resolutions to be communicated to his excellency the governor of Louisiana, accompanied with a request that he cause the greatest possible publicity to be given to them, for the information of the whole people of Louisiana.

Resolutions expressive of the thanks of congress to major general Jackson, and the troops under his command, for their gallantry and good conduct in the defence of New Orleans.

Resolved, by the senate and house of representatives of the United States of America in congress assembled, That the thanks of congress be, and they are hereby given to major general Jackson, and through him to the officers and soldiers of the regular army, of the militia, and of the volunteers, under his immediate command, and the officers and soldiers charged with the defence of Fort St. Philip, for their uniform gallantry and good conduct, conspicuously displayed against the enemy from the time of his landing before New-Orleans, until his final expulsion from the state of Louisiana; and particularly for their valor, skill and good conduct, on the 8th of January last, in repulsing, with great slaughter, a numerous British army of chosen veteran troops, when attempting, by a bold and daring attack, to storm and carry the works hastily thrown up for the defence of New-Orleans, and thereby obtaining a most signal and complete victory over the enemy, with a disparity of loss on his part unexampled in military annals.

Resolved, That the president of the United States be requested to cause to be struck a gold medal, with device emblematical of this splendid achievement, and presented to major general Jackson, as a testimony of the high sense entertained by congress, of his judicious and distinguished conduct on that memorable occasion.

Resolved, That the president of the United States be requested to cause the foregoing resolutions to be communicated to major general Jackson, in such terms as he may deem best calculated to give effect to the objects thereof.

Resolved, By the senate and house of representatives of the United States of America in congress assembled, That congress entertain a high sense of the valor and good conduct of commodore D. T. Patterson, of the officers, petty officers, and seamen, attached to his command, for their prompt and efficient co-operation with general Jackson, in the late gallant and successful defence of the city of New Orleans, when assailed by a powerful British force.

Resolved, That congress entertain a high sense of the valor and good conduct of major Daniel Carnrick, of the officers, non-commissioned officers and marines, under his command, in the defence of said city, on the late memorable occasion.

Friday Feb. 17. Mr. Smith submitted for consideration the following resolution:

Resolved, That the committee on military affairs be instructed to consider the propriety of reducing the military establishment of the United States, with authority to report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. Dana submitted for consideration the following resolutions:

Resolved, That the committee on naval affairs be instructed to enquire what provisions should be made by law for protecting the commerce and seamen of the United States against the Barbary powers. Agreed to.

On the question, whether the bill from the house "for the relief of the legal representatives of David Dardin, deceased," should pass to a third reading, it was decided in the negative. So the bill is lost.

Saturday, Feb. 18. Mr. Barbour submitted for consideration the following motion:

Resolved, That the president of the United States be requested to cause an experienced engineer and naval officer to explore the Chesapeake bay for the purpose of ascertaining the most convenient harbor in the said bay for the reception of ships of war of the largest class; and that they particularly ascertain whether it be practicable to establish a convenient harbor at the mouth of the Chesapeake on the Middle Ground, and the probable amount which may be necessary to place such harbor in the most respectable posture of defence.

On motion by Mr. Smith,

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to consider the expediency of repealing all acts or parts of acts laying additional duties on goods, wares and merchandize, imported in the ships or vessels of such foreign nations as shall agree to admit into their ports goods, wares and merchandize imported into such ports on board of the ships or vessels of the U. States.

Messrs. Smith, Taylor, Bibb, Hunter and King were appointed the committee.

On motion of Mr. Tait,

Resolved, That the committee on naval affairs be instructed to enquire into the expediency of repealing any act or acts respecting the flotilla establishment; and that the committee have leave to report by bill or otherwise.

The bill from the house to authorise the issuing treasury notes for the service of 181, as amended, was read a third time and passed; and the concurrence of the house requested therein.

Progress was made in much other business.

Monday, Feb. 20. The motion of Mr. Barbour, relative to the establishment of a naval harbour in the Chesapeake bay, was referred to messrs. Barbour, Smith and King.

On motion of Mr. Dana, a committee was ordered to be appointed to consider what privileges should be secured by law to citizens of the United States, as preferable to foreign subjects in navigation.

Messrs. Dana, Smith, Gore, Hunter and King were appointed the committee.

The bill authorizing a detachment of the militia of the United States, was, on motion of Mr. Turner, postponed to the 4th of March (rejected).

The bill authorizing the issue of treasury notes (as amended) was ordered to a third reading.

Several other bills passed various stages of proceeding.

Wednesday, Feb. 22. The senate passed bills to repeal the acts respecting volunteers and sea-fuer bills—a bill for the temporary accommodation of congress—and a bill for regulating the compensation to post-masters; and done and made progress in much other business.

Thursday, Feb. 23. The bill to repeal the discriminating duty on tonnage between foreign vessels and vessels of the United States, and between goods imported into the United States in foreign vessels, and vessels of the United States, was read a third time and the question on the passage thereof was decided by yeas and nays.

For the bill
Against it

The senate passed the bill to repeal the acts for raising mounted rangers—to provide a library room, and for the transportation of Mr. Jefferson's library—to repeal the acts respecting the flotilla force—and passed some private acts.

The bill to lay a duty on gold and silver ware, &c., was ordered to a third reading. The proposed duty on lotteries was postponed—or rejected—as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Daggett, Dana, Fromentin, Gaillard, German, Goldsborough, Gore, Horsey, Hunter, Kerr, King, Lambert, Smith, Thompson, Varnum, Wells—16.

NAYS—Messrs. Barbour, Barry, Bibb, Brown, Condit, Morrow, Roberts, Talbot, Taylor, Turner, Wharton—11.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Thursday, February 9. Mr. Fisk, of N. Y. submitted for consideration the following resolution:

Resolved, That the rules of this house be so amended, that officers who have received or shall hereafter receive the thanks of congress for their gallantry and good conduct displayed in the service of their country, shall be admitted to seats within the hall of the house.

The bill from the senate making an appropriation for rebuilding or repairing the public buildings in the city of Washington, was read a third time.

Mr. Pickens spoke against the bill, on the general ground of opposition to the permanency of the seat of government.

Mr. Webster moved to have it re-committed—Negative after debate, by a majority of 12. After much speaking, the vote on the passage of the bill was taken and carried by yeas and nays as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alexander, Anderson, Avery, Barbour, Bard, Barnett, Bayly, of Va. Bines, Bowen, Breckenridge, Burwell, Calhoun, Champlin, Clendenin, Crawford, Creighton, Culpeper, Cuthbert, Duval, Earle, Evans, Findley, Fisk, of Vt. Fisk of N. Y. Law Lovett, Mosley, Murfree, Markell, Oakley, Pickering, Piper, Potter, J. Reed, W. Reed, Rea, of Penn. Ruggles, Schurman, Slaymaker, Smith, of N. Y. Stanford, Strong, Taggart, Taylor, Thompson, Udree, Vose, Ward, of Mass. Ward, of N. J. Webster, Wheaton, Wilcox; Williams, Wilson, of Mass. Wilson, of Penn. Winter, Wright—63.

[The bill now only wants the signature of the president, to become a law.]

Friday, Feb. 10. A good deal of private business being disposed of, the house took up for consideration the resolution [submitted yesterday] for authorizing the admission on the floor of the house of representatives, of officers who have by name received the thanks of congress for services rendered their country; which was agreed to.

[In consequence of this resolution, major-general Brown and his suite, majors Jones, Austin and Brown, were conducted to a seat within the Hall of the house.]

The house, on motion of Mr. Eppes, resolved itself into a committee of the whole, Mr. Breckenridge in the chair, on the bill to authorize the issuing of Treasury notes for 1815.

The bill was, on motion of Mr. Eppes, so amended as to provide for issuing treasury notes to an amount not exceeding 25 millions of dollars; such of the notes as are of less amount than 100 dollars, to be transferable by delivery, (without endorsement) and all notes of 100 dollars or upwards, to bear on interest of five and two-fifths per cent. The notes of the first description in amounts of 100 dollars and upwards, to be payable or redeemable in public stock to bear an interest of eight per cent. those of the latter description to be payable or redeemable in public stock to bear an interest of seven per cent.

The bill as first reported, proposed an issue of fifteen millions of notes, redeemable in five annual instalments of three millions each, as proposed by the secretary of the treasury, for which the land tax was pledged. Connected with this plan, was the intention to propose a loan of twenty-five millions of dollars. The amendments last reported by the financial committee, are connected with a proposed loan of fifteen millions, thus reversing the proportion of loan and Treasury notes first proposed.

It was stated by Mr. Eppes, that the committee had, on further consideration, deemed a loan to so large an amount as of questionable practicability, and had therefore determined to increase the issue of treasury notes, and proportionably reduce the loan, and therefore proposed the amendments which were now made to the bill.

The amendments having been reported to the house, were agreed to without debate or opposition; and,

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading to-morrow.

After much debate and many motions, it was determined, that the mail should be transported and opened as usual, and that the prayers of the petitioners that it might be stopped on Sunday, ought not to be granted.

Saturday, February 11.—After other business, of not much general interest, the house resumed the consideration of Mr. Jackson's bill providing for clothing the militia in the service of the United States; which was amended, and then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The engrossed bill to authorize the issuing of treasury notes for the service of the year 1815, was read a third time and passed.

The bill from the senate for making a road from Cumberland in Maryland to the state of Ohio, and appropriating 100,000 dollars for the purpose, was ordered to a third reading, and read a third time and passed.

Monday, February 13.—A message from the senate announcing the passage of a bill to incorporate the subscribers to the bank of the United States of America, was brought up and the bill read a first and second time.

A motion made by Mr. Gaston to refer it to the committee of ways and means with a view to amend its details, was negative—ayes 59, nays 70 or 80.

Mr. Sharp then moved that it should be referred to a committee with a view to its amendment according to the following instructions:

1. To strike out all that part of the bill that allows fifteen millions of dollars of the capital of said bank to be paid in six per cent. stock of the United States heretofore created and now in the hands of stockholders; and then amend the bill so as to allow the government to take the said fifteen millions on their account.

2. That all the government subscriptions shall be paid in stock at five per cent. interest.

3. That the government shall have a number of directors in said bank equal to the proportion it may have of the capital of the bank; who shall be appointed by the president of the United States.

4. That so long as the bank shall not be required to pay specie for its notes or bills, or after having commenced paying of specie, shall from any cause stop the payment of the same, the government shall not be required to pay to the bank a higher rate of interest on any loans to government either as permanent loans or in anticipation of loans, than four per cent.

5. That the bank shall not be allowed to sell or transfer any part of the government stock that it may acquire by permanent loans to government, until the end of one year after the war.

Mr. Sharp made a speech about an hour long in favor of his propositions. Mr. Forsyth replied, and Messrs. Oakley, Calhoun, Bowen and Gaston supported the commitment and Messrs. Hawkins, Wright and Rhea opposed it. Motion lost—for the committee 75, against it 60.

Mr. Gaston then moved to refer it to a committee of the whole—lost—for the reference 70, against it 84.

Mr. Sharp then moved to amend the bill by striking out so much as allows the subscription of stock heretofore created. This motion was supported by Mr. Duval and opposed by Messrs. Wright and Humphreys, and lost: ayes 72, nays 82.

Mr. Sharp then moved to amend the bill by limiting the interest to be given by the government on loans from the bank to 4 per cent.—lost: ayes 74, nays 77. And then the house adjourned.

[Many persons have, no doubt, frequently thought that we have wasted a great deal of paper by our attention to notice so many motions on various important subjects that have miscarried. But I esteem it useful that the people should see them; and they are especially important to candidates for seats in legislative bodies, that they may ascertain the whole art, trade and mystery of procrastination. In making these observations, I have no particular reference to this day's proceedings; and will only add, that the custom in the British parliament (from whence we have drawn most of our legislative vices, without copying the virtues of that body) it is the custom for the opposition to any measure to try the general principle of the thing; and, if they fail in that, to suffer the majority to make the details as to them shall appear most expedient. Whether it is from the desire to make a speech, 2, 5 or 9 columns long, which no body reads, or from a thirst of independence, and a determination that the minority shall rule, which operates here, I cannot tell. But an enquiry into the matter might be wholesome to the concerns of the nation.]

Tuesday, February 14.—After disposing of other business—The bank bill was ordered to lie on the table.

The bill making provision for clothing the militia of the United States when called into the actual service of the United States, was read a third time and passed, by the following vote, by yeas and nays:

For the bill	145
Against it	NONE

So the bill was unanimously passed, and sent to the senate for concurrence therein.

The amendments of the senate to the civil list and miscellaneous appropriation bill, were read and agreed to.

Mr. Fisk, presented a petition of "the New England emigration society," praying that twenty-five townships of public lands lying south of 41 degrees of north latitude, may be sold to them on the terms and for the purposes therein mentioned. Referred to the committee on public lands.

The engrossed bill requiring the secretary of the senate and the clerk of the house of representatives to give bond for the faithful execution of the duties of their office, was read a third time and passed.

Wednesday, Feb. 15. Mr. Newton of Va. offered for consideration the following resolution, which, he said, would speak for itself and preclude the necessity of any elucidatory remarks:

Resolved, That the president of the United States be requested to cause to be laid before this house such information as he shall deem necessary to be communicated, touching the state of the relations existing between the U. States and the Barbary powers.

The resolution was agreed to nem. con. and a committee appointed to lay it before the president.

The bill for laying a direct tax on the district of Columbia, was agreed to in committee of the whole, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

Thursday, Feb. 16. The resolutions from the senate expressive of the sense of congress on the conduct of the defenders of New Orleans, coming before the house, the chairman of the military committee,

Mr. Troup, said, that he congratulated the house on the return of peace—if the peace be honorable, he might be permitted to congratulate the house on the glorious termination of the war. He might be permitted to congratulate them on the glorious termination of the most glorious war ever waged by any people.—Ye 72 glory of it gen. Jackson and his gallant army have contributed not a little. I cannot, sir—perhaps language cannot, do justice to the merits of general Jackson and the troops under his command, or to the sensibility of the house, I will therefore forbear to trouble the house with the usual prefatory remarks; it is a fit subject for the genius of Homer. But there was a spectacle connected with this subject upon which the human mind would delight to dwell—upon which the human mind could not fail to dwell with peculiar pride and exultation. It was the yemaury of the country marching to the defence of the city of Orleans, leaving their wives and children and firesides at a moment's warning. On the one side, committing themselves to the bosom of the mother of rivers; on the other, taking the rout of the trackless and savage wilderness for hundreds of miles. Meeting at the place of rendezvous—seeking, attacking and beating the enemy in a pitched battle—repulsing three desperate assaults with great loss to him—killing, wounding and capturing more than four thousand of his force, and finally compelling him to fly precipitately the country he had boldly invaded. The farmers of the country triumphantly victorious over the conquerors of the conquerors of Europe. I came, I saw, I conquered, says the American husbandman, fresh from the plough. The proud veteran who triumphed in Spain and carried terror into the warlike population of France was humbled beneath the power of my arm. The God of battles and of righteousness took part with the defenders of their country and the foe was scattered before us as chaff before the wind. It is, indeed, a fit subject for the genius of Homer, of Ossian, or Milton.

That militia should be beaten by militia is of natural and ordinary occurrence—that regular troops should be beaten by militia is not without example—the examples are as numerous or more numerous in our own country than in any other—but that regular troops, the best disciplined and most veteran of Europe, should be beaten by undisciplined militia with the disproportionate loss of an hundred to one, is to use the language of the commanding general, almost incredible. The disparity of the loss—the equality of force—the difference in the character of the force all combine to render the battle of the 8th of January, at once the most brilliant and extraordinary of modern times. Nothing can account for it but the rare merits of the commanding general and the rare patriotism and military valor of the troops under his command.

Glorious, sir, as are these events to the American arms—honorable as they are to the American character—they are not more glorious and honorable than are the immediate consequences full of usefulness to the country. If the war had continued, the men of the country would have been inspired with a noble ardor and a generous emulation in defence of the country—they would have struck terror into the invader and given confidence to the invaded. Europe has seen that to be formidable on the ocean we need but will it. Europe will see that to be invincible on the land it is only necessary that we judiciously employ the means which God and nature have bountifully placed at our disposal. The men of Europe bred in camps, trained to war—with all the science and all the experience of modern war, are not a match for the men of America taken from the closet, the bar, the counting-house and the plough. If, sir, it be pardonable at any time to indulge these sentiments and feelings, it may be deemed pardonable on the present occasion.

I think the resolution of the senate defective—it does not record the prominent fact which more than any other contributes to the brilliancy of general Jackson's triumph—the fact that the triumph was the triumph of militia over regular troops—on the contrary it is so worded, that strangers or posterity deriving their knowledge from the record itself, would be led to believe that the regular troops constituted the principal force, and that the militia was only auxiliary.

If the house should consider the defect as important I would move to amend the resolution.

The bill for fixing the compensation to collectors, being before the house it was determined to allow a commission of 4-1/2 per centum, on all monies collected, &c. not exceeding one hundred thousand dollars, and one half per cent. on all collected over that sum in addition.

Friday, February 17. Mr. Jackson of Va. submitted for consideration the following resolution:

1. Resolved, That the committee on military affairs be instructed to enquire and report to what extent the military establishment of the United States can be reduced consistently with the public interest.

2. Resolved, That the said committee be further instructed to enquire whether any, and if any, what provision ought to be made by law for allowing months extra pay and a donation in hand to the officers of the army who may be disbanded.

3. Resolved, That the said committee be further instructed to enquire into the expediency of establishing one or more additional military schools.

4. Resolved, That the naval committee be instructed to enquire into and report to what extent the navy of the United States on the lakes can be reduced, consistently with the public interest.

5. Resolved, That the committee be further instructed to enquire into the expediency of establishing one or more naval academies.

6. Resolved, That the committee on foreign relations be instructed to ascertain and report whether any, and if any, what modifications of existing laws are necessary to adapt them to the state of our relations with foreign nations.

The house having agreed to consider these resolutions—Mr. Jackson made a few remarks of an explanatory nature. After discussion, they were ordered to lie on the table.

The bill from the senate, to give further time to complete surveys and locate patents for lands, granted under Virginia revolutionary warrants, was read a third time, passed and returned to the senate.

The engrossed bill to lay a direct tax on the district of Columbia, was read a third time without debate, passed, and sent to the senate.

The resolutions expressive of the thanks of congress to major general Andrew Jackson, and the troops under his command, for their gallantry and good conduct in the defence of New-Orleans, were read a third time and passed unanimously.

The resolutions expressive of the high sense entertained by congress of the patriotism and good conduct of the people of Louisiana, and New-Orleans, were read a third time.

Mr. Robertson, of Louisiana, expressed in a feeling manner his high sense of the complimentary manner in which his constituents were mentioned in this resolve; and flattered himself they would never forget, at any time, the high character they had now acquired.

Mr. Sharp then rose, and addressed the house nearly as follows: Mr. Speaker—The subject those resolutions present for our consideration, is the most interesting occurrence in the history of our country.

The people of Louisiana, approached by an enemy who suspected their fidelity to their newly adopted government, and who held out every allurement that could be presented to seduce them from the union; at this very moment, whilst assailed by the blandishments of the enemy, with open arms they received their fellow-citizens who came to their aid, and by voluntary contributions furnished every thing necessary to their comfort while exposed in the open field in defence of their city. Yet their patriotism and humanity was surpassed by their bravery. On the 23d of December, it was a company of Louisianians that penetrated the very centre of the enemy's camp and made good their retreat, and brought off a number of prisoners. On the 8th of January, the Louisianians aided in defending the breast-work on the right, and when the enemy got possession of one of our bastions, they were among the foremost who met them; and amidst the clash of swords and bayonets, grappled with them upon the ramparts, and bore them into the ditch.

If we compare the conduct of Louisiana with any other part of the nation, even the oldest and best established in their political institutions, so far from losing any thing in the comparison, it is on their part splendid and honorable, and must effectually put down all those feelings of distrust and jealousy that have been entertained in some parts of the union in relation to their adoption into our republic.

In another point of view this subject is still more interesting. There is perhaps no epoch to be found on the historic page, none in the history of America, in which we have been called upon to present the thanks of the American people to a whole state, Louisiana, the youngest daughter of the Union, composed of a population most of whom had tasted of liberty but yesterday; it had not been their birth right, but such are the charms of liberty to a people who have felt its blessings and known its value, that on the approach of a foe to enslave them, the whole population of Louisiana are bristling with the bayonet; the old men, the exempt are clad in mail and rushing to meet the foe.

"If humanity shows to the God of the world,

A sight for his fatherly eye,

"It is that of a people, with banner unfurled, Resolved for their freedom to die."

Such a spectacle was presented by the state of Louisiana. As we are ever to expect, in so just a cause they received the benedictions of Heaven, and under its benign influence, aided by their fellow-citizens in arms, they not only triumphed over, but almost exterminated their enemy.

Can there be an American, whose bosom does not beat high with joy to call Louisiana a legitimate daughter of the Union; and hail her citizens as brothers?

Is there any part of the American empire, that could hesitate ever hereafter to hold Louisiana in the maternal embrace of the nation; to extend to her our care and protection?

The resolutions were then unanimously passed.

The resolution expressive of the high sense entertained by congress of the merits of commodore D. T. Patterson, maj. Daniel Canineck and the officers and men under their command, were read a third time and passed, with one negative (Mr. McKee of Ky.)

The house resumed the consideration of the bill from the senate "to incorporate the subscribers to the bank of the United States of America."

Mr. Forsyth moved to refer the bill to a select committee.

Mr. Lowndes superseded this motion by a motion to postpone the bill indefinitely. He made this motion, not from any hostility to a national bank, wishing, as the gentleman did, that a national bank should be established; but because he wished it to be done at a time and under circumstances which would give the house ability to decide correctly on the subject. He believed, he said, and he was not alone in that opinion, that the present moment was a most unfavorable one for the establishment of a bank.—It must be known that, long as the subject of a bank had been agitated, there had been important differences of sentiment as to the principles of such an institution, which had been suppressed because of the pressure of the times. Among other objections to acting on this subject at present, he said, it was no trifling one that the suspension of specie payments by the state banks, which every one considered an evil, would unquestionably be prolonged by it. In the fragment of the session which now remains, there would not be time to enter into a consideration of these points; and, if there were full time, the mere circumstances of the new and almost insuperable difficulties arising from a new state of things which now present themselves, ought to suggest a reason for postponement. Congress could not now establish a bank half so eligible or half so durable, as they could at a future session.

Mr. Forsyth said he was perfectly aware that the subject of a national bank was attended with great difficulty at this or any other session; but his opinion was that this was the best time for an attempt of this kind. The subject had been so much discussed, that he apprehended every gentleman was prepared to decide on it without much further discussion. It was from a hope that all sides of the house could now come to some understanding, and agree on the establishment of such an institution as should be not only valuable to the United States, but satisfactory to all parties; that he had now moved to commit the bill, which he hoped would not be indefinitely postponed.

Mr. Gaston conceived there would be less difficulty in acting on this subject at the present session, than was anticipated by the gentleman from South Carolina. The subject has been so repeatedly discussed, that he thought it could be acted on more advantageously in the small remnant of the present session, than in the first session of a new congress, bringing together individuals not acquainted with each other's views, and not having the advantage of hearing the subject frequently discussed. Having always been friendly to such an institution, and believing it as important in peace as in war, he hoped an experiment would be made, by referring this subject to a committee, which, whether successful or not, would not consume much time of the house.

Mr. Grosvenor, Mr. Wright, Mr. Pickering and Mr. Farrow, also advocated the postponement, and Mr. Kilbourn, Mr. Fisk, of Vt. Mr. Calhoun and Mr. Telfair opposed it.

On the question of postponement, which was decided by yeas and nays, the vote stood as follows:—

YEAS.—Messrs. Avery, Barbour, Bard, Barnett, Baylies of Mass. Bigelow, Boyd, Bradbury, Brigham, Champion, Ciley, Clapton, Cooper, Crawford, Cuthbert, Davenport, Desha, Ely, Epes, Farrow, Franklin, Good, Glasgow, Goodwyn, Grosvenor, Hale, Hall, Hasbrouck, Hawes, Henderson, Hulbert, Jackson of R. I. Johnson of Ky. Kennedy, Kent of N. Y. King of Mass. Law, Lowndes, Macon, McKee, Montgomery, Mosley, Markell, Nelson, Ormsby, Pickering, Pitkin, Potter, J. Reed, W. Reed, Roane, Ruggles, Schreman, Seybert, Sheffey, Shipperd, Slaymaker, Smith of N. Y. Stanford, Stockton, Stuart, Taggart, Thompson, Troup, Voss, Ward of Mass. Ward of N. J. Wheaton, White, Wilcox, Williams, Wilson of Mass. Winter, Wright—74.

NAYS.—Messrs. Alston, Anderson, Bayly of Va. Bines, Bowen, Breckenridge, Brown, Butler, Caperton, Calhoun, Cannon, Clendenin, Constock, Conrad, Cox, Crighton, Crouch, Culpeper, Duval, Earle, Findley, Fisk of Vt. Fisk of N. Y. Forney, Forsythe, Gaston, Gholsom, Gourdin, Griffin, Hanson, Hawkins, Hubbard, Hungerford, Ingersoll, Lingham, Jackson of Va. Kent of Md. Kerr, Kershaw, Kilbourn, Lefferts, Lewis, Lovett, Lyle, McCoy, McLean, Moore, Murfree, Newton, Parker, Pearson, Pickens, Piper, Pleasants, Rea of Penn. Rhoads, Rich, Ringgold, Robertson, Sage, Sevier, Sharp, Sherwood, Smith of Va. Strong, Sturges, Tannhill, Taylor, Telfair, Udree, Wilson of Penn. Wood, Yancey—73.

So the bill was indefinitely postponed.

Saturday, Feb. 18. Mr. Nelson, from the committee on the petition of William Lambert, made a report, terminating with the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the president of the United States be requested to cause such further observations to be made at the seat of the national government as may be deemed most proper to determine the longitude of the capitol, in the city of Washington with the greatest practicable degree of exactness; and that the data, with abstracts of the calculations and the results founded thereon, be laid before congress at their next session."

The report was agreed to.

Mr. Culpeper submitted for consideration a resolution requesting the president to recommend a day of thanksgiving and religious solemnity to the people of the United States on the present state of the country, &c. which was twice read and laid on the table.

The bill to grant land to deserters from the enemy, was indefinitely postponed.

Monday, Feb. 20. Mr. Bowen, from the committee on prisons and revolutionary claims, reported a bill (embracing various claims of that character) concerning invalid pensioners: read twice and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

Mr. Harris moved the adoption of the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the committee on the public lands be instructed to report a bill with provisions for having the boundary lines of the lands ceded to the United States by the Creek treaty recently ratified run and marked, and having the same laid off into sections and quarter sections, preparatory to the sale thereof, and for making an appropriation for defraying the expenses incident thereto."

Mr. Humphreys proposed to amend the resolution as follows; and the motion so amended prevailed:

"Resolved, That the committee of ways and means be instructed to enquire into the necessity and expediency of making an appropriation of money to meet the expense of surveying and laying off the military bounty lands, and the lands lately ceded by the Creek Indians to the United States, in the treaty of Fort Jackson, in order to the settlement thereof by citizens of the United States."

The order of the day on Mr. Rich's resolution for classifying persons liable to the direct tax, and allowing them to furnish soldiers in lieu of the same, was on motion of its author, indefinitely postponed.

The bill from the senate authorising payment to the widow of Elbridge Gerry, late vice president of the United States, of such salary as would have been payable to him during the remainder of his term of service, had he so long lived, being before the house—

Mr. Epes moved to postpone it indefinitely.

This motion gave rise to a debate, in which Messrs. Epes, Cannon, Potter, Taylor, Grosvenor, Sheffey and Pickering, advocated the postponement, and Messrs. Fisk of N. Y. McKim, Fisk of Vt. Jackson, of Va. Hulbert, Wright, and Oakley opposed it.

The debate was one of some interest. The general principle asserted by those opposed to the bill, was the impropriety of settling a precedent of pensions for civil services, which would entail on the United States the evils so previously felt in despotic governments, from the same source. The bill was advocated on the ground of respect for the services of a deceased patriot and public servant, whose family was by his decease placed in a state of absolute dependence.

The question on postponement, was at length decided by yeas and nays as follows:

For postponement	86
Against it	44

So the bill was indefinitely postponed, in other words, rejected.

The president's message of the day and the treaty, were received and read, and 4500 copies thereof ordered to be printed. [See pag. 102.]

The remainder of the sitting was occupied on Mr. Kilbourn's bill to provide by encouraging actual settlement for the protection of the North Western frontier; which was, in the end, indefinitely postponed.

Thursday, Feb. 21. Nothing important, done in the house: this day.

Wednesday, Feb. 22. Mr. Troup, from the committee on military affairs, reported a bill fixing the military peace establishment of the United States.

[The bill provided that the military peace establishment shall consist of such proportions of artillery, infantry and riflemen, not exceeding in the whole ten thousand men, as the president shall think proper; the corps or engineers to be retained. The general officers to consist of two major generals and four brigadier generals. The president to cause selections to be made, of officers from the existing force, and to cause the superannuated officers to be discharged as soon as circumstances shall permit. Three months pay to be given to each officer, &c. so honorably discharged, and, in addition, to each officer a donation of land, 500 acres to a major general, &c. 640 to a captain, &c. to a subaltern. To each private, also, an additional donation of 160 acres of land, provided the whole quantity of land such private receives shall not exceed 320 acres. The bill also proposes to regulate the future organization of the army.]

The bill was twice read and referred to a committee of the whole.

Mr. Epes, from the committee of ways and means, made a report recommending an agreement to the amendments of the senate to the treasury note bill.

The bill, as it went from this house, provided that those treasury notes to be issued bearing no interest, should be fundable at eight per cent, and those bearing interest at seven per cent. The senate propose to amend the bill, so as that the notes bearing no interest shall be fundable at seven per cent, and those bearing interest shall be fundable at six per cent.

Mr. E. said, that, as the state of war had ceased since the bill passed this house and the state of peace would probably appreciate the value of the public securities, it was supposed the interest proposed by the senate would be sufficient.

The amendments were agreed to.

The order of the day on the bill from the senate authorizing the president of the United States to cause to be built one or more floating batteries for the defence of the waters of the United States, was indefinitely postponed.

Much other business was progressed in.

Thursday, Feb. 23.—Mr. Epes, under the direction of the senate committee, moved,

"That the secretary of the treasury be directed to report at the next session a general Tariff of duties proposed to be imposed upon imported goods, wares, and merchandise."

The motion was agreed to, nem con.

The bill from the senate to repeal the acts respecting volunteers and sea-nobles was passed.

Mr. Fisk of Vt. offered for consideration the following resolution: "Resolved, That the committee of ways and means be instructed to enquire into the expediency of making provision by law for paying the members of this house in money current in the states to which they respectively belong."

This motion gave rise to some debate, and was Indefinitely postponed.

Two or three messages were received from the president of the United States, by Mr. Coles his secretary; one of which it appeared was of a confidential nature; and the doors were closed and galleries cleared, and after so remaining for a short time, were again opened; when the following message, being of a public nature, was read.

To the senate and house of representatives of the United States.

I lay before congress copies of two ratified treaties which were entered into on the part of the United States, one on the 22d day of July, 1814, with the several tribes of Indians called the Wyandots, Delawares, Shawanoes, Senecas and Miamies; the other on the 9th day of August, 1814, with the Creek nation, of Indians.

It is referred to the consideration of congress how far legislative provisions may be necessary for carrying any part of those stipulations into effect.

JAMES MADISON.

February 22, 1815.

The message and treaties were referred to the committee of ways and means.

PLASTER OF PARIS.

This very valuable article has been recently discovered in many parts of our country, and we shall want no more from Nova Scotia. So far it is well. Every thing that lessens our dependence upon or communication with the British or any thing that belongs to them, should be a subject of rejoicing, as it more or less lessens that influence which has so immensely injured the United States, and prevented a national character and home feelings.

An inexhaustible store of this plaster is found on the shore of the Hudson river, about a mile above the city of that name—it is also plentiful in the western parts of New-York, from whence, by the Susquehanna, &c. a large portion of Pennsylvania, &c. is supplied, and in several other places convenient for boat transportation, or to supply the interior.

NILES' WEEKLY REGISTER.

SUPPLEMENT TO VOLUME SEVEN.

BIOGRAPHY.

Brig. Gen. Zebulon M. Pike.

From the Analytic Magazine.

Though the REGISTER already contains a brief notice of this distinguished and lamented soldier, to which the writer of the following elegant memoir acknowledges himself indebted, there is in the character of the illustrious dead so many traits of a high and manly soul impelled by an irresistible thirst of glory, and nice regard for honour, that we believe we cannot be too zealous in holding him up as an example to his countrymen.

ED. REG.

ZEBULON MONTGOMERY PIKE was born at Lambertons,* in the state of New-Jersey, January 5th, 1779. His father was a respectable officer in the army of the United States. His family had for several generations resided in New-Jersey, and were descended from a Captain John Pike, whose name is preserved by tradition as having been a gallant and distinguished soldier in the early Indian wars of the colony. He entered the army while yet a boy, and served for some time as a cadet in his father's company, which was then stationed on the western frontiers of the United States. At an early age he obtained the commission of ensign, and some time after, that of lieutenant in the 1st regiment of infantry. He was thus almost from his cradle trained to the habits of a military life; but he did not, like most of the peaceful veterans of the barracks and the parade, while away his days in inactivity, contented with the mechanical routine of military duty. By a life of constant activity and exposure, he invigorated his constitution, and prepared himself for deeds of hardihood and adventure. At the same time, he endeavoured to supply the deficiency of his early education by most ardent, though, probably, often desultory and ill-regulated application to every branch of useful knowledge. He had entered the army with no other education than such as is afforded by the most ordinary village school—reading, writing, and a little arithmetic. By his own solitary exertions he acquired, almost without the aid of a master, the French and Latin languages, the former of which, it appears from his journal, he was able to write and speak with sufficient accuracy for all the purposes of business; to these he afterwards added a competent knowledge of the Spanish. He also studied the elementary branches of mathematics, and became very conversant and even skilful in all the ordinary practical applications of that science. He seems, besides, to have had a general curiosity, to which no kind of knowledge was without interest, he read with avidity every book which fell in his way, and thus, without any regular plan of study, acquired a considerable stock of various information, and some tincture of popular English literature. In most of these literary acquirements, Pike scarcely attained to the accuracy of the scholar, but they were such as became the gentleman, and elevated and adorned the character of the soldier. Nor were these studies directed solely to the improvement of the mind; he endeavoured to make them subservient to a much higher end. From his youth he sedulously cultivated in himself a generous spirit of chivalry; not that punctilious and barren honour which cheaply satisfies itself with the reputation of personal courage and freedom from disreputable vice, but the chivalry of the ancient school of European honour—that habit of manly and virtuous sentiment, that spirit of patriotism and self-devotion, which, while it roots out from the heart every other weakness of nature, spares and cherishes “that last infirmity of noble minds,” the love of glory, and in every great emergency in which man may be called upon to act, sends him forth into the service of his country or his kind, at once obeying the commands of duty, and elevated and animated by the warm impulse of enthusiastic feeling.

Among other habits of mental discipline by which Pike was accustomed to cherish these principles and feelings, was a constant practice of inserting upon the blank pages of some favourite volume, such striking maxims of morality, or sentiments of honour, as occurred in his reading, or were suggested by his own reflections. He had been in the practice of making use of a small edition of Bousley's “Economy of Human Life,” for this purpose. Soon after his marriage, he presented this volume to his wife, who still preserves it as one of the most precious memorials of her husband's virtues. An extract from one of the manuscript pages of this volume was published in a periodical work soon after his death. It was written as a continuation of the article "Sincerity," and is strongly characteristic of the author.

"Should my country call for the sacrifice of that life which has been devoted to her service from early youth, most willingly shall she receive it. The sod which covers the brave shall be moistened by the tears of love and friendship; but if I fall far from my friends and from you, my Clara, remember that the choicest tears which are ever shed, are those which bedew the unburied head of the soldier; and when these lines shall meet the eyes of our young ——— let the pages of this little book be impressed on his mind as the gift of a father who had nothing to bequeath but his honour, and let these maxims be ever present to his mind as he rises from youth to manhood:

"1. Preserve your honour free from blemish.

"2. Be always ready to die for your country.

"Z. M. Pike.

"Kaskasias, Indiana Territory."

Thus gifted with a lofty spirit of honour, and an iron constitution, Pike presents to the imagination no imperfect resemblance of one of the cavaliers of the sixteenth century, the hardy, steel-clad companions of Bayard and Sydney.

In March, 1801, he married Miss Clarissa Brown, of Cincinnati, in the state of Kentucky. By this marriage he had several children, only one of whom, a daughter, survives him.

On the old peace establishment of our army, then composed only of a few regiments, and employed altogether in garrisoning a few frontier posts, promotion was slow, and the field of action limited and obscure. For several years Lieutenant Pike panted in vain for an opportunity of gratifying that "all-ruling passion" which to use his own words, "swayed him irresistibly to the profession of arms, and the pursuits of military glory."

At length, in 1805, a new career of honourable distinction was opened to this active and aspiring youth. Soon after the purchase of Louisiana, the government of the United States determined upon taking measures to explore their new territory, and that immense tract of wilderness, included within its limits. Besides ascertaining its geographical boundaries, it was wished to acquire some knowledge of its soil and natural productions, of the course of its rivers, and their fitness for the purposes of navigation and other uses of civilized life, and also to gain particular information of the numbers, character, and power of the tribes of Indians who inhabited this territory, and their several dispositions towards the United States. With these views, while Captains Lewis and Clarke were sent to explore the unknown sources of the Missouri, Pike was despatched on a similar expedition for the purpose of tracing the Mississippi to its head.

On the 9th of August, 1805, Pike accordingly embarked at St. Louis, and proceeded up the Mississippi, with twenty men, in a stout boat, provisioned for four months, but they were soon obliged to leave their boat and proceed on their journey by land, or in canoes, which they built after leaving their boat, and carried with them on their march. Pike's own journal has been for some time before the public, and affords a much more satisfactory narrative of the expedition than the narrow limits of a magazine article can allow. For eight months and twenty days this adventurous soldier and his faithful band were almost continually exposed to hardship and peril, depending for provisions upon the precarious fortunes of the chase, enduring the most piercing cold, and cheerfully submitting to the most constant and harassing toils. They were sometimes for days together without food, and they frequently slept without cover on the bare earth, or the snow, during the bitterest inclemency of a northern winter. During this voyage, Pike had no intelligent companion upon whom he could rely for any sort of advice or aid, and he literally performed the duties of astronomer, surveyor, commanding officer, clerk, spy, guide, and hunter, frequently preceding the party for many miles, in order to reconnoitre, or rambling for whole days in search of deer or other game for provision, and then returning to his men in the evening hungry and fatigued, he would sit down in the open air to copy by the light of a fire the notes of his journey, and to plot out the courses of the next day.

His conduct towards the Indians was marked with equal good sense, firmness, and humanity; he every where, without violence or fraud, induced them to submit to the government of the United States, and he made use of the authority of his country to put an end to a savage warfare which had for many years been carried on with the utmost cruelty and rancour between the Sioux and the Chippeways, two of the most powerful nations of Aborigines remaining on the North American continent. He also every where enforced with effect the laws of the United States against supplying the savages with spirituous liquors. Thus, while he wrested their tomahawks from their hands, and compelled them to bury the hatchet, he defended them from their own vices, and in the true spirit of humanity and honour, rejected with disdain that cruel and dastardly policy which seeks the security of the civilized man in the debasement of the savage.

In addition to the other objects of Pike's mission, as specifically detailed in his instructions, he conceived that his duty as a soldier required of him an investigation of the views and conduct of the British traders, within the limits of our jurisdiction, and an enquiry into the exact limits of the territories of the United States and Great Britain. This duty he performed, says the author of a former sketch of his biography,* with the boldness of a soldier and the politeness of a gentleman; he might have justly added, with the disinterestedness of a man of honour, and the ability and discretion of an enlightened politician. He found that the North-west company, by extending their establishments and commerce far within the bounds of the United States, and even into the very centre of Louisiana, were thus enabled to introduce their goods without duty or license into our territories, to the very great injury of the revenue, as well as to the complete exclusion of our own countrymen from all competition in this trade. He perceived, besides, that these establishments were made subservient to the purposes of obtaining an influence over the savages dangerous to the peace and injurious to the honour and character of our government, and he thought it evident that in case of a rupture between the two powers, all these posts would be used as rallying points for the enemy, and as places of deposite for arms to be distributed to the Indians, to the infinite annoyance, if not total ruin, of all the adjoining territories.

An opportunity was now presented to him of enriching himself for life, by merely using the power vested in him by law, and seizing upon the immense property of the company which he found illegally introduced within our territory. But having been hospitably received at one of their principal posts, his high sense of honour would not permit him to requite their hospitality by a rigorous execution of the laws. It is probable, too, that he thought so violent a measure might lead to collisions between the two governments, without tending to produce any permanent beneficial effect, and he cheerfully sacrificed all views of personal interest to what he conceived to be the true interest and honour of his country. By means of reprimands and threats to the inferior traders, and a frank and spirited remonstrance to the director of the Fond du Lac department, he succeeded in procuring a stipulation, that in future no attempt should be made to influence any Indian on political affairs, or any subjects foreign to trade, and that measures should be immediately taken to prevent the display of the British flag, or any other mark of power, within our dominion; together with a promise that such representations should be immediately made to the company, and such an arrangement effected with regard to duties, as would hereafter set that question at rest.

His conduct with regard to this subject was, at the time, viewed with cold approbation, but the events of the present war have borne ample testimony to his sagacity and foresight.

Within two months after his return from this expedition, Pike was selected by General Wilkinson for a second perilous journey of hardship and adventure. The principal purpose of this expedition was, like that of the former, to explore the interior of Louisiana. He was directed to embark at St. Louis with the Osage captives, (about forty in number,) who had been rescued from their enemies, the Potowatomies, by the interference of our government, and to transport them to the principal village of their nation; and he was instructed to take this opportunity to bring about interviews between the different savage nations, and to endeavour to assuage animosities, and establish a permanent peace among them. He was, after accomplishing these objects, to continue his route into the interior, and to explore the Mississippi and its tributary streams, especially the Arkansas and the Red River, and thus to acquire such geographical information as might enable government to enter into definitive arrangements for a boundary line between our newly acquired territory and North Mexico.

In the course of this second journey, our adventurous soldier, after leaving the Osage village, encountered hardships, in comparison of which the severities of his first mer journey seemed to him ease and luxury.

Winter overtook the party unprovided with any clothing fit to protect them from cold and storms. Their horses died, and for weeks they were obliged to explore their way on foot through the wilderness, carrying packs of sixty or seventy pounds weight, beside their arms, exposed to the bitterest severity of the cold, relying solely on the produce of the chase for subsistence; and often for two or three days altogether without food. This part of his journal contains a narrative of a series of sufferings sufficient to make the "superfluous and lust-dieted" son of luxury shudder at the bare recital. Several of the men had their feet frozen, and all, except Pike and one other, were in some degree injured by the intensity of the cold. He thus relates the history of two of these dreary days:

"18th January, Sunday.—The doctor and myself, who fortunately were untouched by the frost, went out to hunt something to preserve existence; near evening we wounded a buffalo with three balls, but had the mortification to see him run off notwithstanding. We concluded it was useless to go home to add to the general gloom, and went amongst some rocks, where we encamped, and sat up all night; from the intense cold it was impossible to sleep. Hungry and without cover.

"19th January, Monday.—We again took the field, and after crawling about one mile in the snow, got near enough to shoot eight times at a gang of buffaloes, and could plainly perceive two or three of them to be badly wounded, but by accident they took the wind of us, and, to our great mortification, all were able to run off. By this time I had become extremely weak and faint, it being the fourth day since we had received sustenance, all of which we were marching hard, and the last night had scarcely closed our eyes to sleep. We were inclining our course to a point of woods; determined to remain absent and die by ourselves, rather than to return to our camp and behold the misery of our poor lads, when we discovered a gang of buffaloes coming along at some distance. With great exertions I made out to run and place myself behind some cedars, and by the greatest good luck the first shot stopped one, which we killed in three more shots, and by the dusk had cut each of us a heavy load with which we determined immediately to proceed to the camp, in order to relieve the anxiety of our men, and carry the poor fellows some food. We arrived there about 12 o'clock, and when I threw my load down, it was with difficulty I prevented myself from falling; I was attacked with a giddiness of the head, which lasted for some minutes. On the countenances of the men was not a frown, nor a desponding eye, but all seemed happy to hail their officer and companions, yet not a mouthful had they eat for four days. On demanding what were their thoughts, the sergeant replied, the most robust had determined to set out in search of us on the morrow, and not return unless they found us, or had killed something to preserve the lives of their starving companions."

In the course of this long, toilsome, and perilous march, Pike displayed a degree of personal heroism and hardihood, united with a prudence and sagacity which, had they been exerted on some wide theatre of action, would have done honour to the most renowned general. The reader may, perhaps smile at this remark, as one of the wild exaggerations of a biographer anxious to dignify the character of his hero, but the truth is, that great men owe much of their splendour to external circumstances, and if Hannibal had made his famous march across the Alps at the head of a company of foot, instead of an army, his name if it had reached us, would have come down to posterity with much less dignity than that of our hardy countryman. There are passages in Pike's journal of his second expedition which, had they been found, with proper alterations of place and circumstance, related by Plutarch or Livy of one of their heroes, would have been cited by every schoolboy as examples of military and heroic virtue. Take, for instance, the account of Pike's firm and prudent conduct in repressing the first symptoms of discontent in his little band, and his address upon this occasion to the mutineer, and they will be found to need but little of the usual embellishments of an eloquent historian, to be made worthy of Hannibal himself.

"24th January, Saturday.—We sallied out in the morning, and shortly after perceived our little band, marching through the snow, (about two and a half feet deep,) silent, and with downcast countenances. We joined them, and learnt that they, finding the snow to fall so thickly that it was impossible to proceed, had encamped about one o'clock the preceding day. As I found all the buffaloes had quitted the plains, I determined to attempt the traverse of the mountains, in which we persevered until the snow became so deep it was impossible to proceed, when I again turned my face to the plain, and for the first time in the voyage found myself discouraged, and for the first time I heard a man express himself in a seditious manner; he exclaimed, 'that it was more than human nature could bear, to march three days without sustenance, through snows three feet deep, and carry burdens only fit for horses,' &c.

"As I knew very well the fidelity and attachment of the majority of the men, and even of this poor fellow, and that it was in my power to chastise him when I thought proper, I passed it by for the moment, determined to notice it at a more auspicious time. We dragged our weary and emaciated limbs along until about 10 o'clock. The doctor and myself, who were in advance, discovered some buffaloes on the plain, when we left our loads and orders written on the snow, to proceed to the nearest woods to encamp. We went in pursuit of the buffaloes, which were on the move.

"The doctor, who was then less reduced than myself, ran and got behind a hill, and shot one down, which stopped the remainder. We crawled up to the dead one, and shot from him as many as twelve or fourteen times among the gang, when they removed out of sight. We then proceeded to cut up the one we had shot, and after procuring each of us a load of the meat, we marched for the camp, the smoke of which was in view. We arrived at the camp to the great joy of our brave lads, who immediately feasted sumptuously. After our repast, I sent for the lad who had presumed to speak discontentedly in the course of the day, and addressed him to the following effect: 'Brown, you this day presumed to make use of language which was seditious and mutinous; I then passed it over, pitying your situation, and attributing it to your distress, rather than to your own inclination to sow discontent amongst the party. Had I reserved provisions for ourselves, whilst you were starving; had we been marching along light and at our ease, whilst you were weighed down with your burden, then you would have had some pretext for your observations; but when we were equally hungry, weary, emaciated, and charged with burden, which I believe my natural strength is less able to bear than any man's in the party; when we were always foremost in breaking the road, reconnoitering, and the fatigues of the chase, it was the height of ingratitude in you to let an expression escape which was indicative of discontent, your ready compliance and firm perseverance I had reason to expect, as the leader of men, and and my companions in miseries and dangers. But your duty as a soldier demanded your obedience to your officer, and a prohibition of such language, which for this time, I will pardon, but assure you, should it ever be repeated, I will revenge your ingratitude and punish your disobedience by instant death. I take this opportunity, likewise, to assure you, soldiers, of my thanks for the obedience, perseverance, and ready contempt of every danger which you have generally evinced; I assure you, nothing shall be wanting on my part to procure you the rewards of our government, and gratitude of your countrymen.'

"They all appeared very much affected, and retired with assurances of perseverance in duty."

Amidst these distresses, after a three months' winters' march, they explored their way to what they supposed to be the Red River. Here they were met by a party of Spanish cavalry, by whom Pike was informed, to his great astonishment, that they were not on the Red River, but on the Rio del Norte, and in the Spanish territory. All opposition to this force would have been idle, and he reluctantly submitted to accompany the Spaniards to Santa Fe, to appear before the governor. Though, to his great mortification, his expedition was thus broken off, all hardship was now at an end. He was treated on the road with great respect and hospitality, though watched and guarded with much jealousy; but he still insisted on wearing his sword, and that his men should retain their arms. Indeed, it was his resolution, had he or any of his people been ill used, to surprise the guard, carry off their horses, and make the best of their way to Apaches.

When he arrived at Santa Fe, his whole dress was a blanket-coat, blue trowsers, mocasons, and a scarlet cloth cap lined with a fox skin; his men were in leather coats with leggings, &c. and not a hat in the whole party. But he appeared before the governor with his usual spirit, and insisted on being treated with the respect due to an American officer. From Santa Fe he was sent to the capital of the province of Biscay, to be examined by the commandant general, where he was well received and entertained for some time, after which he was sent on his way home, under the escort of a strong party of horse. He arrived with his little band at Natchitoches on the 1st of July, 1807.

The most vexatious circumstance attending this unexpected sequel to his expedition was the seizure of all his papers, except his private journal, by the Spanish government. He had been fitted out with a complete set of mathematical and astronomical instruments, and had made frequent and accurate observations. He had thus ascertained the geographical situation of the most important points with much precision, and had collected materials for an accurate map of a great part of the country which he traversed. The seizure of these papers is a real loss to the cause of science. It is, however, in perfect conformity to that narrow and purblind policy which the old Spanish government uniformly manifested in the administration of its colonies.

Pike, upon his return, received the thanks of the government; a committee of the house of representatives expressed their high sense of his "zeal, perseverance, and intelligence," and the administration, much to its honour, bestowed upon him a more solid testimony of approbation, by a rapid promotion in the army. He was immediately appointed captain, shortly after a major, and upon the further enlargement of the army in 1810, a colonel of infantry.

During the intervals of his military duties, he prepared for the press a narrative of his two expeditions, accompanied by several valuable original maps and charts. This was published in 8vo. in 1810. The work is rather overloaded with unnecessary detail, and the language is careless and often inaccurate; the last fault is, however, in a great measure to be attributed to several disadvantageous circumstances under which the work went to press, while the author was at a distance, engaged in public service. Still it is sufficiently evident that the volume is not the composition of a scholar. But it bears the strongest marks of an acute, active, busy mind, unaccustomed to scientific arrangement or speculation, but filled with a variety of knowledge, all of a useful, practical, kind. Though entirely unacquainted with botany, zoölogy, and mineralogy, as sciences, Pike had a liberal curiosity, which taught him to look upon every object with the eye of an observer, and to despise no sort of knowledge, though he might not himself perceive its immediate utility. Above all, the narrative has that unstudied air of truth which is so apt to evaporate away in the processes of the book-making traveller; it retains all the clearness and freshness of first impressions, and we are never for a moment left in doubt whether or no the writer and the traveller are the same person.

Immediately after the declaration of war, Pike was stationed with his regiment upon the northern frontier, and upon the commencement of the campaign of 1813, was appointed a brigadier general.

There was a tincture of enthusiasm in Pike's character which communicated itself to his whole conduct: in whatsoever pursuit he engaged, he entered upon it with his whole soul. But the profession of arms had been always his favourite study—his "life's employment, and his leisure's charm." Having served through every gradation of rank, almost from a private, up to a general, and very often employed in separate and independent commands, he was intimately acquainted with all the minutiae of discipline. The veteran of a peace establishment is too apt, from the want of greater objects, to narrow his mind down to the little details of a military life, until, at length, every trifle swells up into ideal importance, and the cut of a coat or the tying of a neckcloth, seems big with the fate of nations. Pike was extremely attentive to all the particulars, even to the most minute points, of discipline and dress, yet he gave them their due importance, and no more. He did not degrade the soldier into a mere living machine, and while he kept up the strictest discipline, he laboured to make his men feel that this severity arose not from caprice or ill temper, but from principle, and that it had for its sole object their own glory, their ease, their health, and safety. Careless of popularity, and negligent of the arts by which good will is often conciliated where there is no real esteem, by the unassuming simplicity and frankness of his manners, and the undeviating honour of his conduct, he bound to himself the hearts of all around him with the strong ties of respect and affection.

Thus self-formed, and thus situated, the eyes of the army, were anxiously cast towards him as the chosen champion who was to redeem their reputation from that disgrace with which it had been stained by a long series of disasters. The day for which his heart had long panted at length arrived—a bright day of glory for the hero of gloom and sorrow to his country. He was selected for the command of the land forces in an expedition against York, the capital of Upper Canada, and on the 25th of April sailed from Sackett's Harbour in the squadron commanded by Commodore Chauncey. The day before the expedition sailed, he wrote a letter to his father, which contains these prophetic words:

"I embark to-morrow in the fleet at Sackett's Harbour, at the head of a column of 4,500 choice troops, on a secret expedition,

If success attends my steps, honour and glory await my name; if defeat, still shall it be said that we died like brave men, and conferred honour, even in death, on the American name.

"Should I be the happy mortal destined to turn the scale of war, will you not rejoice, O my father? May Heaven be propitious, and smile on the cause of my country! But if we are destined to fall, may my fall be like Wolfe's—to sleep in the arms of victory."

On the 27th of April General Pike arrived at York, with about seventeen hundred chosen men, and immediately prepared to land. The spot which was selected for landing, was the site of an old French fort called Toronto, of which scarcely any vestiges now remain. The plan of attack was formed by General Pike himself, and clearly and minutely detailed in his general orders, which were directed to be read at the head of every corps; every field officer was also directed to carry a copy of them in order that he might at any moment refer to them, and give explanations to his subordinates. Every thing was arranged, and every probable exigency provided for, with admirable method and precision.

There is one paragraph of these orders which breathes so much of his own spirit, that I cannot forbear from extracting it. It is deeply stamped with that unity of character which was visible throughout all his actions, and which is, in truth, one of the strongest marks of a powerful and original mind.

"No man will load until ordered, except the light troops in front, until within a short distance of the enemy, and then charge bayonets; thus letting the enemy see that we can meet them with their own weapons. Any man firing or quitting his post without orders must be put to instant death, as an example may be necessary. Platoon officers will pay the greatest attention to the coolness and aim of their men in the fire; their regularity and dressing in the charge. The field officers will watch over the conduct of the whole. Courage and bravery in the field do not more distinguish the soldier than humanity after victory; and whatever examples the savage allies of our enemies may have given us the general confidently hopes, that the blood of an unresisting or yielding enemy will never stain the weapons of the soldiers of his column. Property must be held sacred; and any soldier who shall so far neglect the honour of his profession as to be guilty of plundering the inhabitants shall, if convicted, be punished with death. But the commanding general assures the troops, that should they capture a large quantity of public stores, he will use his best endeavours to procure them a reward from his government."

As soon as the debarkation commenced, a body of British grenadiers was paraded on the shore, and the Glengary Fencibles, a local force which had been disciplined with great care, and has repeatedly proved itself fully equal to any regular force, appeared at another point. Large bodies of Indians were also seen in different directions, while others filled the woods which skirted the shore. General Sheaffe commanded in person.

Forsythe's riflemen were first to land, which they effected under a heavy fire of musketry and rifles from the Indians and British. As soon as the fire from the shore commenced, Major Forsythe had ordered his men to rest a few moments upon their oars, and return the fire. At this moment Pike was standing upon the deck of his ship. He saw the pause of his first division, and, impatient at the delay, exclaimed, "I can stay here no longer, come, jump into the boat;" and, springing into it, followed by his staff, was immediately rowed into the thickest of the fire.

The infantry had followed the riflemen, and formed in platoons as soon as they reached the shore. General Pike took the command of the first platoon which he reached, and ordered the whole to prepare for a charge. They mounted the bank, and the enemy, after a short conflict, broke at once, and fled in disorder towards the works. At that moment the sound of Forsythe's bugles was heard, announcing his success at another point. Its effect upon the Indians was almost electrical; they gave a horrible yell, and fled in every direction.

The whole force, being now landed and collected, was again formed and led on by General Pike in person to attack the enemy's works. They advanced through the woods, and after carrying one battery by assault, in the most gallant manner, moved on in columns towards the main work. The fire of the enemy was soon silenced by our artillery, and a flag of surrender was expected, when a terrible explosion suddenly took place from the British magazine, which had been previously prepared for this purpose. Pike, after aiding in removing a wounded man with his own hands, had sat down on the stump of a tree with a British serjeant, who had been taken, and was employed with Captain Nicholson and one of his aids in examining the prisoner. The explosion was tremendous; an immense quantity of large stones were thrown in every direction with terrible force, and scattered destruction and confusion around among our troops. The general, his aid, Captain Nicholson, and the prisoner, fell together, all, except the aid, mortally wounded. General Pike had been struck on the breast by a heavy stone. Shortly after he received the blow, he said to his wounded aid, "I am mortally wounded—write to my friend D—; and tell him what you know of the battle, and to comfort my—." In the same broken manner, he afterwards added several other requests relating to his private affairs.

The troops were instantly formed again; as a body of them passed by their wounded general, he said, "Push on, brave fellows, and avenge your general." While the surgeons were carrying him out of the field, a tumultuous huzza was heard from our troops; Pike turned his head with an anxious look of enquiry; he was told by a sergeant, "The British union jack is coming down, general—the stars are going up." He heaved a heavy sigh, and smiled. He was then carried on board the commodore's ship, where he lingered for a few hours. Just before he breathed his last, the British standard was brought to him; he made a sign to have it placed under his head, and expired without a groan.

The death of General Pike, at such a period, was a great public misfortune; his countrymen did not know half the extent of their loss. Pike was plain and unimposing in his appearance and manners, and to the world seemed little more than an active and intelligent soldier; but it is not easy to say what height of military excellence may not have been reached by a mind like his, stimulated by high-soaring ambition, braced up by principle to habitual dignity of thought, and constantly expanding its views, enlarging its resources, and unfolding its powers, by its own native and unwearied energy.

Gallant spirit! It was thine to wash out with thy life-blood the foul remembrance of our country's shame—of those disgraces which had blasted her honour, and tarnished the ancient glories of her arms. It was thine, in life, in death, to give to your companions in arms a great example of chivalrous honour and heroic courage;—it was thine to lead them to the threshold of the temple of fame, and bid them enter on a long career of glory.

Gallant spirit! Thy country will not forget thee—thou shalt have a noble memory. When a grateful nation confers upon the heroes of Niagara and Erie the laurels they have so nobly earned, she will bid them remember that those laurels were first gathered on the shores of York, and were watered by the blood of a hero; and hereafter, when our children and children's children shall read the story of patriots and heroes who have greatly fallen in the arms of victory, when their eyes glisten, and their young hearts throb wildly at the kindling theme, they will close the volume which tells of Epaminondas, of Sydney, or of Wolfe, and proudly exclaim, "And we, too, had our Montgomery and our Pike." V.

Captain David Porter.

From the Same.

DAVID PORTER, the eldest son of Captain David Porter, was born in Boston on the 1st February, 1780. His father was an officer in our navy during the revolutionary war, and distinguished himself on various occasions by his activity, enterprise, and daring spirit. Being necessarily absent from home for the greater part of his time, the charge of his infant family devolved almost entirely on his wife. She was a pious and intelligent woman; the friend and instructor of her children, teaching them not merely by her precepts, but by her amiable and virtuous example.

Soon after the conclusion of the war, Captain Porter removed with his household to Baltimore, where he took command of the revenue cutter the Active. Here in the bosom of his family he would indulge in the veteran's foible of recounting past scenes of peril and adventure, and talking over the wonders and vicissitudes that chequer a sea-faring life. Little David would sit for hours and listen and kindle at these marvellous tales, while his father, perceiving his own love of enterprise springing up in the bosom of the lad, took every means to cherish it, and to inspire him with a passion for the sea. He at the same time gave him all the education and instruction that his limited means afforded, and being afterwards in command of a vessel in the West-India trade, proposed to take him a voyage by way of initiating him into the life of a sailor. The constitution of the latter being feeble and delicate excited all the apprehensions of a tender mother, who remonstrated with maternal solicitude, against exposing the puny stripling to the dangers and hardships of so rude a life. Her objections, however, were either obviated or overruled, and at the age of sixteen he sailed with his father for the West-Indies, in the schooner Eliza. While at the port of Jeremie, in the island of St. Domingo, a pressgang endeavoured to board the vessel in search for men: they were bravely repelled with the loss of several killed and wounded on both sides; one man was shot down close by the side of young Porter. This affair excited considerable attention at the time. A narrative of it appeared in the public papers, and much praise was given to Captain Porter for the gallant vindication of his flag.

In the course of his second voyage, which he performed as mate of a ship, from Baltimore to St. Domingo, young Porter had a further taste of the vicissitudes of a sailor's life. He was twice impressed by the British, and each time effected his escape, but was so reduced in purse as to be obliged to work his passage home in the winter season, destitute of necessary clothing. In this forlorn condition he had to perform duty on a cold and stormy coast, where every spray was converted instantaneously into a sheet of ice. It would appear almost incredible that his feeble frame, little inured to hardship, could have sustained so much, were it not known how greatly the exertions of the body are supported by mental excitement.

Scarcely had he recovered from his late fatigues when he applied for admission into the navy; and on receiving a midshipman's warrant, immediately joined the frigate Constellation, Commodore Truxton. In the action with the French frigate the Insurgent, Porter was stationed in the foretop, and distinguished himself by his good conduct. Want of friends alone prevented his promotion at the time. When Commodore Barron was appointed to the command of the Constellation, Porter was advanced to the rank of lieutenant solely on account of his merit, having no friends or connexions capable of urging his fortunes. He was ordered to join the United States' schooner Experiment under Captain Maley, to be employed on the West-India station. During the cruise they had a long and obstinate engagement with a number of brigand barges in the Bite of Leogan, which afforded him another opportunity of bringing himself into notice. He was also frequently employed in boat expeditions to cut out vessels, in which he displayed much coolness and address. Commodore Talbot, who commanded on that station, gave him charge of the Amphitrite, a small pilot boat prize schooner mounting five small swivels taken from the tops of the Constellation, and manned with fifteen hands. Not long after taking this command he fell in with a French privateer mounting a long twelve pounder and several swivels, having a crew of forty men, and accompanied by a prize ship and a large barge with thirty men armed with swivels. Notwithstanding the great disparity of force, Porter ordered his vessel to be laid alongside the privateer. The contest was arduous, and for some time doubtful, for in the commencement of the action he lost his rudder, which rendered the schooner unmanageable. The event, however, excused the desperateness of the attack, for after an obstinate and bloody resistance the privateer surrendered with the loss of seven killed and fifteen wounded. Not a man of Porter's crew was killed; several, however, were wounded, and his vessel was much injured. The prize was also taken, but the barge escaped. The conduct of Lieutenant Porter in this gallant little affair was highly applauded by his commander.

Shortly after his return to the United States he sailed, as first lieutenant, in the Experiment, commanded by Capt. Charles Stewart. They were again stationed in the West Indies, and afforded great protection to the American commerce in that quarter. They had several engagements with French privateers, and were always successful, insomuch that they became the terror of those marauders of the ocean, and effectually controlled their rapacity and kept them quiet in port. The gallant and lamented Trippe was second lieutenant of the Experiment at the time.

When the first squadron was ordered for the Mediterranean, Porter sailed as first lieutenant of the schooner Enterprise, Captain Stewart. In this cruise they encountered a Tripolitan corsair of very superior force; a severe battle ensued in which the enemy suffered great slaughter, and was compelled to surrender, while our ship received but little injury. In this brilliant action Porter acquired much reputation from the conspicuous part he acted. He afterwards served on board of different ships in the Mediterranean station, and distinguished himself by his intrepidity and zeal whenever an opportunity presented. On one occasion he commanded an expedition of boats sent to destroy some vessels laden with wheat, at anchor in the harbour of old Tripoli; the service was promptly and effectually performed; in the engagement he received a musket ball through his left thigh.

Shortly after recovering from his wound he was transposed from the New York to the Philadelphia, Capt. Bainbridge as first lieutenant. The frigate was then lying at Gibraltar, when he joined her in September, 1803. She soon after sailed for the blockade of Tripoli. No event took place worthy of mention until the 31st of October. Nearly a week previous to this ill-fated day, the weather had been tempestuous, which rendered it prudent to keep the ship off the land. The 31st opened with all the splendour of a Sicilian morning; the promise of a more delightful day never appeared. The land was just observed, when a sail was descried making for the harbour, with a pleasant easterly breeze. It was soon ascertained to be an armed ship of the enemy, and all sail was set in chase. After an ineffectual pursuit of several leagues, Captain Bainbridge had just given orders to hale off, when the frigate grounded. Every expedient that skill or courage could devise to float or defend her, was successively resorted to, but in vain. The particulars of this unfortunate affair are too generally known to need a minute recital; it is sufficient to add that this noble ship and her gallant crew were surrendered to a barbarous and dastardly enemy, whose only motive in warfare is the hope of plunder. Throughout the long and dreary confinement, which ensued, in the dungeons of Tripoli, Porter never suffered himself for a moment to sink into despondency; but supported the galling indignities and hardships of his situation with equanimity and even cheerfulness. A seasonable supply of Books served to beguile the hours of imprisonment, and enabled him even to turn them to advantage. He closely applied himself to the study of ancient and modern history, biography, the French language, and drawing; in which art, so useful to a seaman, he has made a considerable proficient. He also sedulously cultivated the theory of his profession, and improved the junior officers by his frequent instructions; representing the manœuvres of fleets in battle by means of small boards ingeniously arranged. He was active in promoting any plan of labour or amusement that could ameliorate the situation or dispel the gloomy reflections of his companions. By these means captivity was robbed of its heaviest evils, that dull monotony that wearies the spirits, and that mental inactivity that engenders melancholy and hypochondria.

An incident which occurred during his confinement deserves to be mentioned as being highly creditable to Lieutenant Porter. Under the rooms occupied by the officers was a long dark passage, through which the American sailors, who were employed in public labour, frequently passed to different parts of the castle. Their conversation being repeatedly heard as they passed to and fro, some one made a small hole in the wall to communicate with them. For some days a constant intercourse was kept up, by sending down notes tied to a string. Some persons, however, indiscreetly entering into conversation with the seamen, were overheard, and information immediately carried to the Bashaw. In a few minutes the bolts of the prison door were heard to fly back with unwonted violence, and Sassi (chief officer of the castle) rushed furiously in. His features were distorted, and his voice almost inarticulate with passion. He demanded in a vehement tone of voice by whom or whose authority the wall had been opened; when Porter advanced with a firm step and composed countenance, and replied, "I alone am responsible." He was abruptly and rudely hurried from the prison, and the gates were again closed. This generous self-devotion, while it commanded the admiration of his companions, heightened their anxiety for his fate; apprehending some act of violence from the impetuous temper and absolute power of the Bashaw. Their fears, however, were appeased by the return of Porter, after considerable detention; having been dismissed without any further severity through the intercession of the minister Mahomet Dghies, who had on previous occasions shown a friendly disposition towards the prisoners.

It is unnecessary here to dwell on the various incidents that occurred in this tedious captivity, of and the many ingenious and adventurous plans of escape, devised and attempted by our officers, in all which Porter took an active and prominent part. When peace was at length made, and they were restored to light and liberty, he embarked with his companions for Syracuse, where a court of enquiry was held on the loss of the Philadelphia. After an honorable acquittal he was appointed to the command of the United States Brig Enterprise, and soon after he was ordered by Commodore Rodgers to proceed to Tripoli, with permission to cruise along the shore of Bengazi, and to visit the ruins of Leptis Magna, anciently a Roman colony. He was accompanied in this expedition by some of his friends, and after a short and pleasant passage, anchored near the latter place. They passed three days in wandering among the mouldering remains of Roman taste and grandeur; and excavated in such places as seemed to promise a reward for their researches. A number of ancient coins and cameos were found, and among other curiosities, were two statues in tolerable preservation: the one a warrior, the other a female figure, of beautiful white marble, and excellent workmanship. Verde antique pillars, of large size, formed of a single piece, and unbroken, were scattered along the shores. Near the harbor stood a lofty and elegant building of which Lieutenant Porter took a drawing: from its situation and form it was supposed to have been a Pharos. The awning under which the party dined was spread on the site, and among the fallen columns of a temple of Jupiter, and a zest was given to the repast, by the classical ideas awakened by surrounding objects.

While in command of the Enterprise, and at anchor in the port of Malta, an English sailor came alongside and insulted the officers and crew by abusive language; Captain Porter overhearing the scurrilous epithets he vociferated ordered a boat-swain's mate to seize him and give him a flogging at the gangway. This well merited chastisement excited the indignation of the Governor of Malta, who considered it a daring outrage, and gave orders that the forts should not permit the Enterprise to depart. No sooner was Captain Porter informed of it, than he got his vessel ready for action, weighed anchor, and with lighted matches and every man at his station, with the avowed determination of firing upon the town if attacked, sailed between the batteries and departed unmolested.

Shortly after this occurrence, in passing through the Straits of Gibraltar, he was attacked by twelve Spanish gun-boats, who either mistook, or pretended to mistake his vessel for a British brig. The calmness of the weather, the weight of their metal, and the acknowledged accuracy of their aim, made the odds greatly against him. As soon, however, as he was able to near them, they were assailed with such rapid and well directed volleys as quickly compelled them to shear off. This affair took place in sight of Gibraltar, and in presence of several ships of the British navy; it was, therefore, a matter of notoriety, and spoken of in terms of the highest applause.

After an absence of five years passed in unremitted and arduous service, Captain Porter returned to the United States, and shortly after was married to Miss Anderson, daughter of the member of Congress of that name from Pennsylvania. Being appointed to the command of the Atollia, on the New Orleans station, he discharged, with faithfulness and activity, the irksome duty of enforcing the embargo and non-intercourse laws. He likewise performed an important service to his country, by ferreting out and capturing a pirate, a native of France, who, in a small well-armed schooner, had for some time infested the Chesapeake: and who, growing bolder by impunity, had committed many acts of depredations, until his maraudings became so serious as to attract the attention of government.

While commanding on the Orleans station; the father of Captain Porter died, an officer under his command. He had lived to see the wish of his heart fulfilled, in beholding his son a skilful and enterprising sailor, rising rapidly in his profession and in the estimation of his country.

The climate of New Orleans disagreeing with the health of Captain Porter and his family, he solicited to be ordered to some other station, and was, accordingly, appointed to the command of the Essex frigate, at Norfolk.

At the time of the declaration of war against England, the Essex was undergoing repairs at New York, and the celerity with which she was fitted for sea reflected great credit on her commander. On the 3d of July, 1812, he sailed from Sandy Hook on a cruise, which was not marked by any incident of consequence, excepting the capture of the British sloop of war Alert, Captain Laugharne. Either undervaluing the untried prowess of our tars, or mistaking the force of the Essex, she ran down on her weather quarter, gave three cheers and commenced an action. In a few minutes she struck her colors, being cut to pieces, with three men wounded; and seven feet water in her hold. To relieve himself from the great number of prisoners, taken in this and former prizes, Captain Porter made a cartel of the Alert, with orders to proceed to St. Johns, Newfoundland, and thence to New York. She arrived safe, being the first ship of war taken from the enemy, and her flag the first British flag sent to the seat of government during the present war.

Having returned to the United States and refitted, he again proceeded to sea, from the Delaware, on the 27th of October, 1812, and repaired agreeably to instructions from Commodore Bainbridge, to the coast of Brazil, where different places of rendezvous had been arranged between them. In the course of his cruise on this coast, he captured his Britannic majesty's packet Nocton, and after taking out of her about 44,000 pounds sterling in specie, ordered her for America. Hearing of Commodore Bainbridge's victorious action with the Java, which would oblige him to return to port, and of the capture of the Hornet by the Montague, and learning that there was a considerable augmentation of British force on the coast, and several ships in pursuit of him, he abandoned his hazardous cruising ground, and stretched away to the southward, scouring the coast as far as Rio de la Plata. From thence he shaped his course for the Pacific Ocean, and, after suffering greatly from want of provisions, and heavy gales off Cape Horn, arrived at Valparaiso, on the 14th of March, 1843. Having victualled his ship, he ran down the coast of Chili and Peru, and fell in with a Peruvian corsair, having on board twenty-four Americans as prisoners, the crews of two whaling ships, which she had taken on the coast of Chili. The Peruvian captain justified his conduct on the plea of being an ally of Great Britain, and the expectation likewise of a speedy war between Spain and the United States. Finding him resolved to persist in similar aggressions, Captain Porter threw all his guns and ammunition into the sea, liberated the Americans, and wrote a respectful letter to the viceroy explaining his reasons for so doing, which he delivered to the captain. He then proceeded to Lima, and luckily recaptured one of the American vessels as she was entering the port.

After this he cruised for several months in the Pacific, inflicting immense injury on the British commerce in those waters. He was particularly destructive to the shipping employed in the spermaceti whale fishery. A great number with valuable cargoes were captured; two were given up to the prisoners; three sent to Valparaiso and laid up; three sent to America; one of them he retained as a store ship, and another he equipped with twenty guns, called her the Essex junior, and gave the command of her to Lieutenant Downes. Most of these ships mounted several guns, and had numerous crews; and as several of them were captured by boats or by prizes, the officers and men of the Essex had frequent opportunities of showing their skill and courage, and of acquiring experience and confidence in naval conflict.

Having now a little squadron under his command, Captain Porter became a complete terror in those seas. As his numerous prizes supplied him abundantly with provisions, clothing, medicine, and naval stores of every description, he was enabled for a long time to keep the sea, without sickness or inconvenience to his crew; living entirely on the enemy, and being enabled to make considerable advances of pay to his officers and crew without drawing on government. The unexampled devastation achieved by his daring enterprises, not only spread alarm throughout the ports of the Pacific, but even occasioned great uneasiness in Great Britain. The merchants who had any property afloat in this quarter, trembled with apprehensions for its fate; the underwriters groaned at the catalogue of captures brought by every advice, while the pride of the nation was sorely incensed at beholding a single frigate lording it over the Pacific, roving about the ocean in saucy defiance of their thousand ships; revelling in the spoils of boundless wealth, and almost banishing the British flag from those regions, where it had so long waved proudly predominant.

Numerous ships were sent out to the Pacific in pursuit of him; others were ordered to cruise in the China seas, off New Zealand, Timor and New Holland, and a frigate sent to the River La Plata. The manner in which Captain Porter cruised, however, completely baffled pursuit. Keeping in the open seas, or lurking among the numerous barren and desolate islands that form the Gallipagos groupe, and never touching on the American coast, he left no traces by which he could be followed; rumour, while it magnified his exploits, threw his pursuers at fault; they were distracted by vague accounts of captures made at different places, and of frigates supposed to be the Essex hovering at the same time off different coasts and haunting different islands.

In the mean while Porter though wrapped in mystery and uncertainty himself, yet received frequent and accurate accounts of his enemies, from the various prizes which he had taken. Lieutenant Downes, also, who had convoyed the prizes to Valparaiso, on his return, brought advices of the expected arrival of Commodore Hillyar in the Phœbe frigate rating thirty-six guns accompanied by two sloops of war. Glutted with spoil and havoc, and sated with the easy and inglorious captures of merchantmen, Captain Porter now felt eager for an opportunity to meet the enemy on equal terms, and to signalize his cruise by some brilliant achievement. Having been nearly a year at sea, he found that his ship would require some repairs, to enable her to face the foe; he repaired, therefore, accompanied by several of his prizes, to the Island of Nooaheevah, one of the Wasington groupe, discovered by a Captain Ingraham of Boston. Here he landed, took formal possession of the island in the name of the government of the United States, and gave it the name of Madison's Island. He found it large, populous and fertile, abounding with the necessities of life; the natives in the vicinity of the harbour which he had chosen received him in the most friendly manner, and supplied him with abundance of provisions. During his stay at this place he had several encounters with some hostile tribes on the island, whom he succeeded in reducing to subjection. Having calked and completely overhauled the ship, made for her a new set of water casks, and taken on board from the prizes provisions and stores for upwards of four months, he sailed for the coast of Chili on the 12th December, 1813. Previous to sailing he secured the three prizes which had accompanied him, under the guns of a battery erected for their protection, and left them in charge of Lieutenant Gamble of the marines and twenty-one men, with orders to proceed to Valparaiso after a certain period.

After cruising on the coast of Chili without success, he proceeded to Valparaiso, in hopes of falling in with Commodore Hillyar, or, if disappointed in this wish, of capturing some merchant ships said to be expected from England. While at anchor at this port Commodore Hillyar arrived, having long been searching in vain for the Essex, and almost despairing of ever meeting with her. Contrary to the expectations of Captain Porter, however, Commodore Hillyar, beside his own frigate, superior in itself to the Essex, was accompanied by the Cherub sloop of war, strongly armed and manned. These ships, having been sent out expressly to seek for the Essex, were in prime order and equipment, with picked crews, and hoisted flags bearing the motto "God and country, British sailors' best rights: traitors offend both." This was in opposition to Porter's motto of "Free trade and sailors' rights," and the latter part of it suggested doubtless, by error industriously cherished, that our crews are chiefly composed of English seamen. In reply to this motto Porter hoisted at his mizen, "God, our country, and liberty: tyrants offend them." On entering the harbour the Phœbe fell foul of the Essex in such manner as to lay her at the mercy of Captain Porter; out of respect, however, to the neutrality of the port, he did not take advantage of her exposed situation. This forbearance was afterwards acknowledged by Commodore Hillyar, and he passed his word of honour to observe like conduct while they remained in port. They continued therefore, while in harbour and on shore, in the mutual exchange of courtesies and kind offices that should characterize the private intercourse between civilized and generous enemies. And the crews of the respective ships often mingled together and passed nautical jokes and pleasantries from one to the other.

On getting their provisions on board the Phœbe and Cherub went off the port, where they cruised for six weeks, rigorously blockading Captain Porter. Their united force amounted to 81 guns and 500 men, in addition to which they took on board the crew of an English letter of marque lying in port. The force of the Essex consisted of but 46 guns, all of which, excepting six long twelves, were 32 pound carronades, only serviceable in close fighting. Her crew, having been much reduced by the manning of prizes, amounting to but 255 men. The Essex junior being only intended as a storeship, mounted ten 18 pound carronades and ten short sixes with a complement of only 60 men.

This vast superiority of force on the part of the enemy prevented all chance of encounter, on any thing like equal terms, unless by express covenant between the commanders. Captain Porter, therefore, endeavoured repeatedly to provoke a challenge, (the inferiority of his frigate to the Phœbe not justifying him in making the challenge himself,) but without effect. He tried frequently also to bring the Phœbe into single action; but this Commodore Hillyar warily avoided, and always kept his ships so close together as to frustrate Captain Porter's attempts. This conduct of Commodore Hillyar has been sneered at by many, as unworthy a brave officer; but it should be considered that he had more important objects to effect than the mere exhibition of individual or national prowess. His instructions were to crush a noxious foe, destructive to the commerce of his country; he was furnished with a force competent to this duty; and having the enemy once within his power, he had no right to wave his superiority, and by meeting him on equal footing, give him a chance to conquer, and continue his work of destruction.

Finding it impossible to bring the enemy to equal combat; and fearing the arrival of additional force, which he understood was on the way, Captain Porter determined to put to sea the first opportunity that should present. A rendezvous was accordingly appointed for the Essex junior, and having ascertained by repeated trials that the Essex was a superior sailer to either of the blockading ships, it was agreed that she should let the enemy chase her off; thereby giving the Essex junior an opportunity of escaping.

On the next day, the 28th March, the wind came on to blow fresh from the southward, and the Essex parted her larboard cable and dragged her starboard anchor directly out to sea. Not a moment was lost in getting sail on the ship; but perceiving that the enemy was close in with the point forming the west side of the bay, and that there was a possibility of passing to windward, and escaping to sea by superior sailing, Captain Porter resolved to hazard the attempt. He accordingly took in his top gallant sails and braced up for the purpose, but most unfortunately on rounding the point a heavy squall struck the ship and carried away her main top mast, precipitating the men who were aloft into the sea, who were drowned. Both ships now gave chase, and the crippled state of his ship left Porter no alternative but to endeavour to regain the port. Finding it impossible to get back to the common anchorage, he ran close into a small bay about three quarters of a mile to leeward of the battery, on the east of the harbour, and let go his anchor within pistol shot of the shore. Supposing the enemy would, as formerly, respect the neutrality of the place, he considered himself secure, and thought only of repairing the damages he had sustained. The wary and menacing approach of the hostile ships, however, displaying their motto flags and having jacks at all their masts' heads, soon showed him the real danger of his situation. With all possible despatch he got his ship ready for action, and endeavoured to get a spring on his cable, but had not succeeded, when, at 54 minutes past 3 P. M. the enemy commenced the attack.

At first the Phoebe lay herself under his stern and the Cherub on his starboard bow; but the latter soon finding herself exposed to a hot fire, bore up and ran under his stern also, where both ships kept up a severe and raking fire. Captain Porter succeeded three different times in getting springs on his cables, for the purpose of bringing his broadside to bear on the enemy, but they were as often shot away by the excessive fire to which he was exposed.

He was obliged, therefore, to rely for defence against this tremendous attack merely on three long twelve pounders, which he had run out of the stern ports; and which were worked with such bravery and skill as in half an hour to do great injury to both the enemy's ships and induce them to hale off and repair damages. It was evidently the intention of Commodore Hillyar to risk nothing from the daring courage of his antagonist, but to the Essex at as cheap a rate as possible. All his manœuvres were deliberate and wary; he saw his antagonist completely at his mercy, and prepared to cut him up in the safest and surest manner. In the mean time the situation of the Essex was galling and provoking in the extreme; crippled and shattered, with many killed and wounded, she lay awaiting the convenience of the enemy, to renew the scene of slaughter, with scarce a hope of escape or revenge. Her brave crew, however, in place of being disheartened, were aroused to desperation, and by hoisting ensigns in their rigging and jacks in different parts of the ship, evinced their defiance and determination to hold out to the last.

The enemy having repaired his damages, now placed himself with both his ships on the starboard quarter of the Essex, out of reach of her carronades, and where her stern guns could not be brought to bear. Here he kept up a most destructive fire, which it was not in Captain Porter's power to return; the latter, therefore saw no hope of injuring him without getting under way and becoming the assailant. From the mangled state of his rigging he could set no other sail than the flying jib; this he caused to be hoisted, cut his cable, and ran down on both ships, with an intention of laying the Phoebe on board.

For a short time he was enabled to close with the enemy, and the firing on both sides was tremendous. The decks of the Essex were strewed with dead, and her cockpit filled with wounded; she had been several times on fire, and was in fact a perfect wreck; still a feeble hope sprung up that she might be saved, in consequence of the Cherub being compelled to hale off by her crippled state; she did not return to close action again, but kept up a distant firing with her long guns. The disabled state of the Essex, however, did not permit her to take advantage of this circumstance; for want of sail she was unable to keep at close quarters with the Phoebe, who, edging off, chose the distance which best suited her long guns, and kept up a tremendous fire, which made a dreadful havoc among our crew. Many of the guns of the Essex were rendered useless, and many had their whole crews destroyed: they were manned from those that were disabled, and one gun in particular was three times manned; fifteen men were slain at it in the course of the action, though the captain of it escaped with only a slight wound. Captain Porter now gave up all hope of closing with the enemy, but finding the wind favourable, determined to run his ship on shore, land the crew, and destroy her. He had approached within musket shot of the shore, and had every prospect of succeeding, when in an instant the wind shifted from the land and drove her down upon the Phœbe, exposing her again to a dreadful raking fire. The ship was now totally unmanageable; yet as her head was toward the enemy, and he to leeward, Captain Porter again perceived a faint hope of boarding. At this moment Lieutenant Downs of the Essex junior came on board to receive orders, expecting that Captain Porter would soon be a prisoner. His services could be of no avail in the deplorable state of the Essex, and finding from the enemy's putting his helm up, that the last attempt at boarding would not succeed, Captain Porter directed him, after he had been ten minutes on board, to return to his own ship, to be prepared for defending and destroying her in case of attack. He took with him several of the wounded, leaving three of his boat's crew on board to make room for them. The Cherub kept up a hot fire on him during his return. The slaughter on board of the Essex now became horrible, the enemy continued to rake her, while she was unable to bring a gun to bear in return. Still her commander, with an obstinacy that bordered on desperation, persisted in the unequal and almost hopeless conflict. Every expedient that a fertile and inventive mind could suggest was resorted to, in the forlorn hope that they might yet be enabled by some lucky chance to escape from the grasp of the foe. A hawser was bent to the sheet anchor, and the anchor cut from the bows, to bring the ship's head round. This succeeded; the broadside of the Essex was again brought to bear; and as the enemy was much crippled and unable to hold his own, Captain Porter thought she might drift out of gunshot before she discovered that he had anchored. The hawser, however, unfortunately parted, and with it failed the last lingering hope of the Essex. The ship had taken fire several times during the action, but at this moment her situation was awful. She was on fire both forward and aft; the flames were bursting up each hatchway; a large quantity of powder below exploded, and word was given that the fire was near the magazine. Thus surrounded by horrors, without any chance of saving the ship, Captain Porter turned his attention to rescuing as many of his brave companions as possible. Finding his distance from the shore did not exceed three quarters of a mile, he hoped many would be able to save themselves should the ship blow up. His boats had been cut to pieces by the enemies' shot, but he advised such as could swim to jump overboard and make for shore. Some reached it—some were taken by the enemy, and some perished in the attempt; but most of this loyal and gallant crew preferred sharing the fate of their ship and their commander.

Those who remained on board now endeavoured to extinguish the flames, and having succeeded, went again to the guns and kept up a firing for a few minutes; but the crew had by this time become so weakened that all further resistance was in vain. Captain Porter summoned a consultation of the officers of divisions, but was surprised to find only acting Lieutenant Stephen Deatur M-Knight remaining; of the others some had been killed, others knocked overboard, and others carried below disabled by severe wounds.—The accounts from every part of the ship were deplorable in the extreme; representing her in the most shattered and crippled condition, in imminent danger of sinking, and so crowded with the wounded that even the birth deck could contain no more, and many were killed while under the surgeon's hands. In the mean while the enemy, in consequence of the smoothness of the water and his secure distance, was enabled to keep up a deliberate and constant fire, aiming with coolness and certainty as if firing at a target, and hitting the hull at every shot. At length, utterly despairing of saving the ship, Captain Porter was compelled, at 20 minutes past 6 P. M. to give the painful order to strike the colours. It is probable that the enemy did not perceive that the ship had surrendered, for he continued firing; several men were killed and wounded in different parts of the ship, and Captain Porter thinking he intended to show no quarter, was about to rehoist his flag and to fight until he sunk, when the enemy desisted his attack ten minutes after the surrender.

The foregoing account of this battle is taken almost verbatim from the letter of Captain Porter to the secretary of the navy. Making every allowance for its being a partial statement, this must certainly have been one of the most sanguinary and obstinately contested actions on naval record. The loss of the Essex is a sufficient testimony of the desperate bravery with which she was defended. Out of 255 men which comprised her crew, fifty-eight were killed; thirty-nine wounded severely; twenty-seven slightly, and thirty-one missing, making in all 154. She was completely cut to pieces, and so covered with the dead and dying, with mangled limbs, with brains and blood, and all the ghastly images of pain and death, that the officer who came on board to take possession of her, though accustomed to scenes of slaughter, was struck with sickening horror, and fainted at the shocking spectacle.

Thousands of the inhabitants of Valparaiso were spectators of the battle, covering the neighboring heights: for it was fought so near the shore that some of the shot even struck among the citizens, who, in the eagerness of their curiosity, had ventured down upon the beach. Touched by the forlorn situation of the Essex, and filled with admiration at the unflagging spirit and persevering bravery of her commander and crew, a generous anxiety ran throughout the multitude for their fate: bursts of delight arose when, by any vicissitude of battle, or prompt expedient, a chance seemed to turn up in their favour; and the eager spectators were seen to wring their hands, and uttered groans of sympathy, when the transient hope was defeated, and the gallant little frigate once more became an unresisting object of deliberate slaughter.

It is needless to mention particularly the many instances of individual valour and magnanimity among both the officers and common sailors of the Essex: their general conduct bears ample testimony to their heroism; and it will hereafter be a sufficient distinction for any man to prove that he was present in that battle. Every action that we have fought at sea has gone to destroy some envious shade which the enemy has attempted to cast on our rising reputation. After the affair of the Argus and the Pelican, it was asserted that our sailors were brave only while successful and unhurt, but that the sight of slaughter filled them with dismay. In this battle it has been proved that they are capable of the highest exercise of courage—that of standing unmoved among incessant carnage, without being able to return a shot, and destitute of a hope of ultimate success.

Though, from the distance and positions which the enemy chose, this battle was chiefly fought on our part by six twelve pounders only, yet great damage was done to the assailing ships. Their masts and yards were badly crippled, their hulls much cut up; the Phœbe, especially, received 48 twelve pound shot below her water line, some three feet under water. Their loss in killed and wounded was not ascertained, but must have been severe; the first lieutenant of the Phœbe was killed, and Captain Tucker, of the Cherub, was severely wounded. It was with some difficulty that the Phœbe and the Essex could be kept afloat until they anchored the next morning in the port of Valparaiso.

Much indignation has been expressed against Commodore Hillyar for his violation of the laws of nations, and of his private agreement with Captain Porter, by attacking him in the neutral waters of Valparaiso; waiving all discussions of these points, it may barely be observed, that his cautious attack with a vastly superior force, on a crippled ship, which, relying on his forbearance, had placed herself in a most defenceless situation, and which for six weeks previous had offered him fair fight, on advantageous terms, though it may reflect great credit on his prudence, yet certainly furnishes no triumph to a brave and generous mind.—Aware, however, of that delicacy which ought to be observed towards the character even of an enemy, it is not the intention of the writer to assail that of Commodore Hillyar. Indeed, his conduct after the battle entitles him to high encomium; he showed the greatest humanity to the wounded, and, as Captain Porter acknowledges, endeavored as much as lay in his power to alleviate the distresses of war by the most generous and delicate deportment towards both the officers and crew, commanding that the property of every person should be respected. Captain Porter and his crew were paroled, and permitted to return to the United States in the Essex Junior, her armament being previously taken out. On arriving off the port of New York, they were overhauled by the Saturn razee, the authority of Com. Hillyar to grant a passport was questioned, and the Essex Junior detained. Captain Porter then told the boarding officer that he gave up his parole, and considered himself a prisoner of war, and as such should use all means to escape. In consequence of this threat the Essex Junior was ordered to remain all night under the lee of the Saturn, but the next morning Captain Porter put off in his boat, though thirty miles from shore; and, notwithstanding he was pursued by the Saturn, effected his escape, and landed safely on Long Island. His reception in the United States has been such as his great services and distinguished valor deserved. The various interesting and romantic rumors that had reached this country concerning him, during his cruise in the Pacific, had excited the curiosity of the public to see this modern Sinbad; on arriving in New-York his carriage was surrounded by the populace, who took out the horses, and dragged him, with shouts of acclamations, to his lodgings.

The length to which this article has already been extended, notwithstanding the brevity with which many interesting circumstances have been treated, forbids any further remarks on the character and services of Captain Porter. They are sufficiently illustrated in the foregoing summary of his eventful life, and particularly in the history of his last cruise, which was conducted with wonderful enterprise, fertility of expedient, consummate seamanship, and daring courage. In his single ship he has inflicted more injury on the commerce of the enemy than all the rest of the navy put together; not merely by actual devastation, but by the general insecurity and complete interruption which he occasioned to an extensive and invaluable branch of British trade. His last action, also, though it terminated in the loss of his frigate, can scarcely be considered as unfortunate, inasmuch as it has given a brilliancy to his own reputation, and wreathed fresh honors around the name of the American sailor.

Meriwether Lewis.

History of the Expedition under the command of Captains Lewis and Clarke, to the sources of the Missouri, &c. &c. Prepared for the press by Paul Allen, Esq. in two vols. 8vo. Phila. Fr.

This work, which simply consists of a faithful, minute, and comprehensive journal of the expedition of Lewis and Clarke "to the sources of the Missouri, thence across the Rocky Mountains, and down the river Columbia to the Pacific Ocean," performed by order of government in 1804, 5, 6, is an important work to our country. It has lately come from the press, and is to be found in most of our book-stores. The untimely death of Governor Lewis has prevented the world from receiving the history of the expedition in that perfect form which is so desirable; but the present work is probably the best substitute that will ever be published. Its value and the importance of the expedition will appear more manifest from the following interesting letter from Mr. Jefferson to Mr. Allen, containing as well the life of Governor Lewis, as the instructions to him and the views of the government in setting on foot the expedition. The letter will exalt the illustrious statesman and philosopher in the estimation of mankind. Our naval heroes will especially be gratified at the eulogium on their splendid deeds at the close of the letter. America will now see the egregious deception by which federal writers have attempted to circulate and establish a belief that Mr. Jefferson was hostile to commerce, as his instructions will shew that the expedition was instituted as much to promote the interest of commerce, as the arts, sciences, and happiness of the human race.

Life of Captain Lewis.

Monticello, August 13, 1813.

Sir,

In compliance with the request conveyed in your letter of May 25, I have endeavored to obtain from the relations and friends of the late Governor Lewis, information of such incidents of his life as might be not unacquirable to those who may read the narrative of his western discoveries. The ordinary occurrences of a private life, and those also while acting in a subordinate sphere in the army, in a time of peace, are not deemed sufficiently interesting to occupy the public attention; but a general account of his parentage, with such smaller incidents as marked his early character are briefly noted; and to these are added, as being peculiarly within my own knowledge, whatever related to the public mission, of which an account is now to be published. The result of my inquiries and recollections shall now be offered, to be enlarged or abridged as you may think best; or otherwise to be used with the materials you may have collected from other sources.

Meriwether Lewis, late governor of Louisiana, was born on the eighteenth of August, 1774, near the town of Charlottesville, in the county of Albemarle, in Virginia, of one of the distinguished families of that state. John Lewis, one of his father's uncles, was a member of the king's council, before the revolution. Another of them, Fiddling Lewis, married a sister of General Washington. His father, William Lewis, was the youngest of five sons of Colonel Robert Lewis of Albemarle, the fourth of whom, Charles, was one of the early patriots who stepped forward in the commencement of the revolution, and commanded one of the regiments first raised in Virginia, and placed on continental establishment. Happily situated at home, with a wife and young family, and fortune placing him at ease, he left all to aid in the liberation of his country from foreign usurpations, then first unmasking their ultimate end and aim. His good sense, integrity, bravery, enterprise, and amiable bodily powers, marked him as an officer of great promise; but he unfortunately died early in the revolution. Nicholas Lewis, the second of his father's brothers, commanded a regiment of militia in the successful expedition of 1776, against the Cherokee Indians: who, seduced by the agent of the British government to take up the hatchet against us, had committed great havoc on our southern frontier, by murdering and scalping helpless women and children, according to their cruel and cowardly principles of warfare. The chastisement they then received closed the history of their wars, and prepared them for receiving the elements of civilization, which, zealously inculcated by the present government of the United States, have rendered them an industrious, peaceable, and happy people. This member of the family of Lewis, whose bravery was so usefully proved on this occasion, was endeared to all who knew him by his inflexible probity, courteous disposition, benevolent heart, and engaging modesty and manners. He was the umpire of all the private differences of his county—selected always by both parties. He was also the guardian of Meriwether Lewis, of whom we are now to speak, and who had lost his father at an early age. He continued some years under the fostering care of a tender mother, of the respectable family of Meriwethers, of the same county; and was remarkable even in infancy for enterprise, boldness, and discretion. When only eight years of age he habitually went out, in the dead of night alone with his dogs, into the forest, to hunt the racoon and opossum, which, seeking their food in the night, can then only be taken. In this exercise no season or circumstance could obstruct his purpose—plunging through the winter's snows and frozen streams in pursuit of his object. At thirteen he was put to the Latin school, and continued at that until eighteen, when he returned to his mother, and entered on the cares of his farm; having, as well as a younger brother been left by his father with a competency for all the correct and comfortable purposes of a temperate life. His talent for observation which had led him to an accurate knowledge of the plants and animals of his own country, would have distinguished him as a farmer; but, at the age of twenty, yielding to the ardour of youth and a passion for more dazzling pursuits, he engaged as a volunteer in the body of militia which were called out by General Washington, on occasion of the discontents produced by the excessive taxes in the western parts of the United States; and from that situation he was removed to the regular service as a lieutenant in the line. At twenty-three he was promoted to a captaincy; and always attracting the first attention where punctuality and fidelity were requisite, he was appointed paymaster to his regiment. About this time a circumstance occurred, which, leading to the transaction which is the subject of this book, will justify a recurrence to its original idea. While I resided at Paris, John Ledyard, of Connecticut, arrived there, well known in the United States for energy of body and mind. He had accompanied Captain Cook on his voyage to the Pacific Ocean; and distinguished himself on that voyage by his intrepidity. Being of a roaming disposition, he was now panting for some new enterprise. His immediate object at Paris was to engage a mercantile company in the trade of the western coast of America, in which, however, he failed. I then proposed to him to go by land to Kamtschatka, cross in some of the Russian vessels to Nootka Sound, fall down into the latitude of the Missouri, and penetrate to, and through that to the United States. He eagerly seized the idea, and only asked to be assured of the permission of the Russian government. I interested, in obtaining that, M. de Sinoulin, minister plenipotentiary of the empire at Paris, but more especially the baron de Grimm, minister plenipotentiary of Saxo-Gotha, her more special agent and correspondent there in matters not immediately diplomatic. Her permission was obtained and an assurance of protection while the course of the voyage should be through her territories. Ledyard set out from Paris, and arrived at St. Petersburg after the empress had left that place to pass the winter, I think, at Moscow. His finances not permitting him to make unnecessary stay at St. Petersburg, he left it with a passport from one of the ministers; and at two hundred miles from Kamschatka, was obliged to take up his winter quarters. He was preparing, in the spring, to resume his journey, when he was arrested by an officer of the empress, who by this time had changed her mind, and forbidden his proceeding. He was put into a close carriage, and conveyed, day and night, without ever stopping till they reached Poland; where he was set down and left to himself. The fatigue of this journey broke down his constitution; and when he returned to Paris his bodily health was much impaired. His mind, however, remained firm, and he after this undertook the journey to Egypt. I received a letter from him, full of sanguine hopes, dated at Cairo, the fifteenth of November, 1788, the day before he was to set out for the head of the Nile; on which day, however, he ended his career and life; and thus failed the first attempt to explore the western part of our northern continent.

In 1792, I proposed to the American Philosophical Society that we should set on foot a subscription to engage some competent person to explore that region in the opposite direction; that is by ascending the Missouri, crossing the Stony mountains, and descending the nearest river to the Pacific. Captain Lewis being then stationed at Charlottesville, on the recruiting service, warmly solicited me to obtain for him the execution of that object. I told him it was proposed that the person engaged should be attended by a single companion only, to avoid exciting alarm among the Indians. This did not deter him; but Mr. Andre Michaux, a professed botanist, author of the Flora Boreali-Americana and of the Histoire des Chenes d'Amérique, offering his services, they were accepted. He received his instructions, and when he had reached Kentucky in the prosecution of his journey, he was overtaken by an order from the minister of France then at Philadelphia, to relinquish the expedition, and to pursue elsewhere the botanical inquiries on which he was employed by that government; and thus failed the second attempt for exploring that region.

In 1803, the act for establishing trading houses with the Indian tribes being about to expire, some modifications of it were recommended to Congress, by a confidential message of January 18th, and an extension of its views to the Indians on the Missouri. In order to prepare the way, the message proposed the sending an exploring party to trace the Missouri to its source, to cross the Highlands, and follow the best water communication which offered itself, from thence to the Pacific ocean. Congress approved the proposition, and voted a sum of money for carrying it into execution. Capt. Lewis, who had then been near two years with me as private secretary, immediately renewed his solicitations to have the direction of the party. I had now had opportunities of knowing him intimately. Of courage undaunted; of possessing a firmness and perseverance of purpose which nothing but impossibilities could divert from its direction; careful as a father of those committed to his charge, yet steady in the maintenance of order and discipline; intimate with the Indian character, customs, and principles; habituated to the hunting life; guarded, by exact observation of the vegetables and animals of his own country, against losing time in the description of objects already possessed; honest, disinterested, liberal of sound understanding, and a fidelity to truth so scrupulous, that whatever he should report would be as certain as if seen by ourselves; with all these qualifications, as if selected and replanted by nature in one body for this express purpose, I could have no hesitation in confiding the enterprise to him. To fill up the measure desired, he wanted nothing but a greater familiarity with the technical language of the natural sciences, and readiness in the astronomical observations necessary for the geography of his route. To acquire these he repaired immediately to Philadelphia and placed himself under the tutorage of the distinguished professor of that place, who with a zeal and emulation, evinced by an ardent devotion to science, communicated so him freely the information requisite for the purposes of the journey. While attending too, at Lancaster, the fabrication of the arms with which he chose that his men should be provided, he had the benefit of daily communication with Mr. Andrew Elliot, whose experience in astronomical observation, and practice of it in the woods, enabled him to apprise Captain Lewis of the wants and difficulties he would encounter, and of the substitutes and resources offered by a woodland and uninhabited country.

Deeming it necessary he should have some person with him of known competence to the direction of the enterprise, in the event of accident to himself, he proposed William Clarke, brother of General George Rogers Clarke, who was approved of and with that view, received a commission of captain.

In April 1803, a draft of his instructions was sent to Captain Lewis, and on the twentieth of June they were signed in the following form:

"To Meriwether Lewis, esquire, captain of the first regiment of infantry of the United States of America.

"Your situation as secretary of the President of the United States, has made you acquainted with the objects of my confidential message of January 18, 1803, to the legislature; you have seen the act they passed, which though expressed in general terms, was meant to sanction those objects, and you are appointed to carry them into execution.

"Instruments for ascertaining, by celestial observation, the geography of the country through which you will pass, have been already provided. Light articles for barter and presents among the Indians, arms for your attendants, say for from ten to twelve men, boats, tents, and other travelling apparatus, with ammunition, medicine, surgical instruments, and provisions, you will have prepared with such aids as the secretary at war can yield in his department; and from him also you will receive authority to engage among our troops, by voluntary agreement the number of attendants above mentioned; over whom you, as their commanding officer, are invested with all the powers the laws give in such a case.

"As your movements, while within the limits of the United States, will be better directed by occasional communications adapted to circumstances, as they arise, they will not be noticed here. What follows will respect your proceedings after your departure from the United States.

"Your mission has been communicated to the ministers here from France, Spain, and Great Britain, and through them to their governments; and such assurances given them as to its objects, as we trust will satisfy them. The country of Louisiana having been ceded by Spain to France, the passport you have from the minister of France, the representative of the present sovereign of the country, will be a protection with all its subjects; and that from the minister of England will entitle you to the friendly aid of any traders of that allegiance with whom you may happen to meet.

"The object of your mission is to explore the Missouri river, and such principal streams of it, as by its course and communication with the waters of the Pacific ocean, whether the Columbia, Oregon, Colorado, or any other river, may offer the most direct and practicable water communication across the continent, for the purposes of commerce.

"Beginning at the mouth of the Missouri; you will take observations of latitude and longitude, at all remarkable points on the river, and especially at the mouths of rivers, at rapids, at islands, and other places and objects distinguished by such natural marks and characters of a durable kind, as that they may with certainty be recognized hereafter. The courses of the river between these points of observation may be supplied by the compass, the log-line, and by time corrected by the observations themselves. The variations of the needle, too, in different places should be noticed.

"The interesting points of the portage between the heads of the Missouri, and of the water offering the best communication with the Pacific ocean, should also be fixed by observation, and the course of that water to the ocean, in the same manner as that of the Missouri.

Your observations are to be taken with great pains and accuracy; to be entered distinctly and intelligibly for others as well as yourself, to comprehend all the elements necessary, with the aid of the usual tables, to fix the latitude and longitude of the places at which they were taken; and are to be rendered to the war office, for the purpose of having the calculations made concurrently by proper persons within the United States. Several copies of these, as well as other notes, should be made at leisure times, and put into the care of the most trust-worthy of your attendants, to guard, by multiplying them, against the accidental losses to which they will be exposed.—A further guard would be, that one of these copies be on the cuticle membranes of the paper-birch, as less liable to injury from damp than common paper.

"The commerce which may be carried on with the people inhabiting the line you will pursue, renders a knowledge of those people important. You will therefore endeavor to make yourself acquainted, as far as a diligent pursuit of your journey shall admit, with the names of the nations and their number.

"The extent and limits of their possessions;
"Their relations with other tribes or nations;
"Their language, traditions, monuments;
"Their ordinary occupations in agriculture, fishing, hunting, war, arts, and implements for these;
"Their food, clothing, and domestic accommodations;
"The diseases prevalent among them, and the remedies they use;

"Moral and physical circumstances which distinguish them from the tribes we know;

"Peculiarities in their laws, customs and dispositions;
"And articles of commerce they may need or furnish, and to what extent.

"And, considering the interest which every nation has in extending and strengthening the authority of reason and justice among the people around them, it will be useful to acquire what knowledge you can of the state of morality, religion, and information among them; as it may better enable those who may endeavor to civilize and instruct them, to adapt measures to the existing notions and practices of those on whom they are to operate.

"Other objects worthy of notice will be—
"The soil and face of the country, its growth and vegetable productions, especially those not of the United States;

"The animals of the country generally, and especially those not in the United States;

"The remains and accounts of any which may be deemed rare or extinct;

"The mineral productions of every kind, but more particularly metals, lime stone, pit-coal, and saltpetre; salines and mineral waters, noting the temperature of the last, and such circumstances as may indicate their character;

"Volcanic appearances;

"Climate, as characterized by the thermometer, by the proportion of rainy, cloudy, and clear days; by lightning, hail, snow, ice, by the access and recess of frost; by the winds prevailing at different seasons; the dates at which particular plants put forth, or lose their flower or leaf; times of appearance of particular birds, reptiles or insects.

"Although your route will be along the channel of the Missou-

22, yet you will endeavor to inform yourself, by inquiry, of the character and extent of the country watered by its branches, and especially on its southern side. The North river, or Rio Bravo, which runs into the gulf of Mexico, and the North river, or Rio Colorado, which runs into the gulf of California, are understood to be the principal streams heading opposite the waters of the Missouri, and running southwardly. Whether the dividing grounds between the Missouri and them are mountains or flat lands, what are their distance from the Missouri, the character of the intermediate country, and the people inhabiting it, are worthy of particular inquiry. The northern waters of the Missouri are less to be inquired after, because they have been ascertained to a considerable degree, and are still in a course of ascertainment by English traders and travellers; but if you can learn any thing certain of the most northern source of the Missouri, and of its position relatively to the Lake of the Woods, it will be interesting to us. Some accounts too of the path of the Canadian traders from the Mississippi, at the mouth of the Outensinking, to where it strikes the Missouri, and of the soil and rivers in its course is desirable.

In all your intercourse with the natives, treat them in the most friendly and conciliatory manner which their own conduct will admit; allay all jealousies as to the object of your journey, satisfy them of its innocency; make them acquainted with the position, extent, character, peaceable and commercial disposition of the United States; your wish is to be neighborly, friendly, and useful to them, and of our disposition to a commercial intercourse with them; confer with them on the points most convenient as mutual emporiums, and the articles of most desirable interchange for them and us. If a few of their influential chiefs, within practicable distance, wish to visit us, arrange such a visit with them, and furnish them with authority to call on our officers on entering the United States, to have them conveyed to this place at the public expense. If any of them should wish to have some of their people brought up with us and taught such arts as may be useful to them we will receive, instruct, and take care of them. Such a mission, whether of influential chiefs, or of young people would give some security to your own party. Carey with you, some water of the small-pox; inform those of them with whom you may be of its efficacy as a preservative from the small-pox, and instruct and encourage them in the use of it. This may be especially done wherever you winer.

As it is impossible for us to foresee in what manner you will be received by those people, whether with hospitality or hostility, so it is impossible to prescribe the exact degree of perseverance with which you are to pursue your journey. We value too much the lives of our citizens to offer them to probable destruction. Your numbers will be sufficient to secure you against the unauthorized opposition of individuals or of small parties; but if a superior force, authorized or not authorized, by a nation, should be arrayed against your further passage, and inflexibly determined to arrest it, you must decline its further pursuit and return. In the loss of yourselves we should lose also the information you will have required. By returning safely with that, you may enable us to renew the essay with better calculated means. To your own discretion, therefore, must be left the degree of danger you may risk, and the point at which you should decline, only saying, we wish you to err on the side of your safety, and to bring back your party safe, even if it be with less information.

As far up the Missouri as the white settlements extend, an intercourse will probably be found to exist between them and the Spanish posts of St. Louis opposite Cahokia, or St. Genevieve opposite Kaskaskia. From still further up the river, the traders may furnish a conveyance for letters. Beyond that you may perhaps be able to engage Indians to bring your letters for the government to Cahokia, or Kaskaskia, on promising that they shall receive such special compensation as you shall have stipulated with them. Avail yourself of these means to communicate to us, at reasonable intervals, a copy of your journal, notes and observations of every kind, putting into cypher whatever might do injury if betrayed.

Should you reach the Pacific ocean, inform yourself of the circumstances which may decide whether the furs of those parts may not be collected as advantageously at the head of the Missouri (convenient as is supposed to the waters of the Colorado and Oregon or Columbia) as at Nootka Sound, or any other point of that coast; and if at trade be consequently conducted through the Missouri and United States more beneficially than by the circumnavigation now practised.

On your arrival on that coast, endeavour to learn if there be any port within your reach frequented by the sea vessels of any nation, and to send two of your trusty people back by sea, in such way as shall appear practicable, with a copy of your notes; and should you be of opinion that the return of your party by the way they went will be imminently dangerous, then ship the whole, and return by sea, by the way either of Cape Horn, or the Cape of Good Hope, as you shall be able. As you will be without money, clothes, or provisions, you must endeavour to use the credit of the United States to obtain them; for which purpose open letters of credit shall be furnished you, authorizing you to draw on the executive of the United States, or any of its officers, in any part of the world, in which draughts can be disposed of, and to apply with our recommendations to the consuls, agents, merchants, or citizens of any nation with which we have intercourse, assuring them, in our name, that any aids they may furnish you shall be honorably repaid, and on demand. Our consuls, Thomas Hewes, at Batavia, in Java, William Buchanan, in the Isles of France and Bourbon, and John Elmslie, at the Cape of Good Hope, will be able to supply your necessities, by draughts on us.

Should you find it safe to return by the way you go, after sending two of your party round by sea, or with your whole party, if no conveyance by sea can be found, do so; making such observations on your return as may serve to supply, correct, or confirm those made on your outward journey.

On re-entering the United States and reaching a place of safety, discharge any of your attendants who may desire and deserve it, procuring for them immediate payment of all arrears of pay and clothing which may have incurred since their departure, and assure them that they shall be recommended to the liberality of the legislature for the grant of a soldier's portion of land each, as proposed in my message to congress, and repair yourself, with your papers, to the seat of government.

To provide, on the accident of your death, against anarchy, dispersion, and the consequent danger to your party, and total failure of the enterprise, you are hereby authorized, by any instrument signed and written in your own hand, to name the person among them who shall succeed to the command on your decease, and by like instruments to change the nomination, from time to time, as further experience of the characters accompanying you shall point out superior fitness; and all the powers and authorities given to yourself are, in the event of your death transferred to, and vested in the successor so named, with further power to him and his successors, in like manner to name each his successor, who, on the death of his predecessor, shall be invested with all the powers and authorities given to yourself. Given under my hand at the city of Washington, this twentieth day of June, 1803.

“THOMAS JEFFERSON,

“President of the United States of America.”

While these things were going on here, the country of Louisiana, lately ceded by Spain to France, had been the subject of negotiation at Paris between us and this last power; and had actually been transferred to us by treaties executed at Paris on the 30th of April. This information, received about the 1st day of July, increased infinitely the interest we felt in the expedition, and lessened the apprehensions of interruption from other powers. Every thing in this quarter being now prepared, captain Lewis left Washington on the 8th of July, 1803, and proceeded to Pittsburgh, where other articles had been ordered to be provided for him. The men too were to be selected from the military stations on the Ohio. Delays of preparation, difficulties of navigation down the Ohio, and other untoward obstructions, retarded his arrival at Cahokia until the season was so far advanced as to render it prudent to suspend his entering the Missouri before the freshets break up in the succeeding spring. From this time his journal, now published, will give the history of his journey to and from the Pacific ocean, until his return to St. Louis on the 23d of September, 1806. Never did a similar event excite more joy through the United States. The humblest of their citizens had taken a lively interest in the issue of this journey, and looked forward with impatience for the information it would furnish. Their anxieties too for the safety of the corps had been kept in a state of excitement by lugubrious rumours, circulated from time to time on uncertain authorities, and uncontradicted by letters, or other direct information, from the time they had left the Mandan towns, on their ascent up the river in April of the preceding year, 1805, until their actual return to St. Louis.

It was the middle of February, 1807, before captain Lewis, with his companion captain Clarke, reached the city of Washington, where congress was then in session. That body granted to the two chiefs and their followers the donation of lands which they had been encouraged to expect in reward of their toil and dangers. Captain Lewis was soon after appointed governor of Louisiana, and captain Clarke a general of its militia, and agent of the United States for Indian affairs in that department.

A considerable time intervened before the governor's arrival at St. Louis. He found the territory distracted by feuds and contentions among the officers of the government, and the people themselves divided by these into factions and parties. He determined at once to take no side with either; but to use every endeavor to conciliate and harmonize them. The even-handed justice he administered to all soon established a respect for his person and authority; and perseverance and time wore down animosities, and reunited the citizens again into one family.

Governor Lewis had, from early life, been subject to hypochondriacal affections. It was a constitutional disposition in all the nearer branches of the family of his name, and was more immediately inherited by him from his father. They had not, however, been so strong as to give uneasiness to his family. While he lived with me in Washington, I observed at times sensible depressions of mind; but knowing their constitutional source, I estimated their course by what I had seen in the family. During his western expedition, the constant exertion which that required of all the faculties of body and mind suspended these distressing affections; but after his establishment at St. Louis in sedentary occupations, they returned upon him with redoubled vigour, and began seriously to alarm his friends. He was in a paroxysm of one of these, when his affairs rendered it necessary for him to go to Washington. He proceeded to the Chickasaw Bluffs, where he arrived on the sixteenth of September, 1807, with a view of continuing his journey thence by water.

Mr. Neely, agent of the United States with the Chickasaw Indians, arriving there two days after, found him extremely indisposed, and betwixt at times some symptoms of a derangement of mind. The rumors of a war with England, and apprehensions that he might lose the papers he was bringing on, among which were the vouchers of his public accounts, and the journals and papers of his western expedition, induced him hereto change his mind, and to take his course by land through the Chickasaw country. Although he appeared somewhat relieved, Mr. Neely kindly determined to accompany and watch over him. Unfortunately, at their encampment, after having passed the Tennessee one day's journey, they lost two horses, which obliging Mr. Neely to halt for their recovery, the governor proceeded, under a promise to wait for him at the house of the first white inhabitant on his road. He stopped at the house of a Mr. Grindler, who not being at home, his wife, alarmed at the symptoms of derangement she discovered, gave him up the house and retired to rest herself in an out-house, the governor's and Neely's servants lodging in another. About three o'clock in the night he did the deed which plunged his friends into affliction, and deprived his country of one of her most valued citizens, whose valour and intelligence would have been now employed in avenging the wrongs of his country, and in emulating by land the splendid deeds which have honored her arms on the ocean. It lost too to the nation the benefit of receiving from his own hand the narrative now offered them of his sufferings and successes, in endeavoring to extend for them the boundaries of science, and to present to their knowledge that vast and fertile country, which their sons are destined to fill with arts, with science, with freedom and happiness.

To this melancholy close of the life of one, whom posterity will declare not to have lived in vain, I have only to add, that all the facts I have stated are either known to myself, or communicated by his family or others, for whose truth I have no hesitation to make myself responsible; and I conclude with tendering you the assurances of my respect and consideration.

TH. JEFFERSON.

Mr. Paul Allen, Philadelphia.

Gen. Charles Scott,

Lately deceased, was, says the Kentucky Reporter, the last Revolutionary Officer of his grade. The inestimable worth of this veteran soldier and patriot is recorded upon materials more durable than marble: he will live in the memory of his country as long as history or tradition shall hand down to posterity the epoch of her liberty.

He engaged, at the age of 17, as a common soldier in the war which terminated by the peace of 1763. He was soon distinguished by his active vigilance and daring intrepidity.—He rose to a Sergeant, and for a considerable time was employed with a small party in traversing the western wilds, and procuring intelligence of the movements of the French and savages. General, then Colonel Washington, who commanded the Virginia troops, had him promoted towards the close of the war to an Ensign. On the breaking out of the revolutionary war, and when Governor Dunmore fled, he was among the first who raised a volunteer company, composed of the most respectable Virginians, and pursued him. He distinguished himself at the battle of the Bridge, when Captain Fordyce was killed. General Washington, ever the friend of his country and of worth, soon procured him the command of a regiment, in the Virginia continental line; he was always assigned the post of honour, being deputed on the most hazardous enterprises, and so well did he acquit himself, that he was the favorite disciple of his great master. A proof of this confidence was given in being employed to conduct the several campaigns against the Indians from this country.

It owes him much. It made him Chief Magistrate at an advanced age, as a testimony of its gratitude. How well he fulfilled our expectations, how true to what he believed our country's interest, no one here is ignorant. He retired from office amidst the plaudits of the state; not till he had roused her choicest sons, and awakened that spirit for the prosecution of the existing war in defence of our rights, which has shed a blaze of glory on the world. With the firmness of a hero, he had the affections of a child. He lived only for his country and his friends. He died poor, covered with honor. Reader, look over his life, and go thou and do like wise!

DEATH AND CHARACTER

OF COLONEL ISAAC HAYNE.

(From Ramsay's History of the Revolution in South Carolina.)

As soon as the American army obtained repossession of the country, the inhabitants after returning to their former allegiance resolutely put all to risk in support of independence. Though the British, in the career of their conquests, had inculcated the necessity and propriety of transferring allegiance from the vanquished to the victor, yet they treated with the utmost severity those unfortunate men, when in their power, who having once accepted of British protection acted on those very principles in afterwards rejoining their victorious countrymen.

Among the sufferers on this score, the illustrious Col. Hayne stands conspicuous. During the siege of Charleston that gentleman served his country in a corps of military horse. After the capitulation, there being no American army in the State, and the prospect of one being both distant and uncertain, no alternative was left but either to abandon his family, and property, or to surrender to the conquerors. This hard dilemma, together with well founded information, that others in similar circumstances had been paroled to their plantations, weighed with Col. Hayne so far as to induce a conclusion that, instead of waiting to be captured, it would be both more safe and more honorable to come within the British lines and surrender himself a voluntary prisoner. Reports made of his superior influence and abilities, uniformly exerted in the American cause, operated with the conquerors to refuse him a parole, though they were in the habit of daily granting that indulgence to others of the inhabitants. To his great astonishment he was told, "that he must either become a British subject, or submit to close confinement." To be arrested and detained in the capital, was to himself not an intolerable evil: but to abandon both his family to the small pox, a disease then raging in the neighborhood, and which in a short time after proved mortal to his wife and two children, and to the insults and depredations of the royal army, was too much for a tender husband and fond parent. To acknowledge himself the subject of a King whose government he had from principle renounced, was repugnant to his feelings; but without this he was cut off from every prospect of a return to his family. In this embarrassing situation he waited on the author of this history, with a declaration to the following effect: "If the British would grant me the indulgence which we, in the day of our power, gave their adherents, of removing my family and property, I would seek an asylum in the remotest corner of the United States rather than submit to their government; but as they allow no other alternative than submission or confinement in the capital, at a distance from my wife and family, at a time when they are in the most pressing need for my presence and support. I must for the present yield to the demands of the conquerors. I request you to bear in mind, that previous to my taking this step, I declare, that it is contrary to my inclination, and forced on me by hard necessity. I never will bear arms against my country. My new masters can require no service of me but what is enjoined by the old militia law of the province, which substitutes a fine in lieu of personal service. That I will pay as the price of my protection. If my conduct should be censured by my countrymen, I beg that you would remember this conversation and bear witness for me, that I do not mean to desert the cause of America."

In this state of distress Col. Hayne subscribed to a declaration of his allegiance to the King of Great Britain, but not without expressly objecting to the clause which required him "with his arms to support the Royal government." The commandant of the garrison, Brigadier General Patterson, and James Simpson, Lieutenant of the British police, assured him that this would never be required, and added farther, "that when the regular forces could not defend the country without the aid of its inhabitants, it would be high time for the Royal army to quit."

Having submitted to their government, he readily obtained permission to return to his family. In violation of the special conditions under which he subscribed the declaration of his allegiance, he was repeatedly called on to take arms against his countrymen, and was finally threatened with close confinement in case of farther refusal. This open breach of contract, together with the inability of the late conquerors to give him that protection which was as a compensation for his allegiance, the Americans having regained that part of the State in which he resided, induced him, to consider himself released from all engagements to the British commanders. The inhabitants of the neighborhood, who had also revolted, subscribed a petition to Gen. Pickens, praying that Col. Hayne might be appointed to the command of the regiment. Having resumed his arms, and the tide of conquest being fairly turned in the short space of thirteen months after the surrender of Charleston, he was sent in the month of July, 1781, with a small party to reconnoitre. They penetrated within seven miles of the capital—took General Williamson prisoner, and retreated to the head quarters of the regiment. This was the same Williamson, who having been an active and useful officer in the militia of South Carolina from the commencement of the war to the surrender of Charleston in May, 1780, became, soon after that event, a British subject. Such was the anxiety of the British commandant to rescue General Williamson, that he ordered his whole cavalry on this business. Col. Hayne unfortunately fell in to their hands. Though he had conducted himself peaceably while under the British government, and had injured no man yet for having resumed his arms, for accepting British protection, he was, when brought to Charleston, confined in a loathsome provost. At first, he was promised a trial, and had counsel prepared to justify his conduct by the laws of nations and usages of war; but this was finally refused. Had he been considered as a British subject, he had an undoubted right to a trial—if an American officer, to his parole; but in violation of every principle of the constitution, he was ordered for execution by the arbitrary mandate of Lord Rawdon and Lieut. Col. Halfour.

The Royal Lieutenant Governor Bull, and a great number of inhabitants, both Loyalists and Americans, interceded for his life. The ladies of Charleston generally signed a petition in his behalf, in which was introduced every delicate sentiment that was likely to operate on the gallantry of officers or the humanity of men. His children, accompanied by some near relations were presented on their bended knees as humble suitors for their father's life. Such powerful intercessions were made in his favor as touched many an unfeeling heart, and drew tears from many a hard eye; but Lord Rawdon and Lieutenant Colonel Halfour were inflexible.

After his fate was fixed, he was repeatedly visited by his friends, and conversed on various subjects with the fortitude of a man, a philosopher and a christian. He particularly lamented that on principles of reciprocal retaliation, his execution would probably be an introduction to the shedding of so much innocent blood. His children who had lost their parent, were brought to him in the place of his confinement, and received from his lips the dying advice of an affectionate father. On the last evening of his life he told a friend, "that he was no more alarmed at the thoughts of death than at any other occurrence that was necessary and unavoidable." He requested those in whom the supreme power was vested, to accommodate the mode of his death to his feelings as an officer; but this was refused.

On the morning of the fatal day, on receiving his summons to proceed to the place of execution, he delivered some papers to his eldest son, a youth of about thirteen years of age—Present, said he, these papers to Mrs. Edwards, with my request that she would forward them to her brother in Congress. You will next repair to the place of my execution—receive my body, and see it decently interred among my forefathers." They took a final leave. The procession began from the Exchange, in the forenoon of the fourth of August, 1781. The streets were crowded with thousands of anxious spectators. He walked to the place of execution with such decent firmness, composure and dignity, as to awaken the compassion of many, and to command respect from all. There was a majesty in his suffering which rendered him superior to the pangs of death. When the city barrier was past and the instrument of his catastrophe appeared in full view, a faithful friend by his side observed to him, "that he hoped he would exhibit an example of the manner in which an American can die!" He answered with the utmost tranquillity, "I will endeavour to do so." He ascended the cart with a firm step and a serene aspect. He enquired of the executioner, who was making an attempt to get up to pull the cap over his eyes, "what he wanted?" Upon being informed of his design, the Colonel replied, "I will save you the trouble, and pulled it over himself. He was afterwards asked whether he wished to say any thing, to which he answered, "I will only take leave of my friends, and be ready." He then affectionately shook hands with three gentlemen who recommended his children to their care—and then gave the signal to the cart to move.

Thus fell, in the bloom of life, a brave officer, a worthy citizen, a just and upright man, furnishing an example of heroism in death that extorted a confession from his enemies, "that though he did not die in a good cause, he must at least have acted from a persuasion of its being so."

The regular officers of the continental army presented a petition to General Greene, requesting that he would retahate for the execution of Colonel Hayne. By this they voluntarily subjected themselves to all the consequences, to which, in case of capture they would be exposed. General Greene soon after issued a proclamation, threatening to make British officers the object of retaliation. This encouraged the revolted inhabitants to continue in arms, and effaced every expression that was expected from the fate of Colonel Hayne. The British interest gained no permanent advantage, while pity and revenge sharpened the swords of the countrymen and friends of the much loved sufferer.

Had this execution taken place four or five months sooner, the policy of the measure, as tending to prevent a revolt, would have been some apology for it; but after Lord Rawdon was driven from almost the whole of his posts in the country, and the people had generally resumed their arms in favor of America, it had more the appearance of the revenge of a disappointed savage, than of the political severity of a conqueror.

Joel Barlow, Esq.

The following Biographical Notice of our late Minister, Mr. Barlow, was prepared for some of the public papers of Europe, and has been forwarded to a distinguished citizen of this country by one of its authors. Translated from the French for the Richmond Enquirer.

Biographical notice of Mr. Barlow minister plenipotentiary from the United States of America to the Court of France.

The friends of humanity, on the two Continents, have just begun to lament the loss of Mr. Barlow.

He was born in the year 1757, at Reading, in the province, now state of Connecticut.

He was the youngest of ten children.

He studied first at Dartmouth college, New Hampshire, and afterwards at that of New Haven in his native state, Connecticut.

The war of the Independence of America broke out in the year 1776.

Mr. Barlow was as yet a student, and began to distinguish himself by pieces both in verse and prose, one of which was an elegy on the death of Mr. Holmer, a member of Congress and Supreme Judge of the United States court of appeals.

In the vacation he took up his musket and went to join his four brothers, who were in the American army, to fight along with them for his country's freedom. He was at the very warm action of York-Island where the Americans losing the field, made an honorable retreat, after which they repaired their misfortune.

He was engaged in a course of law, when the fame of his learning and morality caused him to be appointed Chaplain of brigade in the army by the State of Massachusetts.

He received ordination which among the Presbyterians, is no more than a civil form, and an impediment at no time to the embracing of any other state.

In his capacity of chaplain he attended the army till the peace of 1783.

In the text it was that he began his poem of the Columbiad, the only epic that the United have as yet produced.

By a zeal at once enlightened, pious and undaunted, he gained the friendship of the highest public characters in the nation both civil and military departments by no means incompatible in the American Republic.

But a tie far more interesting to his heart was the connexion which he formed in 1781, with Miss Baldwin of New Haven, sister to the senator of that name.

After the peace, Mr. Barlow, resumed the study of the law, and in 1785 entered the Bar, where he practised with considerable success, and acquired uncommon celebrity; the joint and natural result of extensive legal knowledge, and shining literary talents.

The first edition of his Vision of Columbus, he published in 1787, and in the same year he passed a second in England.

This raised the author's reputation still higher in America and spread it over Europe, which he had occasion to visit the following year.

A wealthy and respectable company had purchased from the United States between 3 and 4 million acres of land, on the banks of the Ohio.

A part of those lands they wished to sell to foreigners, and to divide the remainder among their stockholders.

Mr. Barlow was concerned in them; and he agreed to go to France to effect a negotiation to that purpose, which succeeded so well, that in seventeen years after, the colony of Ohio contained a population of seventy thousand inhabitants, being at this day an independent state forming a part of the general confederation.

To be in France at that period, and not sensibly affected by the revolution, was a thing impossible for Mr. Barlow; and while he admired the energy with which it was conducted, he was filled with detestation of the disorders it occasioned. He tried to soften its horrors, and compose the animosity of party political pieces, for which he has the honor in return, of being nominated a French citizen, together with his countrymen, the great Washington, General Hamilton and Sir James Mackintosh.

We have before us at this moment, three pieces that he has published, which show how closely in his mind and heart were interwoven the love of his country, a real concern for France and the best principles of civilization.

The first is a letter of the 4th of February, 1799, to the Executive Directory.

The next is one to his fellow-citizens, of the 4th of March following, on the system of policy then pursued by their government, and the third letter is addressed to them, on certain political measures proposed for their consideration; that is of the 20th of December, 1799.

To it he has annexed a memorial on maritime laws, in which he lays down, with strength and perspicuity, the principles which France has been so long contending for against England.

He is surprised that the Barbary powers show themselves in this respect more civilized than the most celebrated people of Europe.

They recognize the principle, that the flag truly neutral ought to cover the merchandise. They do not make war without having declared it. And after the declaration, they allow a delay of thirty days in the Mediterranean, and a longer term on the ocean, before they commence hostilities.

These were facts known to Mr. B. He had then returned from Algiers, Tunis and Tripoli, to which places he was appointed minister plenipotentiary by President Washington, and in which, surmounting the extreme difficulty of treating between a free people and Barbarian regencies, he had concluded, notwithstanding the opposition of England, the three first treaties, by which those governments bound themselves to respect the navigation and commerce of the United States.

On his return to America, he engaged, in 1805, in the plan, which Mr. Jefferson had conceived, of establishing a University at the City of Washington, for the purpose of affording the youth of the United States an education, suitable, comprehensive, and uniform; calculated to promote, by a correspondence of attainments, that harmony which it is so important to maintain between the different members of the Union.

His friend Du Pont de Nemours had already, in 1800, at the request of the same Magistrate, composed a work on the same subject and on the same principles, from which several extracts have been lately given to the public in the Annals of Education reduced by Mr. Guizot.

This assemblage of the united labours of several philosophers animated by the same spirit, will, it is to be hoped, be productive of general advantage. And it must be allowed that public education has already made a very remarkable progress in United America.

In 1811, his Excellency Mr. Madison, the present Chief Magistrate of the United States, appointed Mr. Barlow their Minister Plenipotentiary to the Court of France. That choice, made by the American government, has had the approbation of the seventeen United States. It was determined by the known qualifications of the statesman, which Mr. B. combined with other advantages: he had rendered services to both nations; he was, by law, a citizen of both countries; he was desirous of being useful to both; he considered them as having the same interests, as national allies; in a word, he possessed the great advantage of not having forgotten, that American independence had been strenuously forwarded by French generosity and valour.

In his manner of negotiating, Mr. B. was uncommonly steadfast; distinguished by a primitive simplicity and firmness, which, though the European politicians might regard them as of the after world, were by no means displeasing because they were accompanied with reason and candor.

The eloquence of his country has little of the loftiness of style, but is rich in observation and powerful in argument. It comes more to the point, even than that of the English from which it is derived.

It descends less into particulars, and disposes them more judiciously in their proper place. It is supposed that the principal articles of the treaty were agreed upon and were sufficient to re-establish mutual good will, but that it was judged expedient on both sides not to conclude without having communicated those grounds to the American government. How far these opinions may be well founded or otherwise, nobody can tell; they are affairs of state. Mr. B. was called to Wilna to confer with the Duke of Bassano upon them. Returning thence, he travelled night and day, trusting too much to the strength of his constitution, when the opposite extremes of the intense cold of the climate, and the excessive and no less dreadful heat of the small houses of Jews, which, in Poland, are the only taverns, produced a violent inflammation in his breast, of which he died at Zarnowic, near Cracow—a victim to his duty, his courage and his zeal.

Such, generally, in times of turbulence and exigency, is the fate of illustrious men; and particularly of those whose good fortune it is to be blessed with a companion of the first order, such as the disconsolate Madam Barlow.

Two passions, deep, noble, and honorable, receive twofold accretions of strength, the one from the other: so it is with the principle of public spirit and the lasting affection of a well matched couple. The man wishes to merit his reward; and the woman enjoys it at the risk of the most bitter woes. This is the expense at which the best and greatest of mankind match themselves. Of this they may assure themselves before hand! They will experience the sweetest comforts and the most afflicting distresses. But they will rank among the most exalted, most estimable of their species. It is necessary to be prepared to undergo both destinies. Let no one pretend to become a hero of history, if he feel not the courage of a hero of romance! And let none presume to imagine himself the latter, if he possess not the great sense, strong resolutions, masculine virtues and dignified character of the former.

Captain William Hall.

From a Charleston paper.

DIED—at the High Hills of Santee, on the second of February 1814, Captain William Hall aged about fifty-seven years.

Another of those characters, who were conspicuous in our revolutionary struggle, and from whom we derived our independence, as a free people, has descended to the silent tomb. At the commencement of our resistance to British usurpation, the subject of this notice was detained in England, from whence he made his escape, and arrived in Boston, where he immediately entered on board an American privateer, called the True Blue, commissioned as second lieutenant. During several cruises, the privateer was successful and considerably annoyed the enemy. He afterwards came to his native city, where he received a prompt and honorable call in the service of his country. On the second day after his arrival he was commissioned as lieutenant on board the Notre Dame, a brig of war, in the service of the state, carrying eighteen six pounders. She was quickly dispatched for sea, and in a few days after leaving port, fell in with a British brig of sixteen guns, which, after an action of twenty-five minutes, struck to the Notre Dame. She proved to be a valuable prize, loaded with dry goods. Lieutenant Hall was put on board the brig, as prizemaster, and after escaping from the Daphne frigate, in a lengthy chase, arrived safe in Georgetown. Captain Seymour, who then commanded the Notre Dame, resigned, and the command was given to Lieutenant Hall, who at the time was but twenty years of age.

Early in 1778 Captain Hall was ordered with the Notre Dame to join the squadron which sailed from this port, under the command of Captain Biddle, in the Randolph frigate of thirty-six guns, together with the ship General Moultrie of twenty-guns, Captain Sullivan; the brig Polly, Captain Anthony; and the brig Fair American, Captain Morgan. During the cruise they fell in with the Yarmouth, a British sixty-four gun ship, which Captain Biddle engaged, and whilst the different vessels were bearing down to the respective stations assigned them, the Randolph blew up. They were in consequence obliged to separate and make every effort to escape from a superior force. The situation of the Notre Dame was peculiarly exposed and dangerous, being under the stern of the enemy, and required the exercise of much prudence and skill to avoid capture, or destruction from the combustible matter which fell on board, and the severe fire to which she was exposed. The Notre Dame was chased for several hours. After having escaped from the enemy, she continued her cruise, and captured eleven prizes, three of which were of a Jamaica fleet under convoy; one of the prizes was a ship of twenty guns captured near the Isle of Pine—carried by boarding. Captain Hall was employed in the expedition to retake Savannah, and took an active and conspicuous part in landing the troops from the French fleet under Count D'Estaing. He was in Charleston, when it capitulated to the British, and of course was made a prisoner; whilst in that character, and under parole, he was, with upwards of sixty others, sent to St. Augustine as hostages, where they remained until regularly exchanged.

After the conclusion of the war, Captain Hall entered the merchant's service and commanded several vessels out of this port. By his industry and assiduity, in a few years, he acquired an independent fortune, which enabled him to return from the sea, and enjoy the fruits of a laborious profession. Since his residence on shore he discharged with fidelity every public duty to which he was called. He served many years as one of the wardens of the city, and as a commissioner in different institutions under the corporation.

Lieutenant Wilcox.

From a Natchez Paper.

DIED—on the fifteenth of February, 1814, First Lieutenant Joseph M. Wilcox, of the third regiment United States' infantry, about twenty-one years of age, a native of the state of Connecticut, but latterly a resident of the state of Ohio.

Lieutenant Wilcox had volunteered his services to descend the Cahaba and Alabama rivers from the Cahaba towns, for the purpose of taking back two boats which were ascending the river with provisions for the troops under Lieut. Col. Russell. He started under cover of the night, with a corporal and one man of the third infantry, and one of Major Dale's militia, in a small canoe; in the dark they run on a log, upset the canoe and got nearly all their ammunition wet—they however lighted the canoe and proceeded on: the next day they were driven on shore by about twenty Indians in two canoes—so soon as they reached the bank the militia man took to the canoe and could not be killed. Lieutenant Wilcox, with his two men, exchanged two rounds with the Indians and compelled them to retreat, leaving several of their party dead on the bank—they took with them the Lieutenant's canoe. The next morning he made a raft to cross the Alabama, or to float down under cover of the night as might best suit his purposes; in crossing the river the raft nearly sunk, wet all the ammunition they had save two cartridges, and lost one of their muskets, and the corporal broke his arm, &c. in the action of the day before. In this deplorable situation they were again attacked by a party of six Indians; they made battle, but for the want of ammunition they could not contend with such a superior force. Lieutenant Wilcox was shot through the body and Corporal Simpson through the knee—wounded as he was he made to the canoe of the Indians, and called to his only remaining man to bring the corporal in his arms to the canoe—he then jumped into the canoe with a view of killing an Indian which remained there for the protection of the canoe.

His object was to get his men in the canoe and endeavor to get off, but the Indians pursued them too close, and Lieutenant Wilcox and the corporal were both taken prisoners—the soldier made off unhurt—Soon after the boats which he had been in search of, came in sight—the Indians fled, and left the victims with their hatchets and arms in the canoe. They were taken on board one boat and carried to Fort Claiborne, but both of them expired on the evening of the fifteenth. The private soldier got in safe, and from him the above information has been received.

To the misfortune of losing their ammunition and musket, and the dastardly conduct of the militia man, may be attributed the death of this gallant young officer and his brave corporal.

They were interred on the seventeenth of February at Fort Claiborne on the Alabama river, with the military honors due to brave and gallant men.

General John Swift.

From the Ontario Messenger.

ON Tuesday the twelfth July, 1814, near Queenston, in Upper Canada, died the brave and gallant Brigadier General John Swift, a resident of this country. He was second in command in the corps of volunteers under General P. B. Porter, and was inhumanly assassinated by a British soldier whom he had taken prisoner. The circumstances, as stated in a letter from an officer in the army, (one of General Brown's staff,) to his friend in this place, were as follows:

"On Tuesday the mounted volunteers at the suggestion of General Swift, was ordered to scour the country in every direction. At night, General Swift having intercepted some public documents, sent one of his men with them to General Brown with information that he was within a mile and a half of Fort George, had discovered the strength and position of their advanced picket, and was determined to capture it. The next we heard was, that having surrounded the picket, General Swift demanded a surrender. They all surrendered at once, excepting one, who refused. General Swift then presented his piece and said he would fire. The British soldier immediately exclaimed 'I surrender.' After General Swift had lowered his piece, the soldier fired, and shot the General through the left arm and breast. General Swift observed, 'It was nothing,' and formed his men in order to meet a patrol of the enemy who had advanced. He had not proceeded far before he fell, and in less than half an hour expired. In him, the army lost a valuable member and his country a real patriot and an honest man. Since his junction with us he has been noted for his zeal, enterprise, and intrepidity. He was this afternoon (13th) buried with all the honors which an admiring army could pay him."

To these encomiums on the character of our fellow-citizen, we most cheerfully subscribe. The commencement of the revolutionary war found General John Swift in the ranks of the immortal patriots of our country. He served in different capacities in the army during our revolutionary struggle, and was in many of the severest actions. He resided in Hyannis, a place celebrated in our history for the incursions of the savages, and horrid massacres, where he was engaged in all the difficulties and dangers of such a conflict. When peace returned he retired to agricultural employments, and was as useful and respectable there as he had been brave and dauntless in the field. From the present conflict he for some time kept aloof, until convinced that the essential and undoubted rights of his country were at stake, disdaining the trammels of party, and devoted solely to that country whose independence he had bled to obtain, he left the endowments of private life, and volunteered his services in the field of battle. Deeply as we would lament his loss at any time, it is peculiarly distressing at the time and in the manner in which he fell. To have fallen in battle would have satisfied his noble spirit. As it is, he has exhibited an example which will have its effect; that of a warm and decided opponent of the present administration coming forward to support and engage in a war which he was convinced required and demanded the united exertions of all true Americans, to preserve their independence and to maintain their rights.

"Peace to the soul of the Hero."

From the American.

To the memory of General Swift.

When a brave man sleeps in death, in the lap of glory, his Country mourns the hero's fate; the Muse strings her lyre, and beneath the yew and cypress, sounds her plaintive notes—joy gives place to sorrow, and nought is sung but the deeds of the warrior slain; a patriot nation bedews his grave with the tears of sincere regret; the patriot poet chaunts his praise, and the historian's pen engraves his deeds on the page of immortal fame.

The tomb of the brave—an ode,

IN COMMEMORATION OF THE DEATH OF GENERAL SWIFT.

When darkness prevailed, and loud in the air
No warbling was heard through the deep silence yelling,
Till fiery, like lions just wild from their lair,
Our Chiefs found the foe on their slumbers propelling;
While the mantle of night
Hid the Savage from sight,
Undismayed were our warriors slain in the fight,
But the laurel shall ever continue to wave,
And glory thus bloom o'er the tomb of the brave.

Brave Swift, legitimate offspring of talent and fame,
Though new to the war, rushed to battle undaunted
And ere, bearing death, the dread rifle's ball came,
In the breast of the foe off his weapon he planted, Gallant Swift adieu!
Teas thy destiny drew,
But yet o'er thy body shall tremble the yew,
For the laurel shall ever continue to wave,
And glory thus bloom o'er the tomb of the brave.

Great Pike, too bold from the fight to remain,
Rushed on to the foe every soldier's heart firing;
But he sinks, in the blood of his foes, on the curtain,
The pale lamp of life in its sockets expiring;
Closed in death are his eyes,
And laments he lies.
Yet o'er the sad spot shall no cypress arise.
But the laurel forever continue to wave,
And glory thus bloom o'er the tomb of the brave.

Long Warwick, McMahon, and Spencer, and Baen,
And Berry, 'mid darkness, their banners defended;
But when day drew the curtain of night they were seen Covered o'er with the blood of the Savage extended;
Though freedom may weep
Where they mouldering sleep,
Yet shall vaunt their death as a jubilee keep,
For the laurel shall ever continue to wave,
And glory thus bloom o'er the tomb of the brave.

Yet chiefs of the Britons, who gallantly fought,
And fearlessly heard the dread storm of war rattle;
Who lived to see conquest so terribly bought,
While your brothers were lost in the uproar of battle;
Still fearless remain,
And though stretched on the plain,
You shall rise on the records of freedom again,

For the laurel shall ever continue to wave,
And glory thus bloom o'er the tomb of the brave.

Ye sons of Columbia, when danger is nigh,
And liberty calls round her standard to rally,
For your country, your wives and your children to die,
Resolve undismayed on oppression to sally;
Every hero secure

That his fame shall endure,
Till eternity time in oblivion immerse,
For the laurel shall ever continue to wave,
And glory thus bloom o'er the tomb of the brave.
COLONEL D. Aid to GENERAL MOREAU.

Midshipman Cowan.

On James' Island, in the South Pacific Ocean, on the 10th of August, 1813, Midshipman JOHN S. COWAN, late of the United States' Navy. At the time of his decease, he was acting Lieutenant on board the United States' frigate Essex, to which post he had been temporarily appointed by his gallant commander, in consideration of his high professional merit, and his enthusiastic devotion to the service of his country.—He possessed in an eminent degree the esteem and confidence of his commander, and of his brother Officers generally, and gave the strongest indications of future greatness; in his profession promising at once to become an honor to his country and his family; but, alas! his destiny was otherwise ordered. An unhappy dispute with a brother officer, (Lieut. Gamble of the minnies) led on to a duel, in which fell the subject of this article. The intelligence of this distressing event occasioned the deepest regret in Captain Porter; no previous intimation of any misunderstanding between the parties had been received by him, or he would at once prevented the catastrophe that ensued. All that remained for him was to lament, what it was now too late to remedy, and to pay every mark of respect to his remains, which were entombed with the honors of war, on the Island before mentioned. In a strange and remote part of the world he fell; far, far from his kindred and his native soil; but his grave was hallowed by the tears of his countrymen, and his brave associates in arms. A neat and simple structure was raised to point out to the stranger who might visit the Island, the spot of earth where he remains rested; and on it were inscribed, by his friend, Lieutenant McKnight, the following monumental lines:—

Sacred to the Memory Of Lieutenant JOHN S. COWAN,
Of the U. S. frigate Essex,
Who died here, Anno. 1813,
Aged 21 years.
His loss is ever to be regretted
By his Country,
And mourned by his Friends
And Brother Officers.

Colonel Richard M. Johnson.

From the Democratic Press.

In the progress of the present war, the brilliant exploits of the naval heroes of independent America have claimed for them a distinguished and merited notice. Those of them who, covered with glory, have descended to the tomb, and those who live to receive the applause and honour of their country, have employed alike the pen of the biographer, the eloquence of the orator and the genius of the poet. It is the glory of our nation that instances of rival merit are not wanting in the military service. All the virtues which constitute the hero and the patriot have been there displayed with conspicuous lustre.

Why literary notice has not been extended to the latter in an equal degree we shall not now enquire; not however because we think the reason of difficult discovery. While a Pike, a Covington, and a Backus, whose honours bloom around their sepulchres, and a Shelby, a Desha, a Pierce, a Croghan, and a host of competers, who live to receive the grateful plaudits of their country, put in their strong claims for notice, our present object is to render an act of justice to a citizen, whom his country may well consider as eminent in the camp and in the cabinet. That citizen, is Colonel Johnson of Kentucky.

Colonel Johnson's father was one of the earliest settlers of that respectable state, who, with no other resources than a daring spirit and an independent mind, associated with a band of heroes to cultivate a luxuriant wilderness, and conquer its ferocious and hostile inhabitants. Colonel Johnson was among the first-born white natives of this favoured and fertile region. His infancy was rocked in the cradle of alarm and the extremest danger, and his breast had learned to glow with the fire of heroism ere yet his years had ranked him a man, and nothing but opportunity was wanting to demonstrate his devotion to his country. The father having to struggle with narrow means to rear and educate a numerous family, could form no other prospect for his son than that of fitting him to win his way by toilsome and persevering industry. At the green age of sixteen, Colonel Johnson's active and aspiring mind began to form other schemes more suited to give it scope and usefulness. He now parted with his father, almost against his will, entirely against his wishes, and, by alternate attention to business and study, qualified himself for the bar. In the mean time the independent and steady principles, and zeal for the public good, which shone forth in the opening mind of young Johnson lay not unnoticed by his fellow citizens. Even before he arrived at mature age their free and unbiased suffrages placed him in the legislature of his native state the first native born Kentuckian who had received that honour. On this theatre a new scene presented itself. Here he had to try his unfledged wings as a public debator, among a group of associates honourably distinguished for learning, experience and talents. Though, as a speaker, Colonel Johnson does not possess all the qualifications which form the accomplished orator, yet when his feelings, which have great susceptibility, are awakened, and his heart is engaged, he displays an animation and a force which will at all times command attention, and often leaves a deep impression. In the state legislature he acquired the esteem of many of his associates, and the respect of all. By his uprightness and activity he excited the best hopes of his constituents, and at the same time secured their confidence. Before his years made him eligible, he was chosen by them to congress. Entered on this new field, he found the foreground of opposition in the possession of men who joined to respectable talents great garrulous powers and considerable experience. He took his station in the majority, among able co-operators, with a fearless though modest spirit, and though in the ardor of intemperate party debates his generous indignation was often aroused, he was never found forgetful of the respect due to others and himself. The firm tone of mind and the increasing reputation of Mr. Johnson procured for him, what unfortunately, but too often follows merit—envy, malice and party rancour assailed him at home.—But there his was the good man's triumph. Both as a citizen and a public agent his assailants were taught to respect in him a steadiness and resolution no machinations could shake nor menaces intimidate. As a public debator he repelled the reproaches and refuted the calumnies of his antagonists with firmness, but also with decorum. Towards his countrymen he was liberal and respectful. His generous and was always commanded for his friends. No one more readily acknowledged the merit of others, or more cheerfully extended the hand of encouragement to his less experienced brethren.

At the commencement of the 12th Congress, when the disputes between this country and Britain had become incurable by any remedy but war, Colonel Johnson was among those who in argument assumed the responsibility of declaring for it with alacrity. In recounting the injuries England had done this country, he spoke of her instigation of the savages to hostility. "If," said Mr. John Randolph, in reply, "the gentleman from Kentucky will prove his assertions, I will join him in an expedition to 'Canada to avenge the wrong.'" At the succeeding session when proofs of the fact to demonstration had been multiplied, Colonel Johnson called on Mr. Randolph to redeem his pledge, but the call has as yet disregarded.

In the autumn of the year 1812, after Hull's shameful and traitorous sacrifice of his army, Colonel Johnson led a company of Kentucky volunteers under the command of General Harrison, to the relief of Fort Wayne. The foe having retired at the close of that campaign, the Colonel repaired to his seat in Congress, where he bestowed his usual unremitting attention to the subjects that came under deliberation, particularly on questions connected with the prosecution of the war, and on the celebrated question of remitting the merchant's bonds. Amidst these pursuits he found time, however, to add to his stock of military information. Before he left the seat of government he arranged with the Secretary of War, the plan of raising a thousand mounted volunteers to join the north western army, and carried away his commission in his pocket. On opening his rendezvous he had the gratification to realize his expectations in rallying his fellow-citizens around their country's standard. In the mean time he had been re-elected to Congress, and the session was about to open for the important purpose of laying taxes. His warmest friends seemed inclined to think he was bound to take his seat, and gave that opinion. He at the same moment was about to engage in a dangerous service, in a subordinate command, which might subject him to disagreeable responsibility and mortification. But his resolution was unalterably taken, and he repaired to the field, which for a long time promised few laurels. This time however was wisely employed in disciplining his corps, the important advantage of which was most happily illustrated in the battle of the Thames. The official letter of General Harrison to the Secretary of War, has made known how honorable a part the regiment has sustained in that conflict. The regulars of the enemy were vanquished at a single, though a desperate and hazardous charge. When the routed line of their savage allies was about to be rallied for a new conflict by their leader Tecumseh, Colonel Johnson seeing the necessity of a bold and instant onset, repaired to the spot where this force was assembling with a daring band of followers. Advancing, they received a most destructive fire from them, which deprived Colonel Johnson of his friend, the intrepid and venerable Colonel Wheatly, who fell by his side. After the fire but one man remained on horseback near the Colonel. This man escaped this imminent exposure unhurt. The Colonel himself was pierced with four bullets. At this instant he saw the savage chief (Tecumseh as since appears) present his rifle at his breast at not more than 12 yards distance. With a resolution rare in so great a peril, he faced his horse upon him and received the ball, by this change of posture, in his left hand. The savage drew his tomahawk, and the Colonel attempted to spur his horse to meet him. He wore a spur only on his left foot, and having received three gun shot wounds on his side, he was unable to use it. His horse too pierced with many wounds, advanced slowly upon his adversary. In these moments of danger, he, with heroic presence of mind, preserved his right arm from exposure, by keeping it close to his side. In that hand he carried a well charged pistol. The eyes of his antagonist were fixed upon him with the fiercest intent, and his hand in the act to throw his deadly weapon at five yards distance. For a moment the savage shrank with terror at this unexpected danger, and that moment the Colonel lodged its contents in his bosom. He fell, and his warriors gave up the contest instantly. Colonel Johnson now retired to his line for in this moment of peril, he had been in advance, faint with the loss of blood, which streamed from five wounds. The horse he rode expired, pierced with 15 bullets, and his coat was literally torn to tatters by the balls of the enemy.

During the return of the army the Colonel was exposed to an inclement and stormy sky, in an open boat for four days, descending to Portage in the state of Ohio. His uncomfortable situation and the torture arising from his inflamed wounds was such as truly to put a hero's soul to trial. On landing, however, painful as his case was, he resolved to prosecute his journey home without delay. By this step he hazarded little less than in the battle, though happily he effected it without material injury. On his return he had the gratification to be every where received with the utmost kindness and attention. It was controversy among his fellow-citizens who should give fealty and comfort to him as he passed. On the 12th of November he reached his residence, where he received that welcome from parents and friends that is the reward of merit and virtue. His recovery from his wounds was so rapid that on the 12th of February, he set out for the seat of government attended only by his servant. He started under much debility of body, but he continued to acquire strength during his journey which he performed in seventeen days. As he passed along wherever he was known, he was rewarded as became the brave. Arrived at the capital of the Union, not the gallant and fortunate Perry was hailed with more flattering approbation or more marked distinction. The naval hero had achieved the wreath of triumph without a wound, though he passed through perils that made the event little less than a miracle; but the military commander equally successful in vanquishing his country's enemies, bore on his mutilated frame the honourable testimony of the mighty dangers through which he had passed to victory. By a resolution and presence of mind never surpassed, he slew his ferocious adversary hand to hand, while the latter had greatly the advantage in weapon. His valorous deeds reflected not more lustre on his character than did the modesty with which he sustained his country's applause. In this the two illustrious competitors for fame were equal. That constancy of soul which bore them through doubtful battle, was equally conspicuous under the well-earned praise bestowed upon them by their grateful countrymen. Of five wounds received by Colonel Johnson, four were severe and dangerous. He survives, a monument of the wondrous goodness of a Guardian Providence. Deep and severe as his wounds have been, there is room for strong hope that he will eventually recover comfortable bodily vigour, and that he may long be useful to his country.

Major Montgomery.

From the Nashville Clarion.

While we congratulate the nation on the success which has crowned our arms, it is with no small emotion, that we record the untimely loss of the gallant Major LEMUEL P. MONTGOMERY, of the 39th regiment United States' Infantry, in the battle of Tehopisk.

His loss will be deplored, while departed greatness commands a tear. This was the first military exploit of our hero. He was a youth of about twenty-five years of age, and had just attained a stand of eminence and distinction at the bar. Possessed of a mind bold and energetic, and a genius that had begun to expand itself in all the richness of intellectual refinement, with prospects in life the most alluring and flattering, he abandoned his professional pursuits for the more immediate service of his country, and sought for renown in the rude din of arms. Military distinction had been the subject of his reveries, and the pride of his ambition. From him the highest expectations were entertained; and his amiable and regular deportment through life, excited the warmest interest in his success.

The greatest bravery was displayed in the tragic scene which closed his existence. He led on the assault at the head of his division, with a promptitude and decision of character which cannot be surpassed. So soon as he reached the breastworks, with his pistol he dispatched an Indian on the opposite side; in the act of scaling the walls he huzzared, and called on his men to press on—at that instant he received a ball through his head, which immediately terminated his existence; a placid smile reigned in his countenance, in the expiring moments of dissolution.

Another Montgomery has fallen! while virtue, patriotism and bravery are the pinions of immortality—the name of our Montgomery will be cherished in the bosoms of the good and great, and be handed to posterity as one of the heroes of the American Republic.

Capt. Ambrose Spencer.

It is with pain we have to announce the death of Captain AMBROSE SPENCER, jun. late aid-de-camp to major-general Brown. He died on Friday last, of the wounds he received at the battle of Bridgewater.

A correspondent offers the following tribute to the memory of this highly esteemed officer.

"One who has well known this young officer, especially since he has been one of the aids of major-general Brown, and knows from the best sources, somewhat of his gallant conduct in the army, and particularly in the battle of Niagara, in which he was, cannot forbear to offer a tribute; however inadequate, to his character and actions. The general with whom he has acted and suffered, will hereafter do him justice. He possessed by nature the most energetic mind, the most generous feelings, and amiable dispositions, polished and chastened by an excellent nurture and education; and cherished at home by a kind and indulgent father, and his fond relatives, he could find, but in his own breast and the evils of his country, motives sufficiently strong to urge him into a career of danger. In the hour of a most bloody conflict with a brave and veteran foe, the generous and noble motives of his bosom have found an ample exposition. Faithful to his trust and to his country, he neither feared nor avoided danger. Though few particulars of his late scene are known, it is understood that the moment of victory had almost arrived, when he received two wounds in his body which have proved mortal, and was carried from the field of battle."

The example which he has presented to his young countrymen, of prompt and active patriotism, and bravery in the service of his injured and insulted country, ought to press deep into their hearts, and never to be forgotten. If his career on earth is closed, his friends and his country will remember, that though short, it has been glorious—and his name and his deeds will be engraven on that ever-enduring tablet which preserves and perpetuates the fame of the fallen patriots and heroes of our country.

Captain A. F. Hull.

Among those who fell in the battle of Bridgewater, we lament to find recorded the name of Capt. ABRAHAM F. HULL, of the 9th regiment. Whether his death be considered in relation to his immediate friends, or as it regards the loss of a brave and valuable officer, the tear of pity will not cease to flow—the pang of regret will not be subdued.

In communicating departed worth, little is gained by stating that it was adorned by a classical education, or heightened by civil pursuits, other than the knowledge that the germ of well founded usefulness to our country is blighted—the fond hope of patriotism is disappointed. But to the community, a more instructive example is exhibited, when the qualities of the soul of a soldier are developed—the best feelings of our nature made known.

A heart imbued with a high sense of honor; animated by the most generous sentiments; regardless of self, but ever anxious for others—such was that of Hull's.

Since the last campaign, by a too well known occurrence, Captain Hull had been placed in a situation, delicate in the extreme. To return to that army where the honor of a beloved parent had been drawn in question, or to sink quietly into a private life, did not admit of doubt. He returned to the scene of danger, and fell, like his classmate Brooks, in the arms of victory.

Of his last moments nothing is known, but he who could distinguish himself for bravery in the bloody contest at Cornwall and Chippewa, certainly could not do otherwise on the fields of Bridgewater.

To an early friend, grief may be pardoned; while his example is a proud and useful excitement to emulation.—Boston Pat.

Major-General Izard.

The following letter, which embraces the outlines of General Izard's history, is from a gentleman who had the best opportunities of our recent information on the subject of which he writes.—Kent. Gaz.

July 22, 1814.

DEAR SIR,

You requested me to give you a sketch of General Izard's history. I therefore beg leave to communicate such particulars as present themselves to my recollection, and which are as follows:—

General George Izard was born at Charleston, in the month of September, 1777, and is the second son of Ralph Izard, Esq. who was a gentleman of large fortune and high respectability in South Carolina. Mr. Izard having been charged by Congress, during the revolution, with a secret mission to one of the courts of Europe, carried his family to Paris, where they resided until the peace of '83. Here George commenced his studies under the care of a private tutor in the family, and shewed great aptitude in the acquirement of classical learning. He was particularly distinguished for a turn for the mathematics, in which he made great proficiency at an early age. His father having returned with his family to America, at the conclusion of the war, was on the adoption of the federal constitution in 1789, elected to represent South Carolina in the Senate of the United States. He therefore removed to New-York, and entered George at Columbia College, where he was placed, on examination, at the head of his class, although the youngest boy in it. As he was always intended for a military life, his father obtained from the president in 1792, a subaltern's commission for him in the regiment of artillery and engineers, (as it was then called, with permission to send him to Europe for the purpose of qualifying himself for his profession. He was accordingly sent to England, under the care of General Thomas Buckerley, who was appointed minister plenipotentiary to the court of St. James. By General Fencible he was placed at a military school near London, from arrangements could be made for sending him to Germany, where the best military institutions were then supposed to be. He was after some time transferred to one of those institutions of great celebrity on the continent, where he passed two years. Great attention was there paid to the exercise of the body, in which the young American was soon found to excel; nature having endowed him with an uncommon portion of strength and activity. On Mr. Monroe's appointment as minister to France, his influence was used to obtain permission for young Izard to enter the corps of French engineers, and as the American government was then high in favor, the request was granted. This is said to be the only instance of a foreigner having been admitted into that corps. In this situation he had the best means afforded him of acquiring a knowledge of the most useful branch of military knowledge. Having completed his studies, and received from the officer at the head of the institution ample testimonials of approbation, he returned to America in the year 1797, and joined the regiment. On the commencement of hostilities between France and the United States, in 1798, captain Izard was appointed engineer for the harbour of Charleston, and erected with great despatch some work for its defence. In 1799, he was appointed aid-de-camp to the inspector-general (the late Alexander Hamilton) in which station he remained until the disputes between France and America were compromised by treaty. No active service offering at that time, captain Izard was indulged with a furlough to accompany our minister to the court of Lisbon, in the capacity of private secretary, but in reality to afford him an opportunity of travelling on the continent of Europe, various countries of which he visited. On his return to America in 1802, finding the army of the United States placed upon a very reduced establishment, captain Izard resigned his commission, married a lady from the state of Virginia, and fixed himself in the vicinity of Philadelphia, where he continued to reside until his nomination to the command of a regiment of artillery. With his subsequent rise you are acquainted. I have nothing to add but my warmest wishes for the general's success in discharging the duties of the important command to which he has been appointed.

The late Colonel Wilcocks.

Communicated to the editors of the Baltimore "American," by a friend of the deceased.

"There crack'd a noble heart"—Shaks.

To the friends of the brave, it is a sweet and consolatory reflection, that when they fall, in defence of their country, they sink into an honored grave, and honest fame rescues their memory from oblivion. Whilst kings are only regarded by number, or made memorable by crimes and desolation; whilst time breaks their sceptres and shakes their thrones; the names of the just survive the ruins, and history embalms their memory; posterity profit by their example, and their kindred feel a pride in having been related to the deceased. Such is my feeling, even while I discharge the "last sad office" to my departed friend.

Lieutenant-colonel Joseph Wilcocks, who fell at Fort Erie, in Upper Canada, on the 4th August, was a native of Dublin, where he was educated and lived to the year of manhood. An ardent friend of human rights, he became a member of the Society of United Irishmen, and endeavoured to bring about a reform of abuses. The task was beyond the might of that association—chronic errors in the state are like the filth of the Augean stable—iferendous powers are necessary to remove them. But failure in a laudable attempt is infinitely preferable to tameness under wrongs. Besides, men of true honour never calculate by the arithmetic of expediency—selfishness is pushed aside—and the justice of the cause alone is weighed, whilst the examples of the great are ever present to prompt congenial minds to parallel actions.

"How small I act is not the case,
But how would Brutus in my place,
In such a cause would Cato bleed,
And how would Socrates proceed?"

To a man governed by honour, and guided by reason, in matters of government, a British province must prove an unfit abode. Wilcocks, though adored by the people, who frequently elected him to represent them, was incessantly persecuted by the executive functionaries; and, finally, when denied the benefit of the laws by governors Gore and Bloek, he resolved to withdraw his allegiance from a government that had withdrawn its protection. He entered into the service of the United States, to which he took the oath of allegiance. His abilities were noticed and rewarded with a commission—and the hard-fought battles on the Niagara attest the fidelity and courage with which colonel Wilcocks and his Canadian volunteers discharged their trust. Colonel Wilcocks was a most promising officer. His face, his person and mien, his manner and deportment, commanded respect and engaged affection. Sagacious and enterprising, his sanguine temper always inspired confidence in his companions, the surest presage of victory. As if envious of his laurels, death cut short his career of glory. But the worthies in our second war for independence have ascended the skies to mingle with the heroes of the first—our likes, our Covingtons, and Wilcocks are united with the shades of Warren, Laurens and Montgomery. May their spirit, like the mantle of the prophet, descend on their admirers! And if spirits above are moved by scenes below, our illustrious friends will be saddened at the assurance that we swear by their glorious example, never to desert the cause for which they suffered, bled and died! We will pursue their path to partake of their honour.

Those only who dare for their country to fall,
Those only shall sleep with the brave.

The following extract from general orders, issued at Fort Erie by the commanding general, Sept. 7, 1814, will be acceptable to the friends of the gallant deceased.

HEAD-QUARTERS, Fort Erie, 6th September

General Order. The brigadier-general commanding has received the report of major Matteson, of the New-York volunteers, on whom devolved the command of the party engaged in the affair of the 4th instant, after the ever to be lamented fall of the gallant colonel Wilcocks.

With sincere pleasure the brigadier-general congratulates the army that the steadiness and valour which have marked the conduct of this division, during the whole campaign, were again most singularly manifested by the volunteers and regulars engaged on this occasion.

A party not exceeding 100 volunteers (the enemy being treble numbers) drove the enemy to his works, with comparatively a small loss, and made him suffer severely. Previous to this a detachment of 40 men from the 21st, under ensign Thomas, had successfully skirmished with the enemy.

The conduct of major Matteson on this occasion, excites the highest approbation of the brigadier-general; his coolness, courage and prudence, and the good conduct of his troops, were again conspicuously manifested. The New-York volunteers have, on this occasion, as well as every other that has occurred during the whole campaign, reflected honour on the state of which they are members. Captain Hale, of the 11th infantry, commanding picket No. 2, and ensign Thomas, commanding the regulars conducted in a manner to the perfect satisfaction of the brigadier-general. The loss on our side, with the exception of the gallant Wilcocks and lieutenant Roosevelt, is trifling; but on the side of the enemy, it was severe in the extreme: various deserters report that they had four officers and nearly 100 either killed or wounded to great a disparity of forces in the strongest light the difference between the coolness of troops, such as ours, in a just and honourable career, and of the enemy's thousands, who fight for objects which they care not for, and in a cause which they deprecate.

Major Matteson speaks in the highest terms of the courage and conduct of captains Hull, Harding, Knap and Satterly, who volunteered to command a company, and lieutenants Hothaway and Jones, and ensign Wickwire; he also expresses his highest opinion of the correct, brave and soldier-like conduct of brigade-major Dobbin, quartermaster Green and adjutant Gilbert.

Lieutenant-colonel Wilcocks, whose services and bravery have excited the warmest interest of the army in his favour, and lieutenant Roosevelt, of the New-York volunteers, have added other names to the gallant heroes, who, during this unexampled campaign, have gloriously died on the field of honour. Colonel Wilcocks, at the moment he was mortally wounded, was charging and repulsing infinitely superior force under the enemy's battery; the criminal devolving on major Matteson, he succeeded in driving the enemy to their works, and retired in good order to camp.

By command of Brigadier-general Ripley,

R. JONES, assist. adj. gen.

Colonel John B. Campbell.

Communicated for the Lexington Reporter.

A regard for the character and personage of Colonel John B. Campbell, and a great surprise which has existed with the writer of the present article, on account of the remarkable silence which has pervaded his numerous friends, has induced him, though sensible of his incapacity to do justice to departed merit, to enter upon the arduous task of paying him the last tribute of respect.

It was my hope, that the duty had devolved upon some person more capable of portraying the character of this man, but for fear that too long an uninterrupted silence may consign him to unmerited obscurity I will enter upon the duty. Were it my wish, it is not in my power to submit a detail of his character from his infancy to the time of his death; it will suffice to say, that in his private capacity, he was a lawyer of no little respectability.

I will begin at the time when he first entered upon his public career, and when the superiority of his talents as an officer, first began to draw upon the world. At the commencement of the present war beholding with sorrow the insults and injuries which had been inflicted upon his country by an implacable adversary, and frowning indignantly upon the sufferings of his unhappy countrymen in captivity and in torment, immediately on its declaration he applied for a commission in the army. In this he succeeded, and received the appointment of lieutenant-colonel of the 19th regiment United States' infantry. He had now arrived to the summit of his wishes. The time had now come when the natural bend of his mind could be exercised, and when he in common with his brother officers, could have the power of displaying his talents in the field, and avenging the numerous insults of his country. But in this he could not be said to be satisfied. He was placed as superintendent to the recruiting service. In this situation his patriotic bosom could not resist the emotions which agitated it, and the anxieties which it experienced. It could not resist inactivity, and having received an order from the war department to repair to more active duties, he entered the service of his country under the command of that inestimable and gallant officer, William Henry Harrison. In leaving his peaceable abode in Christian county, (Ky.) he had many weighty concerns to haffle him; many important considerations to combat with. But notwithstanding the agonizing tears of a tender wife and numerous contempts, which moved in some measure his calm breast, he was desirous to partake in the noble contest, and have his name enrolled with those of the heroes who have so ennobled and immortalized their country's cause; he was desirous to pave the way to the acquirement of that fame for which his breast so ardently sought, and which his relations had so justly acquired in the war of the revolution.

Here consisted his greatest fault—he was too anxious for military fame, and to acquire it, he would too often sacrifice any personal considerations.

No sooner had he joined general Harrison but his talents were appreciated by his commander, and his attachment manifested to him by a separate command being assigned shortly after to him on a secret expedition to the Massissiniwa villages. Here if difficulties can be encountered, colonel Campbell and his gallant detachment did it. They left Frankinton in November, 1812, and on the 17th after, having marched all night, arrived at one of the Indian towns, and instantly charged upon it. In this affair he killed 7 and took 37 prisoners, only with the loss of one man killed. He was attacked on the morning of the 12th December, by a party of Indians supposed to be between two and three hundred, in which action he lost about 8 killed and 25 or 30 wounded, and killed between 40 and 50 of the enemy, not making any calculations for those that were carried off the field. He writes to general Harrison from his camp on Massissiniwa, two miles above Silver Heels, under date of the 12th December, and concludes thus—"I anticipate another attack before I reach Greenville; but rest assured dear general, they shall be warmly received. I have a detachment composed of the finest fellows in the world, both officers and soldiers. Our return will be commenced this morning." &c.

Fortunately for the colonel, his anticipations were not realized. The Indians had formed a plan of attacking him every night, which, if they had executed, the whole detachment would inevitably have perished; but fortune favoured him, and on his return he was received with all the applause which his fellow-citizens could bestow. But his conduct was particularly noticed by his general, which was evinced in a general order, which follows:—

"The conduct of the colonel and his gallant detachment has been, in every respect, such as the general had anticipated. They have deserved well of their country, and have shed a lustre on the North Western army. In no part of their duty have they failed. The officers vied with each other in setting a proper example to their men, and the conduct of the men was marked throughout by cheerfulness, alacrity and obedience upon the march, and invincible bravery in the presence of an enemy. The detachment appears to have been worthy of their commander, and their commander worthy of them. Nothing can evince more clearly the merits of lieutenant-colonel Campbell, than the confidence and attachment manifested for him by his commander; an attachment not produced by any improper indulgence or weak compliances, but established upon a solid basis of a zealous and punctual discharge of his own duty, and a mild, humane, but determined exaction of obedience from his subordination. Troops thus disposed, and thus commanded, will be always invincible. Lieutenant-colonel Campbell's official report will be transmitted to the secretary of war; it will be published to the world, and the simple narrative of their actions will form the best eulogium upon the conduct of the troops. The general requests lieutenant-colonel Campbell, lieutenant-colonel Simrall, and major Ball, and all the other officers, non-commissioned officers and privates, to accept his warmest thanks for their good conduct." &c.

Shortly after, he obtained a furlough and visited his family, then residing in Russellville, (Ky.) On his arrival there, he was welcomed with a public dinner, and every mark of joy and respect, so justly due to his distinguished services, was paid to him. But not long was he permitted to remain inactive, enjoying the sweet solaces of domestic tranquillity. His furlough having expired, he repaired again to join the standard of his country. Here nothing of importance transpired. He was shortly after brevetted a colonel for his gallant conduct at Massissiniwa; and continued inactive, with only superintending the recruiting service at Chillicothe. After remaining here some time, in March he received an order to repair to Fort Erie. But, unable to remain inactive, in whatever situation he might be placed, he left Fort Erie on the last day of April, on an expedition to Long Point, or Dover, to destroy some manufacturing mills belonging to the enemy. On his return, he was very much reprehended by some of his fellow-citizens, as having wilfully destroyed private property. On the 13th June, 1814, he left Erie for Buffalo, when he ordered a court of inquiry upon his conduct.—On the 11th of June the court met. Brigadier-general Scott presided, and major Jessup and major Wood were members; here follows some extracts from the opinion of the court:—"That considering the important supplies of bread stuffs, which from the evidence, it appears the enemy's forces derived from the flour manufacturing mills at and near Dover, Colonel Campbell was warranted in destroying those mills, according to the laws and usages of war, and for a like reason the court think him justified in burning the distilleries under the said laws and usages. The saw mills and carding machine, from their contiguity to the other mills, were, as the court conceive, necessarily involved in one and the same building.

"In respect to the burning of the dwelling and other houses in the village of Dover, the court are fully of opinion that Colonel Campbell has erred; that he can derive no justification from the fact that the owners of those houses were actively opposed to the American interests in the present war, or from the other facts, that some of them were at the conflagration of Buffalo, &c.

"Acts of retaliation on the part of a nation proud of its rights, and conscious of the power of enforcing them, should, in the opinion of the court, be reluctantly resorted to, and only by instructions from the highest authority. That no such instructions were given in the case under consideration, is not merely inferred from the absence of evidence to that effect, but is candidly admitted by Colonel Campbell in his official report (which is in evidence) wherein he expressly states:—'This expedition was undertaken by me without orders and upon my own responsibility.'

"The court in delivering the above opinion unfavourable to Colonel Campbell, are fully aware of the strong incentives to a just indignation which must have been present upon his mind at the time of his visit to Dover. The massacres at Raisin and the Miami were not forgotten, and the more recent devastation of the entire Niagara frontier, accompanied by many acts of savage barbarity, was full in remembrance. That these recollections should have swayed his judgment does not excite wonder but regret, and there is still left for admiration his kind and amiable treatment of the women and children of Dover, abandoned by their natural protectors.

"W. SCOTT, brigadier-general, and president of the court.

R. WATSON, captain 5th infantry, recorder."

After his acquittal he was appointed colonel and commandant of the 11th regiment infantry, then stationed at Buffalo. This appointment was received with that manifestation of joy on the part of himself and family, that a removal from a state of inactivity to that of active operations would naturally excite in the patriot's breast. The warmest wishes of his soul were now fulfilled. His heart palpitates with animation at the lively scenes which seem to present themselves. He beholds before him the wide field of honour, of fame and of military glory; he embraces the opportunity and glides into their arms. The post of danger is the post of honour, and the post of honour is the soldier's need; he is now advancing when dangers will meet him and honours crown him.

At length the ever memorable 5th July approaches. Here is ample scope for the writer's pen; would to God mine were adequate to the task. That day which eclipses the proud trophies of the revolution, and which is to crown with success the American arms, while opposing the veterans of the celebrated marquis, appears—that day, which is to crown in glory the fair characters of Columbia's sons, whose expansive dawn opens with brilliancy the rays which but yesterday had beheld the happy day of Columbia's deliverance, ends with success to American valour, and she is once more triumphant over the ranks of Britain. But, there a Brown, a Scott and a Ripley fought—there heroic spirits received the good auspices of Heaven, and victory perched upon the eagle's standard.

But it was there a Campbell fell! It was on the plains of Chippewa, on the 5th of July, 1814, that the fertile earth drank in profusion his precious blood. He was shortly after carried off the field, almost fainting with the loss of blood. His wound was a severe fracture of the knee pan, but not at first considered dangerous—he was unwilling that it should be amputated, and for some time resisted the pain, but at length it became essential that an amputation should take place, and he yielded. But, alas! he yielded too late. High fevers had occasioned considerable reduction in his flesh, and had exhausted his appetite, and he died! It was at Williamsville, near Buffalo, (N. Y.) on the 28th August, 1814, that his patriotic, undaunted spirit winged its flight to more genial regions—and he left his memory to be revered by all who knew him.

We will conclude these desultory remarks, by adding a letter addressed to John Campbell, of Richmond, (Va.) from major-general Scott, dated BALTIMORE, October 25th, 1814.

"Colonel John B. Campbell, of the 11th United States infantry, died about the first of September, at the general hospital, Williamsville, near Buffalo, of a wound received in the knee pan, at Chippewa in the action of the 5th July. My own situation, at the time of his death, deprived me of the melancholy satisfaction of being the first to communicate the intelligence to his friends—and I am much concerned to hear that that office was not performed by some one about him at the time.

"The wound was received early in the action, at the head of his regiment, whilst advancing gallantly to his place in the order of battle; and was by no means considered as necessarily mortal. An early amputation would have saved his valuable life; but this was opposed by the colonel himself from an extreme solicitude to preserve the limb. The operation was finally performed, and the patient had become too feeble and exhausted—he died immediately after. I was at the time more than an hundred miles from Williamsville. The latter particulars were reported to me by the very skilful surgeon who attended him.

"Colonel Campbell's death, though lamented by all who knew him, was felt by no one so much as the army, more sensibly than myself. His services at Massimus were very highly appreciated by the government; and from his zeal and intelligence, there can be no doubt, had he lived, but he would have risen to the highest rank in the army.

"I am, sir, with great respect, your most obedient servant,
W. SCOTT.

"John Campbell, esq. Richmond, (Va.)"

Here eulogium finishes its career. He died with the apple of his general, conscious of having effected the attainment of an object he first had in contemplation, that of being useful to country, and leaving his name to be enrolled with those of heroes. His eyes are no more open to behold, in common with the world, the series of victories in which it would have been a delight to have partaken. But although his loss may have been felt by his country and relations, yet it is something to console that, altho' it is laid in its silent subterraneous tomb, his survivors, his memory yet lives.

Elbridge Gerry, Esquire,

LATE VICE-PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES

From the Boston Patriot.

Elbridge Gerry was born in the town of Marblehead, (Mass.) the year 1744. His father was a respectable merchant, with handsome fortune. He entered Harvard College early and received his first degree of bachelor of arts in 1762.

On leaving the seminary, he commenced business as a merchant; and his correctness, assiduity and extensive information enabled him to prosecute commercial pursuits with success. His mind, however, was much occupied with the interesting politics of the then colony; and as soon as his age would permit, he elected by his native town to the general court, and became an active and influential member. The business, in those days, was principally prepared in committees, and Mr. Gerry was associated with Adams, Hancock, Warren and others on most of the important ones. When hostilities commenced, he was a member of the committee of public safety and supplies, and gained both credit and public gratitude by his talents and industry. An interesting anecdote is related of Mr. Gerry and some of his countrymen, which occurred the day preceding the battle of Lexington, which commenced the revolutionary contest. The committee had been sitting at Cambridge, and as Mr. Gerry, with colonels Adams and Orue, were far from home, they determined to remain the morning. In the middle of the night they were alarmed by the march of the main body of the British troops for Concord. The troops came opposite the house, a detachment was immediately ordered to surround it, and seize any of the committee who might remain. Fortunately, though with difficulty, Mr. Gerry and his companions escaped in their shirts, and concealed themselves till the search was over.

Mr. Gerry was the intimate friend of the illustrious George Warren—the night before the eventful contest of Bunker's the patriots passed together, in the same bed, and with a cheerful presentiment of his fate, the last words addressed to him, the subject of our memoir, were,

"Dulce et decorum est,

Pro patria mori—

"It is sweet and becoming to die for our country."

Mr. Gerry, about this time, was appointed judge of the admiralty, but declined accepting the office, declaring his wish to take a more active part in the service of his country. He was subsequently elected to the illustrious congress, who granted our national independence, signed the declaration of it in 1776, and continued a member during the whole war. In the elegant language of a writer to whom we have alluded—"In congress, as in the signature, the assiduity, attention and extensive information of this gentleman, caused him to be placed on all important committees; and his advice and opinion was respected as the deliberate decision of an unswerving patriot. No difficulties deterred him, no danger dismayed him. In the most trying moments his courage and constancy remained unshaken, and his determination never for a moment wavered to protect the independence, and maintain the freedom of his country. In congress Mr. Gerry, the soldier's friend, Gen. Washington, depended on no one with more confidence for the promotion of his plans, than on this gentleman, and his confidence was never disappointed. His speech in favour of compensation to the army, was considered one of the most powerful and splendid specimens of eloquence and patriotism on all subjects of finance. Mr. Gerry was able and eminent; his clear and penetrating mind could unravel the perplexing system confused and entangled, and his invention and ingenuity draw forth the resources and ability of his country." The great merit in the revolutionary congress general Washington, president Adams and other distinguished patriots have borne an equivalent and honorable testimony.

In the convention which framed the constitution, Mr. Gerry appeared as a member from Massachusetts. Although convinced that a more energetic system than the confederation was needed, yet the propositions of general Hamilton, of a monarchical and aristocratical cast, found in him a stern and strenuous opponent. Educated a republican, he would not bend to a single proposition, which tended to aristocracy. The result did not meet his wishes, and he was constrained to refuse his signature. It is remarkable, that some of the points for which he contended, have since been approved by the people and incorporated as amendments. Being chosen soon after as a member from Middlesex, he took occasion to remark in debate, that "the federal constitution having become the supreme law of the land, he conceived the salvation of the country depended on its being carried into effect." He continued in congress for two successive terms, and then declined a reelection.

To end the sui generis controversy with France, which comprised a war, in fact on both sides, without a declaration by either, president Adams appointed Mr. Gerry, in conjunction with Messrs. Pinkney and Marshall, to constitute a commission plenipotentiary to France in 1793. The acceptance of the office was a sacrifice of domestic comfort for a precarious chance of benefiting his country. We would, in a tribute to the patriot dead, tread lightly on such delicate ground as the motives of living statesmen. Suffice it to say, two of the ministers were supposed more willing to widen, than to close the breach. Mr. Adams, the ostensible idol of the then dominant party, shall be our witness of what was done by the illustrious object of our article. "He [Mr. Gerry, says Mr. A.] was appointed and approved, and finally saved the peace of the nation, for he alone discovered and furnished the evidence, that X, Y, and Z, were employed by Talleyrand, and he alone brought home the direct, formal and official assurances, upon which the subsequent commission proceeded, and peace was made."

When the American spirit was roused, and all parties united to resent the insulting attack by the British man of war Leopard, on the United States frigate Chesapeake, on the 22d of June, off the Capes of Virginia, Mr. Gerry participated in the justly excited state of public sensibility, attended at the state-house in Boston, was called to the chair, and gave an evidence of his patriotism, and an epitome of his principles, in the memorable expression, that if a man had but one day to live, he should "devote that day to the service of his country."

With this exception, so honorable to his character for the period of his return from France until 1810, he spent his time in philosophic retirement and agricultural pursuits, at his farm in Cambridge. In the spring of that year he was run as governor by the republicans of Massachusetts against Mr. Gore, and chosen by a handsome majority. Of his official conduct as governor, it is difficult to speak, without weakening, perhaps, that spirit of political asperity, which we hope may sleep forever. Suffice it to say, his speeches to the legislature were wise, patriotic and elegant; that he was a strenuous advocate of the union of the states, and a cheerful aid of, and co-operation of the national government, for public purposes; that the first year of his administration was marked by a most liberal and unprecedented political toleration; and that in the second year, the appointments of a proportionate number of his political friends to public offices, was grounded on vacancies created by enacted laws, which laws, we verily believe, abstractedly considered, would be granted as expedient by men of all descriptions. But we leave a topic on which we should fear to profane the obsequies of the dead by raising the spirit of altercation. The party opposed to him in the state prevailed. His country recognized his merits and his services, and elevated him to the second station in her gift. He conducted himself in that station with dignity and devoted attention to his duties, and he has died at his post in the discharge of his functions.

Of the private life of this gentleman, it is enough to say, he was respected, esteemed and beloved by those who knew him best. The sacrifices he made to public service, were very great; and although we know not the fact, so well as to venture its positive assertion, we apprehend his patriotism might have left him,

"Like rigid Cincinnatus, holly poor."

Our article has extended beyond our originally proposed limits. We will study brevity and conclude by saying, that while this patriot has descended to the grave "full of years, and full of honors," he has left his example as a legacy to his country; and if it be followed, if public virtue, at this trying time, become the order of the day, the American name may become even more illustrious, and the Eagle of the Union soar

FROM THE WESTMINSTER MAGAZINE.

GENUINE MEMOIR OF

General Joseph Reed,

Who was in the service of the United States during the American revolution.

Mr. REED was a native of New-Jersey, in North-America, and received a liberal education at the college founded at Princeton in that state, which has furnished a considerable number of eminent characters. He entered very early on the study of the law, and came to England to finish his professional education, when he entered in the society of the Middle Temple. About the time of the stamp act he returned to America (not having been called to the bar here) and practised with considerable success. He bore some part in the proceedings respecting the stamp act, but at too early an age to be much distinguished. In 1770 he returned to England, and married the daughter of Dennis de Berdt, esq; merchant, of London; a lady to whom he was contracted during his former residence in England.* After a short stay he returned, and settled in Philadelphia, where he pursued his practice with reputation and success; having attachments in England, and dreading the fatal consequence of a rupture, we are assured he exerted himself in the work of conciliation, and particularly in a correspondence with persons then in power; a circumstance which afterwards subjected him to some suspicion and censure in his own country, though the intercourse was broken off on the commencement of hostilities in America.

During the winter of 1775, he had been appointed chairman of the grand committee of Philadelphia, and soon after president of the convention of the province, which were his first appearances in any public character. Upon the formation of the American army, he assumed a military character, and accompanied general Washington to the camp before Boston, as a volunteer, but served also as its secretary, in which capacities he acquired a great share of his confidence and friendship. In the spring of 1776, he was, at his special instance, appointed adjutant-general of the American army, on the promotion of general Gates, and bore an active part in this important campaign, particularly in the affairs at Trenton and Princeton, which changed the face of the war. On these occasions, it is said, his knowledge of the country and its inhabitants, rendered his services very important. When the armies settled in winter quarters, he resigned his commission of adjutant-general, which was not so well suited to his active disposition, and in the spring following was appointed a general officer, with a view to the command of the cavalry; but the slowness in raising them, and the very detached parties in which they were employed, prevented his acting in this station. He continued, however, with the army, and was much consulted in the operations of the campaign. In the latter end of the year 1777, or early in 1778, he was appointed a member of congress, and employed in the arrangements of the army. At this time he signed the articles of confederation of the United States, as one of the delegates of Pennsylvania. On the arrival of the British commissioners, a certain governor, (Johnson) tempted him with the offer of 10,000 guineas, and the best office in the colonies to join the British interests, to which he replied, "he was not worth purchasing, but such as he was, the king of England was not rich enough to do it." This transaction occasioned a resolve of congress, to do no business with that commissioner.

This overture being publicly denied by that gentleman, was proved by the voluntary declaration on oath, of the persons thro' whom it was made, with several particulars, and published both in Europe and America. In autumn, 1778, he was unanimously chosen president, or governor, of the state of Pennsylvania, to which office he was unanimously elected, with like unanimity, for three years, the time limited by law. During this time, there were great commotions and parties in the state, and particularly a most violent armed insurrection, which he suppressed, and rescued a number of his personal enemies from the most imminent danger of their lives, at the risk of his own; upon which he received the thanks of the legislature. He was also instrumental in quieting the remarkable mutiny of part of the army of 1781. Soon after he lost his wife†. Upon this, and the expiration of his public office, he returned into private life, and the duties of his profession. He was not considered among the opulent of the country before the war, and most probably must have suffered with others in its various effects. Mr. Reed was very fortunate during the war; for, though in almost every considerable engagement, and having three horses killed under him, he always escaped unhurt.

In the civil part of his character, his knowledge of the law was found very useful in a new and unsettled government; so that he found it in no small weakness and confusion; he left it at the expiration of his office, in as much tranquillity and energy as could be expected from the time, and the peculiar circumstances of the war.

* This gentleman, Mr. De Berdt, was their agent for Massachusetts Bay, and distinguished for his warm and faithful zeal in behalf of America.

† A lady, in whom it is difficult to say, whether beauty, talent or virtue, were most conspicuous.

FROM THE WEEKLY MESSENGER.

Lieutenant John G. Cowell,

Late of the United States' Navy.

JOHN GLOVER COWELL was born at Marblehead, in the county of Essex, and state of Massachusetts, on the 11th September, 1786. His grand-father, the honourable John Glover, whose name he bore, was a brigadier-general in our revolutionary war, and possessed in a great degree the esteem and confidence of the immortal Washington. This brave man was induced, in the year 1778 by ill health, and the repeated solicitations of a numerous family, to request a dismissal from that service, to which he had long been attached by the strongest ties of patriotism. The reply of general Washington to his letter communicating this request, is the highest eulogium on his distinguished merits as an officer. "Excuse me, sir," says Washington, "if I hesitate to give my concurrence in the desire you express of quitting the army. I have too high an opinion of your valor as an officer to do any thing which may contribute to your relinquishing that character. My earnest wish is, that you may continue in it."

This letter dissuaded general Glover from resigning his commission, and notwithstanding the many inconveniences he suffered, and the many domestic sacrifices he was compelled to make, he continued in the service of his country, till she was established in a respectable rank among the nations of the earth. He then left the honours of the field for the peaceful joys of domestic life. There was, however, but little happiness reserved for him here; the fatigue and duties of a soldier's life had so enfeebled a constitution naturally vigorous and strong, that the days of his retirement were one continued scene of sickness and confinement. He lived but a few years, and then descended to the grave, happy in the recollection that his country was free from the yoke of foreign bondage, and that her liberty was partly the effect of his brave and patriotic exertions.

The eldest daughter of this brave officer, was the mother of the subject of the following biographical sketch. She was married in the year 1778, to captain Richard Cowell, a man of whom his contemporaries speak in the highest terms of veneration. Early in the revolution, he held successively the command of several private armed vessels, and was celebrated in that capacity, for the many valuable prizes he captured, and for the undaunted courage and invincible firmness which he manifested on every occasion. Many of his companions, who still survive, recount with admiration the gallant achievements of this heroic man; and the many signal proofs he gave of his coolness and intrepidity as a naval commander, entitle him to a very conspicuous rank among the heroes of our revolution.

At one time, while commander of a ship of sixteen guns, he fell in with an enemy's ship of twenty-two, and nearly double the number of men. Though aware of the vastly superior force of his opponent, he was determined to engage her, and after a desperate battle of forty-two minutes, succeeded in capturing her. On board captain Cowell's ship there was but one man slightly wounded, while the enemy had twenty-three killed and wounded.

In the year 1780, he had the command of another ship called the Marquis, mounting sixteen guns, a great part of which were small four-pounders. While on a cruise, he fell in with a letter of marque ship of the enemy mounting twenty-four guns, and with a complement of men far superior in numbers to his own. Relying, however, on the spirit and bravery of his officers and crew, he laid his ship along side the enemy, and continued there for the space of six glasses. So near were they to each other in this situation, that the sponges were frequently taken from each other while in the act of loading, and one man is now living in Marblehead, who was nearly taken out of the port, at which he was stationed, by one of the crew of the enemy. This gallant and heroic action deserved a fortunate result; but the enemy, after having expended all his ammunition, hauled off from his opponent, and the disabled state of the spars and rigging of captain Cowell's ship, prevented his pursuing her. She was taken, however, soon after, in a sinking condition by a small sloop, and proved a very valuable prize.

These are but a few of the gallant actions which distinguished the naval career of captain Cowell. Would the limits of this notice permit, we could mention many others, whose splendor would not be rivalled by those of modern days. But having already trespassed on the patience of our readers, by giving a hasty sketch of the ancestors of lieutenant Cowell, we hasten to record a few circumstances of him, who in an eminent degree possessed the gallantry, firmness and bravery of his fathers.

Lieutenant Cowell, at an early period, manifested a predilection for the life of a sailor. But his friends, unwilling that he should encounter its perils and dangers at so early an age, made every exertion to restrain his attachment, and accordingly placed him, when only eleven years old, at a store in Boston. Naturally aspiring and ambitious of distinction, he found that the dull routine of his present business was but badly calculated to realize his hopes of future eminence, and he again determined on carrying into effect his first resolution of becoming a sailor. He accordingly overcame the objections of his friends, and sailed at the age of eleven with captain Derby, from Boston, for the North-West Coast of America.

During this voyage, which exceeded three years, he applied himself closely to the study of naval tactics, and returned well qualified for the promotion, which he shortly after experienced. At the age of eighteen, he was mate of a vessel in the merchant service, and continued in this business till the close of the year 1807. While engaged in this service, his character as a scientific navigator and practical seaman, stood unrivalled; and from his having visited almost every country in Europe, his knowledge of the world was very extensive, and his deportment as a gentleman perfectly unblemished.

He resided at this period about a year with his friends, and being prevented by the first embargo from following his usual occupation, determined on petitioning for a birth in the navy. He accordingly received in January, 1809, a sailing-master's warrant, and was ordered to the command of a gun-boat on the Portland station, whither he immediately repaired. The gun-boat service, however, was to lieutenant Cowell excessively tedious; he could not bear the idea of being confined to the navigation of creeks and rivers; his aspiring mind sought for a more extensive field of action, and he earnestly wished to be removed from a service, which limited his exertions and darkened his prospects.

In this respect, he was soon gratified. The gun-boat on that station were dismantled, and he was ordered to the Chesapeake frigate, then commanded by captain Hull. He continued on board this ship till she was hauled up in ordinary at Charlestown, and though attached to her for only a few months, his superior qualifications as an officer, and his skill as a navigator, secured him the approbation and attachment of his gallant commander. Having now no immediate employment, he petitioned for a furlough, which was granted. After an absence of nearly eighteen months in different parts of Europe, he again returned, and was ordered to the United States brig Enterprise, then lying at Norfolk. He continued on board this vessel for a few months, and was then transferred to the Essex.

It is not on board his ship that we are to consider with attention the character and services of lieutenant Cowell. No opportunity had yet been presented in which he could display to the world the leading features of his character; but it was reserved for the deck of his ship to be sprinkled with his blood, and for her officers to witness the gallant conduct and heroic death of their brave companion.

Early in 1812, lieutenant Cowell left his friends—and, as it has since proved, left them forever. He joined the Essex at New-York, and sailed in July on a cruise, in which she captured the sloop of war Alert. He arrived in the Delaware about the middle of September; but his time was so much engaged in attending to his ship, that he could not, at this time, revisit his family. He accordingly continued at Chester, and sailed the 27th of October, on a cruise, which terminated in her capture.

Soon after her departure, captain Porter, as a testimony of his regard for the distinguished merits of lieutenant Cowell, promoted him to the third lieutenancy. This is only the third instance of a promotion's being made in our navy, from the grade of a sailing-master to that of a lieutenant; and if there ever was an officer who deserved this distinction, we sincerely think it was he, who at this time received it.

In the Pacific Ocean, lieutenant Cowell was ordered to the command of a cutter, at the time when the boats of the Essex captured the letter of marque ships Policy and Georgiana. His conduct in this bold achievement, as well as that of his brother officers, gave to their commander an earnest of that gallantry and firmness, which they afterwards so signally displayed.

Nothing remarkable occurred during the remainder of his cruise, till the 2d of March, when the Essex was attacked and overpowered by a superior force of a frigate of 53 guns and a sloop of 28. The particulars of the gallant resistance of her officers and crew at this time have been fully detailed in captain Porter's official letter, and they need no other record to establish their claim to the character of brave and intrepid heroes.

In the early part of the engagement, lieutenant Cowell received a slight wound; and having it dressed, repaired a second time to his station. He had been here but a short time, when a second shot badly wounded him in the leg. He continued at his post in this situation, till loss of blood rendered him insensible; he was then carried below and placed under the care of the surgeon. After the battle he was carried on shore, and his leg amputated; his wound, however, was soon ascertained to be incurable, and after suffering its pain with exemplary fortitude for the space of twenty-one days, he expired in the presence of his gallant companions. "He was buried," says captain Porter in a letter to his friends, "in the most splendid manner, and all the honour that could be bestowed and shewn upon the tomb of the brave, was shown to him. His worth must ever be remembered by his country, and her regret for the loss of so valuable an officer be commensurate to his merits."

* In the Port Folio of September last, we find the following notices of the death of lieutenant Cowell, and of the honours paid to his memory:

"When lieutenant John Cowell had his leg shot off, he was taken up to be carried below; but peremptorily refusing to go, he gave directions that he should be placed on the coinnings of his hatch-way, where he continued to give his orders with his usual composure, until he had lost so much blood, as to be almost insensible. When prevailed on at length to be removed to the cock-pit, he insisted on waiting his turn, before he would suffer his wounds to be dressed. This extraordinary heroism and generosity were the cause of so great a loss of blood, as proved fatal to that distinguished officer."

"The case of lieutenant Cowell excited in Valparaiso the liveliest interest. The whole city most feelingly and deeply sympathized in his suffering and lamented his fate."

"When that brave young officer died, captain Porter was absent on business at St. Jago, the capital of Chili. This, however, detracted nothing from the splendor of his funeral. His heroism had made every one his friend, and his mourner. He was buried with the most distinguished honours, both military and civil, that the place could afford. All the American and British officers, the crews of the Essex and Essex Junior, of the Phoebe and Cherub, and of every other vessel in port, joined to swell the funeral procession."

"But the chief pomp that was displayed on this solemn and interesting occasion, arose from the attention of the inhabitants of the place. It would be scarcely hyperbolic to say, that the ashes of the gallant Cowell were revered by the tears of all Valparaiso. The concourse of Spaniards, headed by the governor of the district, and a large military escort, was immense."

"Followed by this vast and magnificent procession, and attend 1 by solemn music and lighted tapers, the remains of the hero were carried to the principal church in the city. Here, after having exposed to public view for two days, shrouded in elegant funeral apparel, they were interred in consecrated ground within the walls of the building, an honour never before conferred on a stranger in that part of the world."

Lieutenant Cowell has left an amiable widow and two children, whose claims on the gratitude of our country, we trust, will not be disregarded. To them the loss will be irreparable; but if they find any consolation for the loss of an affectionate husband and father, it will be in the recollection, that his life, though short, was unblemished, and that his grave was hallowed by the tears of those brave companions who survived him. There will be the happy reflection, that his name will ever stand high on the list of heroes, who have established the naval character of our country, and that his virtues and abilities will ever be cherished in the remembrance of her grateful sons.

Lieutenant-Colonel Appling.

From the Georgia Argus.

AMONG the many heroic souls who have conspicuously distinguished themselves during the present just and holy contest, Lieutenant-colonel Appling, from this state, deserves to be particularly noticed. His conduct has been marked by a daring bravery and consummate skill that demands our warmest approbation.

Twice has it been the good fortune of young Appling to come in contact with the enemy, and twice has he proved victorious. It was near Sandy Creek, where our young soldier first "flesh'd his maiden sword," and emblazoned the escutcheons of fame with the splendid deed. He had been ordered to co-operate with captain Woolsey, of the navy, in escorting some naval stores from Oswego, destined for the fleet at Sackett's Harbour. At the head of 120 men and a few Indians, he safely reached Sandy Creek, where he was met by a vastly superior force of the enemy: the conflict was short, but decisive. After an action of only ten minutes, the enemy were routed on all sides, with the loss of 44 men killed and wounded, and 139 prisoners; among the latter were 2 post captains and 4 lieutenants of the navy—the loss, on our part, was only one rifeman wounded! For this brilliant affair, Appling was promoted to lieutenant-colonel.

Shortly after, the enemy's forces on our northern frontier were rapidly augmenting. The governor-general of the Canadas having collected all the disposable force in Lower Canada, amounting to 15,000 men, "occupied the village of Champlain, with a view of conquering the country as far as Crown Point and Ticonderoga." He advanced as far as Plattsburg, with this comparatively immense force, where he had the mortification of seeing the Champlain fleet surrender to the brave Macdonough, and Wellington's veteran legions flying before the valor of 1500 American regulars and a handful of raw militia! Here again was Appling, with "blushing honours" crowding thick around him—he attracted the attention of his general, and, first on the list of youthful heroes, he was recommended to the particular attention of government.

While other states are bestowing honorary rewards on their valiant sons, Georgia should not withhold her meed of approbation. We should foster the holy flame of patriotism with a peculiar regard—until the divine contagion spreads from breast to breast—and more forcibly emulates our sons to deeds of noble daring.

Lieutenant Gamble.

Washington City, 27th October, 1814.

Messrs. Gales & Secor,

Major William Gamble, the father of the late Lieutenant Gamble, who fell in the action on late Champlain, handed me the enclosed letter for perusal. I solicited the permission to offer it to you for publication. Although congress has already awarded a high testimonial to the revered memory of the deceased, by directing a medal, with appropriate inscriptions thereon, to be presented to the male relative next of kin to the fallen hero; nevertheless, it is desirable that his memory have the advantage of a high and unquestionable testimony of commodore Macdonough, under whose command he served, and under whose eye he so bravely and gallantly fell. Will you have the goodness to insert the letter of commodore Macdonough at length!

Your most obedient servant,

E. H. CUMMINS.

Copy of a letter from commodore Macdonough to major W. Gamble, dated

*United States ship Saratoga, Plattsburg Bay,
September 14th, 1814.*

Dear Sir—It becomes my painful duty to acquaint you with the fall of your son, Lieutenant Peter Gamble, first of this ship, in the action with the British squadron on the 11th instant.

It will, I trust, be a consolation to you that your son fell while gallantly performing his duty to his country. His conduct, while attached to my command, merits my warmest approbation—his fall we deeply regret.

His body was interred with military honours at Plattsburg, with the other officers who fell on that day.

I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

T. MACDONOUGH.

Major William Gamble.

Adjutant James L. Donaldson.

From the Baltimore Federal Gazette.

JAMES LOWRY DONALDSON, Esq., who was killed in the late action near North Point, on the 12th instant, was a native of Ireland, but has resided in this country from the time he was eleven years old. He was the third son of colonel William Lowry, of this city, his name having been changed by an act of the assembly of this state, in compliance with the wishes of a relation. Mr. Donaldson received a liberal education, and was bred to the profession of the law, which he was practising in this city with much reputation and success. For three successive years he received the highest proof of the confidence of his fellow-citizens, by being elected a delegate to represent them in the general assembly of this state, a station which, even his political opponents acknowledge, he filled with eminent ability.

Possessing a liberal and energetic mind and correct classical taste, he distinguished himself at the bar and in the senate as an orator, a civilian and a statesman; and his correct and gentlemanly conduct, ensured him the respect and esteem of his associates in both situations, even when differing from him in political sentiments. While his talents, integrity and activity raised him high in public estimation, his social virtues and friendly disposition endeared him to a large circle of acquaintances in private life, whose attachment to him increased with their intimacy, as it afforded them an opportunity of knowing his worth and merit. Among those who long and intimately knew and sincerely esteemed him, was the writer of the article; who, although differing from him in political sentiments, never found that difference to affect in the slightest degree that friendship which he believes to have been mutual.

Mr. Donaldson was about thirty-three years of age; he has left a widow and five small children, to whom his loss will be irreparable; a numerous family of relatives, and his extensive circle of friends will also severely feel his loss.

The twenty-seventh regiment, in which he acted as adjutant, were warmly attached to him. A few minutes previous to the commencement of the action in which he was unhappily slain, he addressed them in a short but extremely appropriate and animating speech, which contributed not a little, as many of them have since stated, to induce that brave and steady resistance of the enemy, so highly honourable to the regiment. While in the active performance of his duty, he received a musket or rifle ball through his head, which put an immediate period to his life.

Lieutenant Stansbury.

Lieutenant JOHN STANSBURY, who fell in the late conflict between the American and British fleets on Lake Champlain, and which terminated so gloriously in favour of the former, was the second son of brigadier-general Tobias F. Stansbury, of Baltimore county, and was born March 23, 1788. He received a liberal education, and had chosen as his profession the practice of physic, for which his talents and manners eminently qualified him; but his constitution being delicate, a voyage to the West-Indies was recommended and undertaken. Finding that he enjoyed during his voyage much better health than before, on his return he expressed a wish to follow the sea, in which he was indulged by a fond father, and was bound apprentice to Messrs. William Wilson and Sons, merchants of this city, in whose service he continued in the European trade, until he attained the age of manhood. As soon as he ascertained that the conduct of Great Britain towards his country would compel a declaration of war, he applied for and obtained the appointment of midshipman in the service of the United States. Immediately after his appointment, he was placed under the command of commodore Decatur. With this distinguished officer he remained four years, and took part in the capture of the British frigate Macedonian. The good conduct of Mr. Stansbury on all occasions, and particularly in this action, could not pass unnoticed; he was soon after promoted to the rank of lieutenant, and ordered to Lake Champlain, where he assisted in the naval preparations, and was ultimately attached as first lieutenant to the brig Ticonderoga, captain Cassin; and on board of this vessel on the memorable 11th of September, 1814, met his fate almost in the arms of victory.

About twenty minutes before the termination of the action, when the fleets were nearly yard arm and yard arm, her commander had given an order respecting the springs on the cable, which not being quickly executed, could not escape the attention of lieutenant Stansbury; he leaped upon the hammock nettings, a most exposed situation, and was in the act of having the order obeyed, when a cannon ball struck him and carried his body into the deep—his soul into eternity. Had this gallant and much-lamented youth confined himself to the mere line of his duty, to his command on the gun-deck, he might yet have lived, the pride of his family and of his friends, although the result of the battle might have been different; but his manly heart would not permit him to consider whether it was his duty or that of another; he was sufficient that his commander's order was ineffectually executed; he unhesitatingly leaped into a post of danger and of death. His grateful country will not forget his merits. Before the action commenced, when his commodore's signal gave notice to the fleet that the enemy were to be fought, and that every man was expected to do his duty, at the request of his commander, he called the crew aft, pointed out and explained to them the signal which was then flying, and addressed them in glowing and most encouraging terms, which was answered by three hearty cheers." During the engagement he gave every evidence of the confidence, bravery and coolness of the American officer, and the following extract of a letter from the gallant commodore Macdonough communicating the death of Mr. Stansbury, speaks his character in short, but strong terms. "His amiable disposition and superior qualities as an officer endeared him to all his brother officers, and in him our navy has to regret the loss of a brave and excellent man." A. C.

From the Port Folio,

A BIOGRAPHICAL MEMOIR OF

JACOB BROWN,

MAJ. GEN. IN THE ARMY OF THE UNITED STATES.

MAJOR GENERAL BROWN is, in the true signification of the term, a practicable man, calculated for the management of weighty concerns. It is apparent, as well from the native texture of his mind, as from the decision and general cast of his character, that he was formed by nature for a man of business. He is one of those privileged individuals, who, possessing capabilities peculiar to themselves, seem destined to attain to important ends, independently of the ordinary means of achievement. The favourite of nature rather than the dependant nursling of education, he has not required the constant result of experience and discipline to become wise and skilful, nor the usual course of gradation to rise to eminence. In most of his undertakings he has perceived, by the force of a strong natural sagacity, the shortest and readiest way to success, and has seldom failed to attain it, oftentimes creating extraordinary means of accomplishment where common ones were wanting.

Although enamoured of peaceful life, and eminently calculated for its business and enjoyments, his highest talent is perhaps, for war. His short but brilliant career has shown him to be possessed of all those qualities and fitnesses for command, that belong to the character of an able captain, and of which a daring courage is one of the lowest. Vigilant and enlightened, enterprising and full of resources; neither seduced into relaxation by the smiles of prosperity, nor shaken in his purposes by the frowns of adversity; prompt in deciding, vigorous and resolute yet cool in executing; sagacious in discovering the views of the enemy, dextrous and happy in concealing his own; thoroughly acquainted with human nature, not so much from the study of books, as from the more certain and instructive study of man; possessing so perfect a self-command, as to be able to meet, without reluctance, the severest privations and denials that are incidental to the life of a soldier: add to these, a sense of honour lofty and chivalrous, a constitution of body peculiarly calculated for deeds of hardihood, capable of enduring heat and cold, abstinence and fatigue, vigilance and continued attention, in a degree that to most men would be overwhelming and impracticable.—Such is a summary of the character of him whose life and transactions we shall briefly detail.

Thus endowed by nature with those choice and lofty qualities, which bestow on their possessor a fitness for command, it is not, perhaps, to be regarded as a matter of surprise, that the subject of this article has attained to his present eminence with more rapidity, and much less aid from technical discipline, than are usually attendant on military promotion. It will hereafter appear that, from the condition of a private citizen, totally unversed in the science of arms, he rose, at four steps, and in little more than three years, to the distinguished rank which he at present holds. To render his advancement the more striking, he was upwards of half this time a militia officer, and the country was happily in a state of peace, two circumstances which concurred to prevent the display of his talents for war, and to retard the course of his military promotion. Under a different state of things, his career might have been still more rapid and signal.

Jacob Brown is by birth a Pennsylvanian. He was born in Bucks county, a few miles below Trenton, where his father was for many years a respectable farmer. His ancestors both paternal and maternal, had been for several generations of the society of Quakers, some of them conspicuous in the circle wherein they moved for good sense, piety, and moral worth: the former were among the earliest settlers of the colony, having emigrated from England with William Penn, and followed his fortunes to his infant establishment planted amidst the wilds and savages of the new world. Like Washington, therefore, and Green, Wayne and Putman, and the other distinguished heroes of the revolution, the subject of this memoir is purely American.

Of the early years of young Brown we know but little. All we are given to understand is, that, considering his opportunities, which were very limited, he pursued learning with zeal and perseverance and acquired it with facility. Nor do circumstances permit us to question the fact; for, at the early age of eighteen, we find him entrusted with the direction of a respectable school at Crosswicks in New-Jersey.

In that situation he continued, much to his reputation and not a little to his advantage, till about the age of twenty-one when he made a visit, on business, to the western country, and passed two years in what is now the state of Ohio, residing principally in the neighbourhood of Cincinnati. We are informed, but will not vouch for the fact, that he was there employed in the capacity of a surveyor of land. Soon after his return from that interesting section of the union, in which, wild and uncultivated as it then was, he still found resources for the improvement of his mind, he was induced to remove to the city of New-York. He there, at the particular instance of the society of friends, taught their public school for several years, with great credit to himself, and to the entire satisfaction of those who employed him. During this period his industry and exertions were strenuous and unremitting. While instructing others, he overlooked no source, he neglected no opportunity of self-improvement. With a view to cultivate his talent for public speaking, he joined a respectable debating society, of which he soon became a conspicuous member. The daily papers were also occasionally enriched by political essays from his pen, which attracted no inconsiderable share of attention. He, at one time, meditated entering on the profession of the law, but, on mature deliberation, relinquished his intention, believing himself to be better qualified for more active pursuits. Whether even now the busy scenes of military life did not present themselves to his view in distant prospect, might well be questioned. Nor is the presumption that they did the less probable.

The fortunes of most men who have figured in the world have been determined by accidental, oftentimes by trivial occurrences. This truth was manifested in the case of Mr. Brown. While resident in New-York, he became casually acquainted with a land agent, whose concern lay on the waters and in the vicinity of lake Ontario. Having negotiated with that gentleman a contract for a few thousand acres of what was then a wilderness, he set out in the year 1799, to form a settlement on his new purchase. By this arrangement a foundation was laid for the eminence and honours he has since attained, and the substantial benefits he has conferred on his country.

Placed on a new and spacious theatre of action, his energies were unfolded with the widening of his prospects. His activity and intelligence, his knowledge of men and talents for business soon rendering him a leading character in all matters of public concern. By the wisdom and ability with which he conducted his affairs, his own interests and those of the proprietors of lands in his neighbourhood were alike promoted. By his influence in the legislature of the state, several salutary and important laws were passed in relation to the opening of roads, the erection and organization of new counties, and various other points essentially connected with improvement of the country. During this period, so necessarily replete with engagements and avocations according but little with studious habits, he was not inattentive to the cultivation of his mind, as preparatory to other and higher destinies. To add to his information in the science of government, and the further to mature his knowledge of man, considered in a civil and social capacity, he assiduously devoted a portion of his time to the study of ancient and modern history.

Among his other acquirements, having distinguished himself as an enlightened and practical farmer. Mr. Brown was elected in the year 1808, a member of the Agricultural and Philosophical society of the state of New-York. From about this period may be dated the commencement of his public character. In the course of the succeeding year, he was appointed to the command of a regiment of militia, the first military station he had ever filled. Applying himself now to the study of arms with the same ardour which had hitherto marked his peaceful pursuits, he soon manifested talents conclusive of the fact, that he was calculated for an officer of no ordinary standing. He was, accordingly, in the spring of 1811, promoted to the rank of brigadier general.

The present war having commenced in the year 1812, the country around lake Ontario being a frontier and important situation, was necessarily destined to become a theatre of early and active military operations. Arrangements were consequently made by government to meet the pressure of expected events. Of the first detachment of New-York militia called into the service of the United States, general Brown had the command of a brigade. It is but justice to him to state, that he was selected to this arduous and responsible situation, from the well known firmness and efficiency of his character, connected with his accurate knowledge of the country that was likely to become in a short time the theatre of war. He was not regarded as a sun-shine parade-day officer, whose ruling passion was the vanity of being gazed at in military dress. He was considered as one qualified to meet the shock of battle, with the intelligence of a commander and the gallantry of a soldier. Nor was it long till events occurred to prove the correctness of public opinion.

The general's first command, being by far too extensive for the number of his troops, was, in an eminent degree, laborious and embarrassing. It embraced the whole line of frontier from Oswego to St. Regis, a distance of more than three hundred miles. Within this line was included the important post of Sackett's Harbour, the security of which, being essential to the success of ulterior operations, constituted the first object of his attention. Having fortified this in the best manner his time and scanty means would allow, he reconnoitered in person the shores of the St. Lawrence, and, with equal promptness and skill, provided, as far as practicable, for the defence of the country. His transportation, a short time afterwards, of a party of four hundred men from Sackett's Harbour to Ogdensburgh, manifested a firmness of purpose and an intrepidity of spirit, which but few even of the hardest soldiers possess. The roads were impassable for baggage and artillery, and the enemy were in undisputed possession of the lake and river. On the subject of a passage by water, there existed but one opinion: an attempt as it was considered, as fraught with destruction. The general, however, having been ordered to proceed, was bent on obedience, and neither the front of danger nor the voice of remonstrance could shake his resolution. He, accordingly, embarked with his troops in the best flotilla he could provide for that purpose, and, determined to fight his way through whatever might oppose him, he arrived in safety at his place of destination. In this daring enterprise he actually achieved what the boldest might well have hesitated to attempt. While stationed at Ogdensburgh he so galled and harassed the enemy, in their navigation of the St. Lawrence, that, impatient of further annoyance, they fitted out a formidable expedition for his capture or destruction. The number of men they despatched on this enterprise was upwards of eight hundred, commanded by some of their best officers, and provided with every thing deemed necessary to insure success. The American force opposed to them was less than four hundred. Notwithstanding this vast numerical difference, so judicious were the arrangements of general Brown, and so deadly the fire with which he received the enemy, that he forced him to retreat precipitately, with considerable loss in boats and men, not one of his party having received even a wound. No further attempts were made to dislodge him, during his continuance at that post.

His term of service having soon afterwards expired, the general returned to his family at Brownville, and resumed, as heretofore, his agricultural pursuits. But with the talents and qualifications for war which he had recently exhibited, it was not to be expected, that in a time of danger, and on a frontier establishment, he would be suffered to remain in the enjoyment of repose. He was oftentimes consulted on military matters by the officers commanding in the district wherein he resided, to whom his advice was essentially serviceable, and who never failed to regard him with respect and deference. But on a day of emergency, warriors must act as well as counsel. We accordingly, in the spring of 1813, find general Brown again in the field, and once more entrusted with the defence of Sackett's Harbour, which was menaced by a serious attack from the enemy.

All the regular troops, except about four hundred, who, from their recent arrival on the spot, were but little better than fresh recruits, had been removed from the harbour, to co-operate in the meditated reduction of Fort George. The furniture of the cannon having been carried off to complete the outfit for the same service, the batteries were nearly in a dismantled state. Nor could any efficient aid be derived from the co-operation of the fleet, in as much as that, with the exception of two small schooners, were all employed in the expedition up the lake. In fact, considering its exposed situation, and the vital importance of the post, Sackett's Harbour had been, to the astonishment of all military men, left in a most unprotected and perilous condition. To aid in its defence, general Brown embodied, with all practical promptitude, a few hundred militia from the adjacent district, who had scarcely arrived when the enemy made his appearance. The general's situation was critical in itself, and to the heart of a soldier trying in the extreme. It was his duty to meet the fire, perhaps the bayonets, of veterans, with a handful of raw, undisciplined troops, many of them but a few days from the bosom of their families, their domestic feelings still awake; and their habits of civil life perfectly unbroken, and none of whom had ever before faced an enemy in the field. But his own activity, valour, and skill, aided by the determined bravery of lieutenant colonel Backus, of the regular army, supplied all deficiencies. Arrangements were made to receive the enemy with a warm and galling fire at his place of landing, and to contest the ground with him in his advance towards the fort.

The regiment of United States' troops were stationed in the rear, while general Brown, at the head of his new levies, occupied in person the first post of danger. On the second fire the militia broke and fled in disorder, but were rallied again by the exertions of their commander. During the remainder of the conflict, which was warm, and continued some time with varying success, the presence of the general was every where felt, applauding the brave, encouraging the timid, and rallying the flying, till his efforts were ultimately crowned with victory. In consequence of the firm front presented by the regulars, and the judicious disposition of a body of militia threatening his rear, the enemy, without accomplishing his object, was compelled to relinquish the contest, and retreat in great haste and some disorder to his place of embarkation. The annals of warfare afford but few instances where the success of a battle was more justly attributed to the talents and conduct of the commander in chief, than on the present occasion. To general Brown, in person, did the whole army concur in ascribing the merit and honour of the victory. His valour, activity, and skill, during the action, had rendered him conspicuous in every eye. This affair, although diminutive in itself, when compared with the gigantic battles of Europe, was, notwithstanding, important in its consequences, in as much as it saved from destruction our great naval depot on the lakes, and compelled the enemy to respect our arms.

General Brown, returning once more to private life, amidst the plaudits and congratulations of his fellow citizens, and accompanied by a pleasing consciousness of having contributed, not ineffectually, to the interests of his country, was offered, in reward of his services, and as an acknowledgment of his worth, the command of a regiment in the regular army. This offer the general unhesitatingly declined, from motives which were perfectly correct and honourable. The acceptance of it would have necessarily contracted his sphere of action, placed him below officers whom he might then command, and, as the regiment in his offer was yet to be raised, a considerable time must have elapsed before he could possibly have taken the field. In plain terms, being possessed of the pride and ambition of a soldier, he felt himself entitled to a higher rank. Nor was it long till the government of his country concurred with him in opinion, and appointed him a brigadier general in the army of the United States.

The first service in which general Brown was engaged under his new appointment, was novel and arduous, and required for its accomplishment the exertions of not only a man of ample resources of mind, but of one accustomed to the management of important concerns. It was the superintendence and direction of the arrangements for transporting, from Sackett's Harbour down the St. Lawrence, the army commanded by general Wilkinson in the autumn of the year 1813, in the abortive expedition for the reduction of Montreal. For the completion of these arrangements from the time of their commencement, only three weeks were allowed, a space which would seem utterly insufficient for the performance of a service so complicated and extensive. But talents, system, and industry combined, are competent to every thing short of a miracle: and it was such a combination that enabled general Brown to perform satisfactorily this eminently difficult and responsible duty, in even less than the allotted time.

In the expedition down the St. Lawrence, and during the course of the winter that succeeded, the duties and services in which general Brown was engaged, were of the utmost importance to the operations and well-being of the army, and in all of them he acquitted himself with distinguished reputation. Firmness under misfortune, and indefatigable perseverance, when difficulties presented themselves, were among the conspicuous traits in his character. He manifested a spirit alike invincible in the presence of an enemy, and under the hardships incidental to military life. The example of activity, vigilance and hardihood which his conduct presented to both officers and soldiers, was not among the least of his benefits to the service.

In descending the St. Lawrence, general Brown commanded the elite of the army, and, at French Creek, repulsed, with his own brigade, a naval armament of considerable force, despatched from Kingston to impede his progress. On passing the British fort at Prescott he was officer of the day, and to his skill and conduct, on that occasion, is to be attributed, in a great measure, the safety of the army. His command was soon afterwards detached in advance, on the difficult and highly responsible duty of opening and preparing the way for the main army. The report of general Wilkinson, touching the manner in which that service was performed, embraces all that can be said of the excellence of an officer. In the disastrous affair at Williamsburg on the 11th of November, he was not present; no part, therefore, of the misfortunes of that day are ascribable to him.

On the abandonment of Canada by the American forces, an event which soon afterwards succeeded—general Wilkinson being seriously indisposed, and the other senior officers exchanging the hardships of a camp, and the rigours of a northern winter, for the luxuries and pleasures of civil life in a milder climate—the command of the army devolved on general Brown.

From the inclemency of the season, and the want of all the comforts and most of the necessities of subsistence, the condition of the troops was at first deplorable. But by the exertions of the commanding general, aided by general Swartwout, of the staff, it was soon ameliorated. Comfortable huts were provided, the erection of which general Brown superintended in person, while general Swartwout was indefatigable in procuring supplies of provisions and clothing. Thus passed the winter, though not without trying hardships, yet with much less suffering than could have been reasonably expected in an army abandoned to its fate by those who ought to have been present to provide for its wants. In a military point of view, moreover, its aspect was such as to command respect from a menacing foe. By his ardent and persevering devotion to their comfort and interests, and the wisdom and ability which he displayed in promoting them, not more in their encampment, than during their toilsome and exposing march on their return to Sackett's Harbour, general Brown rendered himself deservedly the idol of the army, and rose not a little in the esteem of the nation. As a reward for his past services, and in full anticipation that, should his life be spared, a higher distinction in arms awaited him, he was promoted to the rank of major general. In that capacity he entered on the succeeding campaign, which will long be memorable in the annals of America—in which, under the guidance and protection of a kind and all-wise

Providence, he was so highly instrumental in checking the pride of Britain by land, which our naval heroes had already so effectually humbled by sea, and in restoring to the arms of his country, the splendour they had attained under the auspices of Washington.

In the winter of 1813-4, the enemy having gained possession of Fort Niagara, and being in considerable force on the opposite shore, a determination was formed to remove once more the seat of war to that frontier. Perceiving that the conflict would be arduous and sanguinary, and that the master spirits of the army alone could encounter it with any reasonable prospect of success, the executive appointed general Brown to lead the expedition, associating with him, Scott, Gaines, Miller, and others, whose names have become conspicuous for all that is noble in the profession of arms.

The preceding campaign being darkened by disasters, and having failed, as many supposed, from the inability of those by whom it had been conducted, general Brown and his officers were fully sensible of the deep stake, which both themselves and their country held on the issue of the present. Their hearts and minds were prepared, accordingly, to meet with firmness the force of the crisis. It is generally understood that their determination was, not to survive misfortune, which they felt assured the public would regard, under any circumstances, as the result of mismanagement, and tantamount to disgrace. They went resolved to conquer or fall, that glory or the grave might cover them from censure.

This campaign being destined to form a fresh epoch in the history of the war, presented from its commencement a new aspect. The movements of the army were conducted with a celerity, a silence, and a vigour, which had not been observed on any former occasion. Accordingly, general Brown had advanced on his march almost to Buffalo, before it was generally known that he had left his encampment at Sackett's Harbour.

A few days previous to his passage into Upper Canada, the commanding general thus writes to his friend: "I shall, with the blessing of God, pass the strait before me the first week in July—I do not see that this army is to be assisted by the fleet of either lake, commodore Sinclair being ordered to Mackinac: but I do not despair of success, and rely on the goodness of cause, and the kindness of that Providence which has never forsaken me.”*

The first achievement of general Brown on entering the enemies' territory, was the reduction of fort Erie, the garrison of which surrendered with but little resistance. He then declared martial law, and made known his views in a proclamation essentially different from those that had been issued by some of his predecessors. Instead of being marked with empty boasts and threats which he was utterly unable to execute, it breathed the principles and sentiments of an upright man and an honourable warrior. It set forth that “men found in arms, or otherwise engaged in acts of hostility, should be dealt with as enemies, while those demeaning themselves peaceably, and pursuing their private business should be treated as friends: that private property should be in all cases held sacred, but public property wherever found, seized and disposed of by the commanding general: that plundering was strictly prohibited: that the major general did not anticipate any difficulty in this respect from the regular army, nor from honourable volunteers, who had pressed forward to the standard of their country, to avenge her wrongs and gain her a name in arms.” The proclamation further declared, that “profligate men who follow the army for plunder, must not expect to escape the vengeance of those gallant spirits who are struggling to exalt the national character.”

No sooner had the general made the necessary arrangements in relation to the occupancy and security of fort Erie, than he marched to attack the enemy, who lay entrenched in his works at Chippewa. This was by every one considered as a daring, by many, as a rash and hazardous measure. But something signal being necessary to redeem the reputation which had been lost in the events of former campaigns, difficulties and dangers and remonstrances were disregarded. They even increased the anxiety for action, inasmuch as they would add to the glory of victory. The general's plans and determinations were formed, and nothing that human resolution, aided by all the means in his power, was capable of surmounting, could restrain him from boldly attempting their execution. The wished for moment at length arrived. The enemy venturing from behind his entrenchments, the battle was fought on an open plain, and though not of long duration, was severe and sanguinary. The result is well known. The soldiers and officers of Wellington, who had wrested the laurels from the veterans of France, were defeated by a detachment from the American army. The only troops engaged on the part of general Brown, were general Scott's brigade, and a corps of volunteers commanded by general Porter. The remainder of the army, although burning for combat, had no opportunity of coming into action. Scott's brigade, in particular, animated by the example, and directed by the skill of its gallant and distinguished leader, performed little less than prodigies of valour. Wherever that band of heroes—for such they were—directed their fire or pointed their bayonets, the boasted “conquerors of the Peninsula” fled or fell. Nor were the volunteers under Porter, wanting in achievement. They manifested great coolness and bravery, and participated not a little in the honours of the day. The British fought on ground deliberately chosen by themselves, as most suitable to their discipline and plan of action, and the number of troops they had engaged—all regulars—was considerably superior to that of the Americans. Notwithstanding this, their discomfiture was complete, and their loss very considerable. Their works alone, behind which they retreated, preserved them from certain and irretrievable ruin. Such was the chastisement they received in this affair, that although battle was soon afterwards offered them again, on their own terms, as will appear from an extract of a letter from general Brown, they felt no disposition to accept the challenge.

The general discovering that unfounded reports were in circulation respecting some of the results of this battle, as well as the relative number of the combatants, felt indignant at the ungenerous effort thus made to detract from the well merited fame of his army. To correct the honest errors that were afloat, and counteract the wilful misrepresentations that were but too industriously propagated on this subject, he loses no time in making public the following statement: “We have ascertained to a certainty that the loss of the enemy was nearer six than four hundred. Great injustice is done to my brave companions in arms, in overrating our numbers. The enemy had more regular troops than we had engaged, and that upon a perfect plain, without a stump or a shrub to interpose. Besides, general Ryal had planned his order of battle at leisure, and came from behind his works in perfect condition for action." Shortly after the action at Chippewa, the general thus writes to his friend from Queenstown. "Hoping and believing that the enemy would make another struggle in the field, if pressed on his strong ground, supported by his forts on the height, I left all my baggage under a strong guard, and passed on with three days provision in our haversacks. The enemy fled before us, abandoning his fort on the height, and burning his barracks. He has retired for the present to fort Niagara and fort George. I shall rest my army here for a few days, taking care that the enemy shall not escape by land, and with the hope of hearing from Commodore Chauncey. I am in no condition to invest forts George and Niagara, without his aid and my battering guns, which I expect him to bring me from the Harbour. My ability to face the enemy in the field I do not doubt, and I shall not hesitate to meet him presently should he again offer me battle—I have now seen the falls of Niagara in all their majesty, and my camp is situate in a country affording the most sublime and beautiful scenery. I can fancy nothing equal to it, except the noble contest of gallant men on the field of battle, struggling for their country's glory and their own."

* It redounds not a little to the honour of general Brown, that the army which he led into Canada, equal, perhaps, to any one of the same number that ever took the field—had been prepared for public service under his own eye. Such was its discipline, and such the confidence of the soldiers in each other, that an officer of rank belonging to it was heard to declare, that only show the troops an enemy, and communicate to them the plan of attack, and they would fight and conquer without their commander. To be the prime instrument in forming such an army is, of itself, an act of distinguished generalship; and that distinction belonged to general Brown.

From Queenstown, where he had been for a short time stationary, general Brown marched with a part of his army down towards fort George. His object in this movement, besides reconnoitering the enemy, was to be near to the shores of lake Ontario, hoping that he might there receive some intelligence respecting Commodore Chauncey and the fleet. Being disappointed in this expectation, he returned after a few days to his station at Queenstown. The enemy, in the mean time, were not inactive. Having received large supplies, and no inconsiderable addition to their numbers, they concentrated their forces in the peninsula between Burlington and Erie, and felt themselves in a condition to offer battle. The proposal was eagerly embraced by the American general and his brave associates.

The British army commanded by lieutenant general Drummond in person, aided by major general Ryal and other skilful and distinguished officers, fought again on its own ground. It had selected a spot favourable for action, not far distant from the falls of Niagara. The Americans who were again the assailants, made the attack in the evening, led on, as at Chippewa, by general Scott. The battle raged for several hours with unabated fury, the troops having no other lights to direct their movements, and conduct their steps to mutual slaughter, but the dismal gleam of their own arms. The wonder of nature, the adjacent falls, might equal, but could not, in grandeur and magnificence, surpass the scene which this conflict presented. Never was there a field more obstinately contested, nor considering the numbers engaged and the duration of the struggle, a broader display of individual heroism. The enemy, although superiour in numbers at the commencement of the action, and reinforced by a considerable body of fresh troops during its continuance, were compelled to yield to American valor. Four times did their bravest troops charge, to regain their artillery, which had been wrested from them, and as often were they compelled to fall back in dismay. Their loss in killed, wounded and prisoners was upwards of a thousand men. Among the latter was major general Ryal and twenty other commissioned officers, some of them of rank. The loss on the American side, although somewhat less, was by no means trifling. General Brown was himself severely wounded, and among the slain was one of his aids, a youth of accomplished manners and exalted promise. The intrepid Scott, who was to be found only where slaughter was thickest and danger most threatening, received a wound which still deprives his country of his services in the field.

The severity of general Brown's wounds compelled him to a temporary retirement from service. But in the space of a few weeks we find him again at the head of his army, no longer indeed in the field, but within the walls of fort Erie. In the interim our troops in that fortress had been much harrassed and pressed by the enemy, now become superior in a still higher degree by reinforcements, and exasperated to madness by their late defeats. An assault of the works had been attempted, but was gallantly repelled by the American forces then under the command of general Gaines. Not long afterwards that excellent officer received a serious wound from the bursting of a shell, which obliged him also to retire for a time from the service of his country.

Menaced in front by a powerful enemy, and having a river of difficult passage in their rear, the troops in fort Erie began to be considered in a very perilous situation. The solicitude for the safety of men, who, by acquiring glory for themselves had conferred it on their country became universal and great. For a time every eye seemed directed towards Erie, and every American heart felt a deep interest in the fate of those heroic spirits who had fairly conquered the "conquerors of the Peninsula." But to a commander whose mind is firm, collected, and rich in resources, difficulties are but the harbingers of fresh triumphs. While general Drummond was engaged in formidable arrangements intended for the destruction of the American forces, general Brown was still more actively and sagaciously employed in devising means for their safety and glory.

By the middle of September, the enemy had nearly completed a line of batteries to command the fort, which, when in full operation, would have rendered the position of the Americans at least unsafe, if not untenable. But general Drummond, while erecting this extensive work of annoyance, was little aware of the disaster and mortification he was preparing for himself, and the laurels he was cultivating for the brow of his adversary. On the 17th of September, the day before the fire from the batteries was to commence, another scene of glory opened on the American commander and his brave associates. His plan being matured, and his troops in readiness, their spirits wound up to the highest enterprize, general Brown made a sortie, not in the form of a "night attack," of which a distinguished British officer had so bitterly complained, but in the face of day, drove the enemy from his strong hold with the loss of more than eight hundred men, spiked his cannon, and destroyed his works. Thus was the labour of thousands, continued unremittingly for many weeks, frustrated in an hour by the skilful and well-timed enterprize of a commander, and the valour and heroism of a few gallant soldiers. The loss of the Americans, though considerable, was far inferior to that of the British. Several excellent officers fell on both sides.

For brilliancy and effect, this sortie challenges a comparison with any thing recorded in the annals of war. It is of itself sufficient to gain for a commander a name in arms. It resembled not a little the celebrated exploit of general Elliot, in the year 1781, against the battery erected by the Spaniards, with a view to the reduction of the fort of Gibraltar. To render the discomfiture of the enemy the more signal, and his disappointment the more galling, the besieged general, in each instance, suffered the hostile work to be ready for operation, before the development of his plan for its demolition. In each instance, moreover, the success of the assailants was alike complete, and alike decisive of the issue of the siege.

While preparing for this enterprize, which he had for sometime meditated, general Brown writes thus to an intimate friend: "I trust the nation will not submit! I believe the pressure of the enemy cannot fail to make us great—and I pray God that my hopes may not be disappointed! My own fate, and the fate of the brave and good men around me, are very uncertain." Shortly after the destruction of his works, general Drummond retreated from before fort Erie, and fell back on fort George, leaving the American army in the enjoyment of security and repose, as the reward of their valour. The conflict in that quarter being now apparently at an end, general Brown was transferred from the Niagara frontier to the command of Sackett's Harbour, which constitutes, as we believe, his present station.

The achievements of the American army during the last campaign in Upper Canada, considering the circumstances under which they were effected, need no comment. They are their own best interpreters, speaking in a language which cannot be misunderstood. They announce in the commander, talents, perseverance and daring enterprize, and in his brave associates, patience and gallantry, invincible firmness and military discipline in its highest style. They will be selected hereafter by the hand of history, to enrich and emblazon some of her choicest pages. To triumph with inferior numbers, and in open conflict, over troops that had defeated the veteran legions of France, is of itself sufficient to consummate the glory of any commander: and such has been the fortune of general Brown.

We know it has been said by some, that the movements and measures of the last campaign, were characterized by rashness, and that their successful issue is to be attributed more to good fortune than to able generalship. We consider the charge as neither generous nor just. What might well be deemed rashness at one conjuncture, is wisdom at another; and that general who does not trust somewhat to fortune, will rarely become great. He may, indeed, save his forces, and acquire the reputation of a prudent commander. But, if he calculate too nicely, he is not the man to gain for his country a name in arms, nor suddenly to revive, by deeds of valour, the hopes and prospects of a people broken in their spirits by repeated disasters.

It has been already stated, that, at the opening of the Canadian campaign, the reputation of the American land-arms was at a low ebb. To retrieve this, and arouse the spirits of the nation, something of noble and impetuous daring—something beyond the mere dictates of cold, calculating prudence and gray-haired wisdom, had become essential. The commander who would thus adventure—thus overstep the limits of common military discretion, would hazard his fame as well as his life. Of this general Brown was as fully sensible, as the sternest inculcator of wisdom and caution. But he was no less sensible, that the times demanded the risk, at least, of a sacrifice, and he was willing, should Heaven so order it, to be himself the victim. Hence the source—and wisdom herself will yet applaud them—of the hardy and hazardous measures he pursued. At another time he might, and, if we are not mistaken in him, would be, as circumspect in his calculations, as he has been heretofore venturesome: for such conduct, and such alone, belongs to the character of an able captain—to suit his plans, by corresponding changes, to the nature of the crisis, his own situation, and the exigency of affairs. Notwithstanding the prevalence of a contrary belief in the minds of many, such was unquestionably the conduct of Washington, that model of all that is praiseworthy in a commander.

In private life, as a neighbour, a friend, a husband and a father, general Brown is respected and beloved. In the character of a son, he is peculiarly exemplary. For many years his pious and assiduous attentions have been the support and consolation of his aged parents, one of whom is still living, to rejoice in his prosperity, and to pour forth now on the laureled head of the leader of armies, those benedictions which she once bestowed on the helpless infant.

From the Analectic Magazine.

Anecdotes of the Battle on Lake Erie.

It is a trite remark, that general descriptions of battles present no distinct images to the mind. We read with little emotion of broadsides discharged, ships cut to pieces, and numbers killed and wounded; but when particulars are given us, when the imminent risks or piteous disasters of individuals are detailed, we fancy ourselves in their situations, and in a manner mingle personally in the conflict.—A mere outline of the battle of Erie was given some time since in the Biography of Commodore Perry; since then several circumstances have reached us, which give a more vivid idea of the nature of the fight, and show the incessant and thickening perils with which that young officer was surrounded.

It was his lot repeatedly to see men swept away from his side; some even while conversing with him. One of these incidents displays the coolness and presence of mind that prevailed among the officers, and indeed throughout the ship, enabling them even to jest with present dangers. The second lieutenant of the Lawrence, while standing beside Commodore Perry, was struck in the breast by a chain shot. The shot having passed through the bulwark, had no other effect than to knock him down, and lodged in the bosom of his waistcoat. He fell with an exclamation, and remained for a moment stunned by the violence of the blow. Perry raised him up, and seeing no marks of a wound, gave him some cheering words, and told him he could not be hurt. The lieutenant coming to himself, put his hand into his bosom, pulled out the chain shot, and exclaiming "no sir, but this is my shot," threw it with great yang froid into his pocket.

In the course of the action Perry noticed a prime and favourite sailor, who was captain of one of the guns, very much embarrassed with his piece, which in consequence of the forelock being broken, was rather unmanageable and rebounded. Perry approached him, and in his usual encouraging manner, asked him what was the matter? The honest tar who had been showing signs of infinite vexation, turned round, and as if speaking of a mistress, exclaimed reproachfully, "Sir my gun behaves shamefully—shamefully!" He then levelled it, and having taken aim raised up and squared himself in a fine martial style, when suddenly a cannon ball struck him in the breast, passed through him, and he fell dead, without a groan!

Lieutenant Yarnall, of the Lawrence, behaved throughout with great bravery and coolness. He was dressed as a common seaman, a red bandana handkerchief was tied round his neck, and another round his head, to staunch two wounds which he had received. From these the blood trickled down his face, and a splinter having passed through his nose, it had swelled to a hideous magnitude. In this frightful plight, looking like the very genius of carnage and ill luck, he came up to Perry in the hottest and bloodiest of the fight, and announced to him that all the officers of his division were killed. Perry ordered others in their place. Shortly after, Yarnall returned with a repetition of the dismal tidings that all the officers were shot down; "then, Sir," said Perry, "you must endeavour to make out by yourself, I have no more to furnish you!"

One circumstance which Perry relates deserves particular mention. It has in it something of sentiment that is above common life, and absolutely belongs to poetry. When in the sweeping havoc that was sometimes made, a number of men were shot away from around a gun, the survivors looked silently around to Perry—and then stepped into their places. Whenever he looked at the poor fellows that lay wounded and weltering on the deck, he always found their faces turned towards him, and their eyes fixed on his countenance. It is impossible for words to heighten the simple and affecting eloquence of this anecdote. It speaks volumes in praise of the heroism of the commander, and the loyal affection of his followers.

When Perry went off from the Lawrence to shift his flag to the Niagara, he stood up in the boat gallantly waving his sword, and was heard cheerily to exclaim, "Pull away my brave boys!" so earnest was he that though the balls whistled round him he could scarcely be made to take a seat, and an old sailor, who had been in both battles of the Constitution, absolutely held him down.

Just after he had got on board the Niagara, and was on the quarter deck, a sailor who commanded one of the guns, seeing all his men shot down, turned with eagerness to Perry, and, laying both hands upon his shoulders, exclaimed, "For God's sake, Sir, give me some more men!" Such was the vivid animation that prevailed among all ranks—they had lost all sense of personal danger, and thought of nothing but victory.

When the Niagara dashed through the enemy's line, as she passed the Lady Prevost, Lieutenant Buchan, the commander of that vessel, was shot through the face by a musket ball. The vessels were then within half pistol shot, so that every thing could be seen distinctly from one to the other. The crew of the Lady Prevost, unable in their crippled state to stand the fire of the Niagara, ran below; but their unfortunate commander remained on deck, and Perry saw him leaning on the companion-way, with his face on his hand, looking with fixed stare at his enemies. Perry immediately silenced the marines on the quarter deck, and running forward ordered the men to cease firing. He afterwards learnt that the strange conduct of Lieutenant Buchan was owing to sudden derangement caused by his wound. He was a brave officer, and had distinguished himself in the battle of the Nile.

While Perry was engaged at close quarters in the Niagara, Lieutenant Turner, a fine bold young sailor, who commanded the brig Caledonia, of three guns, spreading every sail endeavoured to get into action. His foresail interfered between him and the enemy, but, rather than take in an inch of canvas, he ordered his men to fire through it. Seeing the commodore engaged in the thickest of the fight, he proposed to the commander of another small vessel, to board the Detroit; the other, however, prudently declined the rash but gallant proposal.

It has been mentioned that two Indians were on board the Detroit, stationed in the tops, to pick off our officers with their rifles. No sooner, however, did the ships come into close action, then they were dismayed by this new and tremendous species of battle, and slunk into the hold.—When the ship was taken they anticipated cruel treatment, if their nation was discovered, and borrowed sailors' clothes that they might pass for Englishmen. Thus disgraced, they lay in close concealment for two days, when word was brought to Perry, that two Indians were concealed below who had not tasted food for eight and forty hours.

He had them brought up on deck, where they made a most uncouth and ludicrous appearance, with their borrowed garments bagging about them. They expected nothing less than to be butchered.

ed and scalped, but notwithstanding, preserved the most taciturn inflexibility of muscle.—Perry, however, after putting a few good humoured questions to them, ordered them to be taken away and fed; a degree of lenity which seemed to strike them with more surprise than their stoic natures are apt to evince.

The only time that the coolness and self command of Perry experienced any thing like a shock, was on seeing his young brother, a midshipman, knocked down by a hammock, which had been driven in by a ball. In the momentary agony of his mind he gave him up as slain, but had the delight to see him rise up perfectly unharmed.

Perry speaks highly of the bravery and good conduct of the negroes, who formed a considerable part of his crew. They seemed to be absolutely insensible to danger. When Captain Barclay came on board the Niagara, and beheld the sickly and part-colored beings around him, an expression of chagrin escaped him at having been conquered by such men. The fresh water service had very much impaired the health of the sailors, and crowded the sick list with patients.

We shall close these few particulars of this gallant and romantic affair, with the affecting fate of Lieutenant Brookes of the marines. It presents an awful picture of the scenes which the warrior witnesses in battle—his favourite companions suddenly cut down before his eyes—those dreadful transitions from the flush of health and the vivacity of youth, to the ghastliness of agonized death—from the cheering and the smile, to the shriek and the convulsion.

Brookes was a gay, animated young officer, remarkable for his personal beauty. In the midst of the engagement he accented Perry in a spirited tone, with a smile on his countenance, and was making some observations about the enemy, when a cannon ball struck him in the thigh, and dashing him to the opposite side of the deck. The blow shattered him dreadfully, and the sudden anguish forced from him the most thrilling exclamations. He implored Perry to shoot him and put an end to his torture; the latter directed some of the marines to carry him below and consign him to the surgeon. The scene was rendered more affecting by the conduct of a little mulatto boy of twelve years of age, a favorite of Brookes'. He was carrying cartridges to one of the guns, but on seeing his master fall, he threw himself on the deck with the most frantic gesticulations and piercing cries, exclaiming that his master was killed; nor could he be appeased until orders were given to take him below, when he immediately returned to carrying cartridges.

Mr. Hamilton, the purser, who had worked at a gun like a common sailor, being wounded, was carried below and laid on the same mattress with Brookes. The wound of the latter was stanch, and he lay composed, calmly awaiting his approaching death. Hamilton observes that he never looked so perfectly beautiful as at this moment, when the anguish of his wound had imparted a feverish flush and lustre to his usually blooming countenance. He asked with great solicitude after Perry, and how the battle went. He gave a few directions respecting his own affairs, and while his voice was growing weaker and weaker, recommended his little mulatto to kindness and protection, directing into whose hands he should be placed. While he was yet talking, Hamilton's attention was suddenly attracted by some circumstance which occasioned him to look another way for a moment—the voice of his companion died upon his ear, and when he turned his face again, poor Brookes had expired!

Additional Anecdotes.

(BY THE EDITOR OF THE MUSEUM.)

The means employed by our officers to take the brigs over the bar, were ingenious and deserve mention. Two large scows fifty feet long, ten feet wide and eight feet deep, were prepared—they were first filled with water and then floated along side one of the vessels in a parallel direction; they were then secured by means of large pieces of hewn timber placed athwart ship, with both ends projecting from the port holes across the scows; the space between these timbers and the boat secured by other pieces properly arranged; the water was then bailed from the scows, thereby giving them an astonishing lifting power.

On the morning of the 10th of September, at sunrise, the enemy were discovered bearing down from Malden for the evident purpose of attacking our squadron, then at anchor in Put-in-Bay. Not a moment was to be lost. Our squadron immediately got under way and stood out to meet the British fleet, which at this time had the weather gage. At 10 A. M. the wind shifted from S. W. to S. E. which brought our squadron to windward. The wind was light, the day beautiful—not a cloud obscured the horizon. The line was formed at 11, and Commodore Perry caused an elegant flag, which he had privately prepared, to be hoisted at the mast head of the Lawrence; on this flag was painted in characters, legible to the whole fleet, the dying words of the immortal LAWRENCE,—“DON'T GIVE UP THE SHIP.” Its effect is not to be described—every heart was electrified. The crews cheered, the exhilarating can was passed. Both fleets appeared eager for the conflict, on the result of which so much depended.

The editor of this paper, in company with five others, arrived at the head of Put-in-Bay island on the evening of the 9th, and had a view of the action at the distance of only ten miles. The spectacle was truly grand and awful. The firing incessant for the space of three hours, and continued at short intervals forty-five minutes longer. In less than one hour after the battle began most of the vessels of both fleets were enveloped in a cloud of smoke, which rendered the issue of the action uncertain, till the next morning, when we visited the fleet in the harbour on the opposite side of the island. The reader will easily judge of our solicitude to learn the result. There is no sentiment more painful than suspense, when it is excited by the uncertain issue of an event like this.

The carnage on board the prizes was prodigious—they must have lost 200 in killed, besides wounded. The sides of the Detroit and Queen Charlotte were shattered from bow to stern; there was scarcely room to place one's hand on their larboard sides without touching the impression of a shot—a great many balls, canister and grape, were found lodged in their bulwarks, which were too thick to be penetrated by our carronades, unless within pistol shot distance. Their masts were so much shattered that they fell overboard soon after they got into the bay.

The loss of the Americans was severe, particularly on board the Lawrence. When her flag was struck she had but nine men fit for duty remaining on deck. Her sides were completely riddled by the shot from the long guns of the British ships. Her deck, the morning after the conflict, when I first went on board, exhibited a scene that defies description—for it was literally covered with blood, which still adhered to the plank in clots—brains, hair and fragments of bones still sticking to the rigging and sides. The surgeons were still busy with the wounded—enough!—horror appalled my senses.

Among the wounded were several brave fellows, each of whom had lost a leg or an arm—they appeared cheerful and expressed a hope that they had done their duty. Rome and Sparta would have been proud of these heroes.

The efficacy of the gun boats was fully proved in this action, and the sterns of all the prizes bear ample testimony of the fact.—They took raking positions and galled the enemy severely. The Lady Prevost lost twelve men before either of the brigs fired on her.—Their fire was quick and precise. Let us hear the enemy.—The general order of Adjutant General Baynes, contains the following words: "His [Perry's] numerous gun boats, [four] which had proved the greatest annoyance during the action were all uninjured."

The undaunted bravery of admiral Barclay entitled him to a better fate; to the loss of the day was superadded grievous and dangerous wounds: he had before lost an arm; it was now his hard fortune to lose the use of the other, by a shot which carried away the blade of the right shoulder; a canister shot made a violent contusion in his hip: his wounds were for some days considered mortal. Every possible attention was paid to his situation.—When Commodore Perry sailed for Buffalo, he was so far recovered that he took passage on board our fleet. The fleet touched at Erie. The citizens saw the affecting spectacle of Harrison and Perry supporting the wounded British hero, still unable to walk without help, from the beach to their lodgings.

On board of the Detroit, twenty-four hours after her surrender, were found snugly stowed away in the hold, two Indian Chiefs, who had the courage to go on board at Malden, for the purpose of acting as sharp shooters to kill our officers. One had the courage to ascend into the round top and discharge his piece, but the whizzing of shot, splinters, and bits of rigging, soon made the place too warm for him—he descended faster than he went up; at the moment he reached the deck, the fragments of a seaman's head struck his comrade's face, and covered it with blood and brains. He vociferated the savage interjection "quoh!" and both sought safety below.

The British officers had domesticated a bear at Malden. Bruin accompanied his comrades to battle—was on deck of the Detroit during the engagement, and escaped unhurt.

The killed of both fleets were thrown over board as fast as they fell. Several were washed ashore upon the island and the main during the gales that succeeded the action.

Commodore Perry treated the prisoners with humanity and indulgence; several Canadians, having wives at Malden, were permitted to visit their families on parole.

The British were superior in the length and number of their guns, as well as in the number of men. The American fleet was manned with a motly set of beings, Europeans, Africans, Americans, from every part of the United States. Full one fourth were blacks. I saw one Russian, who could not speak a word of English. They were brave—and who could be otherwise under the command of Perry?

The day after the battle, the funeral obsequies of the American and British officers, who had fallen in the action were performed, in an appropriate and affecting manner. An opening on the margin of the bay was selected for the interment of the bodies. The crews of both fleets attended. The weather was fine—the elements seemed to participate in the solemnities of the day, for every breeze was hushed and not a wave ruffled the surface of the water. The procession of boats—the neat appearance of the officers and men—the music—the slow and regular motion of the oars, striking in exact time with the notes of the solemn dirge—the mournful waving of the flags—the sound of the minute guns from the different ships in the harbor—the wild and solitary aspect of the place—the stillness of nature, gave to the scene an air of melancholy grandeur, better felt than described—all acknowledged its influence—all were sensibly affected. What a contrast did it exhibit to the terrible conflict of the preceding day! Then the people of the two squadrons were engaged in the deadly strife of arms. Now they associated like brothers, to pay the last sad tribute of respect to the dead of both nations.

Five officers were interred, two American and three British. Lt. Brooks and midshipman Laub of the Lawrence; Captain Finnis and Lt. Stokoe of the Queen Charlotte, and Lt. Garland of the Detroit. The graves are but a few paces from the beach, and the future traveller of either nation, will find no memento by which to distinguish the American from the British hero.

The marines of our fleet were highly complimented by the commodore, for their good conduct; although it was the first time the most of them had seen a square rigged vessel, being fresh from Harrison's army.

The Kentuckians proved, on this occasion, as has the commodore since, that they can fight on both elements.

Captain Downie.

From a late St. John's paper.

Captain G. Downie, who fell in the late engagement on Lake Champlain, was the son of a respectable Clergyman in the county of Ross. At an early period of his youth, he entered into the Navy as a Midshipman, and served on board the Circe frigate, in the memorable battle at Camperdown. He acted in the same capacity, for some time, in the Melampus, and afterwards in the Apollo frigate in the West Indies for several years. In this station, his uniform good conduct and strict attention to his duty, received the most flattering approbation of his superiors, and recommended him to the particular notice of Admiral Montague, the Commander of the Jamaica station, who promoted him to the rank of Lieutenant. On his return to England, for the recovery of his health, which had been much impaired, his promotion was confirmed by the Admiralty; and in 1804, he was appointed by Earl, St. Vincent to the Sea-horse frigate, of 36 guns, then commanded by the hon. capt. Boyle. This was the commencement of Lieut. Downie's career as a distinguished officer. In May, 1805, in a six oared cutter, manned from the Sea-horse, he performed a most important service in the Mediterranean, by the capture of a Spanish convoy, laden with naval and ordnance stores, though under the protection of a battery, two armed schooners, and several mortar and gun launches. This gallant achievement was effected with infinite judgment, intrepidity, and spirit, by Lieut. Downie, and his brave comrades, of which a most honorable report was made by captain Boyle, in his public despatch to the admiralty.

Captain Boyle was succeeded in his command by the late much lamented Captain J. Stewart, between whom and Mr. Downie, who was then 1st Lieutenant the most confidential intercourse subsisted. The admirable discipline, order, and regularity of the ship's company of the Sea-horse attracted the notice of Lord Collingwood, the commander in Chief, who, to that high state of discipline, combined with the skill and gallantry of the Officers mainly attributed the splendid victory obtained by this single frigate in the attack and defeat of a squadron of Turkish ships in the Archipelago, in the night of the 5th July, 1805.

This was one of the most celebrated action fought by a single ship during the war against a force so greatly superiour. After a severe and sanguinary engagement of four hours, it terminated in the capture of the Beder Zatter of 52 guns and 500 men. Another frigate was sunk, and a corvette escaped. In this brilliant affair, which reflects so much lustre on the British flag, Lieutenant Downie bore a conspicuous share. Such was the tremendous fire of the Sea-horse, and such the obstinate bravery of the enemy that 165 men were killed & a 190 wounded in the Turkish ship before her colours were struck! Lieut. Downie was immediately put in command of the captured frigate, which he carried to Malta, and soon after he was promoted to the rank of master and commander, his commission being dated from the day of the action.

In the year 1810, Captain Downie was appointed by Mr. Yorke to the command of the Royalist sloop of war in the Downs. In this most useful though unprofitable service, Captain Downie, by his unceasing activity, vigilance, and perseverance, in all weathers, captured or destroyed so many of the enemy's privateers in the channel, that on the 1st of January 1813, he received from Lord Melville the great object of his ambition the rank of a Post Captain in the British Navy.

Captain Downie, though a strict disciplinarian, yet always conciliated the attachment of his ship's company, by the temper and impartiality with which he noticed any neglect of duty. To preserve the health of the men was his first object, and this he attained in a great degree, by rigidly enforcing a general observance of temperance and cleanliness.

This enterprising spirit and zeal in the prompt and vigorous discharge of every public duty, no doubt, pointed him out, among others, as eminently qualified for the arduous service on the Canadian Lakes. In April last he sailed with the expedition from Portsmouth, to join the fleet on Lake Ontario, as second in command to Sir James Yeo, where he remained till the end of August, when he was detached by that officer to take the command of the flotilla on Lake Champlain, for the purpose of co-operating with the army under Sir George Prevost.

On the 11th September while gallantly leading his ship Confiance, to attack the American commodore, he was unfortunately killed, at the commencement of the action. Captain Downie was honoured with the friendship of many distinguished officers of high rank in service, by whom he was much esteemed. In private life, his many amiable and estimable qualities endeared him to a numerous and respectable circle of friends, who sincerely lamented his untimely fall. Indeed, the death of an officer of such acknowledged talents in his profession, and of such high promise, may justly be regarded as a public loss.

From the United States Gazette.

Lieutenant FRANKLIN E. HOWELL, killed in the engagement on board the United States' frigate President, was a son of the late Governor Howell, of New-Jersey. — When about four years old he had the misfortune to lose his father, whose loss, however, was in a great measure made up to him by Gen. Franklin Davenport of Woodbury, who took him into his family and treated him with all the affection of a kind and tender parent. Under the more immediate care and instruction of Miss Deborah Davenport, sister to the general, he received the rudiments of his moral and religious education, which had an abiding effect on him. His literary acquirements, in which he had made considerable progress, were obtained in the Woodbury Academy. He was entered a midshipman in the United States service, under Commodore Decatur, sometime in the year 1811, in which capacity his conduct was such as to acquire him the esteem of his equal and superior officers, and to recommend him to the attention of the government, who in the year 1814 conferred on him the rank of lieutenant. In his disposition he was amiable, in his deportment moral, in his manners unusually polite and gentlemanly, in his office firm and brave. — Such was this young gentleman, who fell in the late destructive war, at the early age of eighteen, in bravely defending the flag of his country. Thus have been blasted the fond hopes and pleasing expectations of many kind parents and friends, by this worse than useless war! He has left a large circle of relations, friends and acquaintances to lament his premature death; but while they mourn they have the consolation to reflect that he fell in undauntedly discharging his official duty.

From the Boston Patriot.

It may be recollected that in the engagement between the U. S. ship Wasp, and the British brig of war Reindeer, two officers on board the American vessel were stated to have been dangerously wounded, viz. HENRY S. LANGDON, Jr. and FRANK TOSCAN, Midshipmen, of Portsmouth, N. H. — They have both since died of their wounds. The following particulars concerning the former of these young gentlemen are contained in a letter from an officer of the Wasp:

"He was stationed in the foretop, and there commanded a body of marines, from whose musketry the enemy suffered severely during the engagement, as they themselves acknowledged. About the middle of the action, the Reindeer shot athwart the Wasp's bows, so that the foresail of the latter was in the way of her own men, and prevented the effect of their fire. Unwilling thus to seek respite from danger, or that the enemy should profit by their inactivity, the men, cheered by his example, swung themselves upon the foreyard, and presenting their muskets under the foresail, poured a deadly and destructive fire upon the Reindeer's deck. In this hazardous situation he received a musket-ball in the breast, which proved to be mortal, but did not then deter him from duty; he refused to be taken on deck, or to quit his post, until the action was over, and, with a veteran composure to the last, kept encouraging his men to keep cool and take good aim.

"He lingered until the arrival of the Wasp at L'Orient, and there laid down for his beloved country, a life, which, if spared, would have been devoted to her service; leaving to be lamented, by his afflicted friends, the loss of the greatest worth and goodness of heart, combined with the most amiable disposition and pleasing manners."

From the Delaware Gazette.

Com. Thomas Macdonough,

The hero of Champlain, was born at the Trap, in New Castle county and state of Delaware, in Dec. 1783. His father, Dr. Thomas Macdonough, was born at the same place and was practising physic there, at the beginning of the revolutionary war. At the particular request of his friend, col. Haslet, who was killed at Princeton; he took the command of a battalion of the Delaware regiment. After his tour of duty was performed, he returned to his native state, where he took the command of a regiment of militia, and where he was afterwards appointed an associate judge in the court of Common Pleas, in which office he continued until his death in 1793. The Doctor's father, James Macdonough, was a respectable inhabitant of the county, and died at a very advanced age in 1792. Dr. Thos. Macdonough left four sons, James, Thomas, Samuel, and John—James, the elder, entered as a midshipman on board the Constellation with capt. Truxton; and, after distinguishing himself under that gallant commander, returned to his native state, disabled by the loss of a leg, sustained in the capture of the Insurgent. At his return Thomas was peaceably employed in a store, in Middletown, in his native state; but catching from James the soldier's flame he entered, as his brother had done, as a Midshipman in the naval service of his country. He was then about seventeen years of age; and, in a profession thus voluntarily and ardently embraced, he was not likely to remain long undistinguished. A speck of war only was seen in our political horizon, and against the Tripolitans the opportunities for enterprise were very rare. These, however, when they did occur, were embraced by our naval heroes with an eagerness, and executed with an intrepidity and skill which not only astonished the world, but even themselves.—Sympathy which give a single force to their united action, and a generous emulation, which stimulated their courage almost to desperation, gave to Great Britain an ominous presage of their future greatness, to their country the fondest and proudest hopes, and made their Barbarian enemy exclaim, 'they are more than mortals.' Among such as these Maconough was eminently distinguished, and by his conduct in the destruction of the Philadelphia. and the subsequent capture of a Tripolitan gunboat, by the side of Decatur, he was promoted to the rank of lieutenant.

Without the patronage of friends, our young hero advanced by his courage and conduct, from the humble birth of a midshipman to a command which covered the heart of the nation; a command by the experience of former wars proved to be of vital importance—where every thing was to be created by his genius and protected by his vigilance.

In a very gloomy moment he answered the hopes of his countrymen, and in a radiance of glory dispelled the menacing storm. But it was not he! It was the Lord of Hosts who stopped to show to an offending nation, in a moment of despondence, that he will listen to the prayers and nerve the arm of a Christian Hero. An habitual respect for the Christian religion is often mistaken for Christianity, and pressed into service to adorn the character of the Soldier—not such are the claims of Maconough. His religion appears to be of that vital nature which reaches the heart, tempers the affections, and regulates the actions. It may be said in spiritual, as in temporal affairs, that he has fought the good fight and came off more than conqueror. In a letter to a relative in Delaware, written in June last, after expressing his warm regard for the place of his nativity, and friends of his youth, and promising to visit them if God should spare his life to the close of the present season, he declares the happiness he derives from his reliance upon the merits and atonement to Christ, and earnestly recommends to them a religious life as the only one which good sense would point out to those convinced that there is another world. To his brother's widow, left in slender circumstances, he tenders liberal pecuniary aid, and delicately releases her from all obligation on that score, by declaring that it is his religion which makes him the widow's friend. A victory obtained under the command of such a hero, ought to inspire us with the hope, that God will stay his avenging hand, if the people will look up to and acknowledge him to be their God. Let the example of Maconough teach those to whom the nation has confided its sword, that Religion does not unnerve the arm of the brave, nor lessen the authority of its votary. Before he went into action, he prostrated himself, with his crew, before the most high, and confiding in the Almighty, they fearlessly met the enemy.—When he saw the hostile fleet approaching, he observed to those around him, "they are superior to us in force, but by the blessing of God we can beat them." And so indeed he did. The world has often been called upon to witness the prodigious effect of religion in exalting the human energies. Without recurring to the memorable æras of Joshua, David and Maccabeus, when a religious dependence on the Lord of Hosts excited to almost supernatural valor, or to the histories of the Romans, Greeks and other Pagan nations, whom favorable omens, by inspiring with even a superstitious sense of the protection of Heaven, were sure almost to lead to victory, or the combats under the banners of the Cross for the tomb of our Saviour, in which were strikingly displayed the triumph of religious enthusiasm over the greatest privations and dangers; we see in our day, the striking effects of religion upon an army, which we call barbarians, but to which enlightened Europe now owes its deliverance.

This army, although composed principally of raw levies, yet inspired by a religious confidence, has triumphed over the best appointed and disciplined army, led by the most distinguished captain of the age. The Russian Gen. Suwaroff knew the power of religion in the day of battle, and always availed himself of it with an irresistible effect, and in the solemn address of the renowned Kutusoff, and procession of the holy cross, at the battle of Borodino, who does not see the soul of that valor, displayed by the Russians, in that most sanguinary of all conflicts.

Let, then, every officer inculcate, by precept and practice, a regular attention to the duties of religion, and God will reward it by a gift of more than mortal strength and valor.

Various forms of religious duties have been ordered, in all armies, from a conviction of their utility; but they can never be effectual, unless they are felt, as more than forms, by officers and soldiers.

Life of Colonel George Croghan,

BY A LADY OF FRANKFORT.

To the Editor of the Port Folio.

Frankfort, July 22, 1814.

Sir—Upon receiving the letter which you did me the honor to address to me by Mrs. B. I immediately took such measures as were necessary to procure the information you requested. I now transmit to you the result of my enquiries, regretting that it was not in my power to do it sooner.

At the time when Col. Croghan and myself were inmates of the same house, he was in his fourteenth year. No incident occurred during that early period, sufficiently interesting to find a place in his history; yet, even then, his conduct exhibited a happy combination of those talents and principles which have already procured him the admiration and gratitude of his country.

Though ingenuous in his disposition and unassuming and conciliating in his manner, he was remarkable for discretion and steadiness. His opinions, when once formed, were maintained with modest, but persevering firmness; and the propriety of his decisions generally justified the spirit with which they were defended. Yet, though rigid in his adherence to principle, and his estimate of what was right or improper, in cases of minor importance he was all compliance. I never met with a youth who would so cheerfully sacrifice every personal gratification to the wishes or accommodation of his friends. In sickness and disappointment he evinced a degree of patience and fortitude which could not have been exceeded by any veteran in the school of misfortune or philosophy. Were I asked, what were the most prominent features of his character? or rather, what were the prevailing dispositions of his mind? at the period of which I am speaking, I would answer, decision and urbanity; the former, resulting from the uncommon and estimable qualities of his understanding—the latter, from the concentration of all the sweet “charities of life” in his heart. Thus far from my own observation. I have seldom seen Col. Croghan for the last eight years; but subjoin the testimony of those to whose observation he has been exposed during the whole of that period.

An intelligent young gentleman, who was his associate in study and in arms, has given me a brief sketch of his military career, which I herewith transmit; together with such corroborative and additional circumstances, as I have collected from other sources, and which, in substance, amount to this.

“Lieutenant Colonel George Croghan was born at Locust Grove, near the falls of Ohio, on the 15th of November, 1791. His father, Major William Croghan, left Ireland at an early period of his life; was appointed an officer in our revolutionary army, and discharged his duties as such, to the satisfaction of the commander in chief. His mother is the daughter of John Clark, Esq. of Virginia, a gentleman of worth and respectability, who exerted himself greatly and contributed largely towards the support of our just and glorious contest. He had five sons; four of whom were officers in the revolutionary army. General William Clark, who, together with Captain Lewis, explored, and is at present the governor of Louisiana, was too young to participate with his brothers in the achievement of our liberties; but his conduct since is a sufficient demonstration of the part he would have taken, had he been riper in years. The military talents of George R. Clark have obtained for him the flattering appellation of “the father of the western country.”

“Col. Croghan has always been esteemed generous and humane; and, when a boy, his manly appearance and independence of sentiment and action, commanded the attention and admiration of all who knew him.

“The selection of his speeches for scholastic exercises tended in some measure to mark his peculiar talent. They were of a nature entirely military. He read with delight whatever appertained to military affairs, and would listen for hours to conversations respecting battles. His principal amusements were gunning and foxhunting. He would frequently rise at twelve o’clock at night, and repair to the woods alone (or with no attendant but his little servant) either to give chase to the fox, or battle to the wildcat and raccoon.

"Nothing offended him more, than for any one, even in jest, to say a word disrespectful of Washington.

"While in the state of Kentucky his time was principally occupied by the study of his native tongue—geography—the elements of geometry—and the Latin and Greek languages. In these different branches of literature he made a respectable progress.

"In the year 1808, he left Locust Grove for the purpose of prosecuting his studies in the university of William and Mary.—In this institution he graduated as A. B. on the 4th of July 1810; and delivered, on the day of his graduation, an oration on the subject of expatriation. This oration was deemed by the audience, concise, ingenious and argumentative, and was pronounced in a manner which did great credit to his oratorical powers. The ensuing summer he attended a course of lectures on law, and upon the termination of the course, returned to his father's, where he prosecuted the study of the same profession, and occasionally indulged himself in miscellaneous reading. Biography and history have always occupied much of his attention. He is an enthusiastic admirer of the writings of Shakspeare, and can recite most of the noted passages of that great poet and philosopher. He admires tragedy, but not comedy. He is (as his countenance indicates) rather of a serious cast of mind; yet no one admires more a pleasant anecdote, or an unaffected sally of wit.—With his friends he is affable and free from reserve—his manners are prepossessing—he dislikes ostentation, and was never heard to utter a word in praise of himself.

"In the autumn of 1811, was fought the battle of Tippecanoe. This was the first opportunity that offered for the display of his military talents. He embraced it with avidity—he left his father's house in the character of a volunteer, and was appointed aid to Gen. Harrison. On the 7th of November an attack was made on the troops under the command of that officer; the enemy were repulsed with valor; and during the engagement young Croghan evinced the greatest courage, activity and military skill. His services were acknowledged by all; and he exhibited such proofs of a genius for war, that many of his companions in arms remarked that "he was born a soldier." A cant saying among the troops at Tippecanoe, was, "to do a main business;" and during the battle, he would ride from post to post, exciting the courage of the men by exclaiming, "now, my brave fellows, now is the time to do a main business." Upon the return of the troops from Tippecanoe, they were frequently met by persons coming to ascertain the fate of their children or friends. Among the number of these, was a very poor and aged man, whose son was slain in battle. Col. Croghan having ascertained the situation of the old man, and observing his inability to perform much bodily labor, regularly made his fires for him every morning, and supplied him with provisions, clothes and money. Many acts of this kind are related of him, by the soldiers and officers of Tippecanoe.

"After the battle of Tippecanoe his military ardor greatly increased, and upon the prospect of a speedy declaration of war, he expressed a desire to join the army.—Recommendatory letters of the most flattering kind were written by generals Harrison and Boyd to the Secretary of War; and upon the commencement of hostilities against G. Britain, he was appointed Captain in the 17th regiment of infantry. He was stationed some time at Clark cantonment, near the Falls of Ohio; but had not been long in command there, before he was ordered to march, with what regulars he had, to the head-quarters of the north-western army, then at Detroit. His countenance beamed with delight upon receiving this order. There were large bodies of militia and volunteers on their march to Detroit; but before they had proceeded far they heard of Hull's surrender.

"Shortly after this, the command of the north-western army was given to General Harrison. Colonel Croghan commanded a short time at Fort Defiance, on the Miami, but upon the defeat of Gen. Winchester, he was ordered to Fort Meigs. His conduct during that memorable siege is handsomely noticed in general Harrison's official report, and he was shortly afterwards promoted to a majority, and stationed with his battalion at Upper Sandusky. While there, he received information, by express, of an attack upon Lower Sandusky. It was late in the afternoon when the intelligence reached him—the road between the two places was intolerably bad—the distance 36 miles, and the rain descending in torrents; yet he proceeded at the head of his battalion to its relief, and continued his march until 12 o'clock at night, by which time he had advanced 20 miles. It then became so dark that he and his men were obliged to lie down in the road and wait the return of light, rather than run the risk of losing their way.

"He arrived at Fort Ball, 12 miles distant, before sun-rise the next morning, having waded through mud and mire frequently waist deep, and having been exposed to a heavy rain during the whole night. He was there informed that the report of an attack upon Lower Sandusky was unfounded, but after remaining a few days at Fort Ball, he proceeded thither, having received orders to take the command at that post. He arrived there about the 15th of July. A few days after this, Fort Meigs was besieged by a large British and Indian force. No doubt was entertained that the enemy would visit Sandusky: accordingly Colonel Croghan labored day and night to place the fort, which had received no advantages from nature or art, in a state of defence.—The necessity of cutting a ditch round the fort, immediately presented itself to him. This was done—but in order to render the enemy's plans abortive, should they even succeed in leaping the ditch, which was 9 feet wide and 6 deep, he had large logs placed on the top of the fort, and so adjusted that an inconsiderable weight would cause them to fall from their position, and crush to death all who might be situated below. This improvement in the art of fortification took place but a few days before the attack. It is novel, and originated with himself.

A short time before the action, he wrote the following concise and impressive letter to a friend. "The enemy are not far distant—I expect an attack—I will defend this post to the last extremity—I have just sent away the women and children, with the sick of the garrison, that I may be able to act without incumbrance—Be satisfied—I shall, I hope, do my duty.—The example set me by my revolutionary kindred is before me—let me die rather than prove unworthy of their name."

"In the afternoon of the first of August, the attack upon Fort Sandusky was commenced. The particulars of that memorable and brilliant transaction can be collected from General Harrison's official account, dated "Seneca Town, August 4th, 1813," and a lucid statement of the motives most honorable to him, which influenced the conduct of Col. Croghan on that occasion, are contained in an "extract of a letter from himself to his friend in Seneca Town, dated the 27th August, 1813."—These, and several other interesting particulars, will be found in the public prints, which were issued between the 14th of August, and the 16th of September.

"The conduct of Col. Croghan after the battle, was such as might have been expected from his behaviour during its continuance. The wounded were treated by him with the greatest tenderness—with considerable peril he supplied them with water, by means of buckets, let down by ropes from the outside of the pickets; and during the night, when he could not open the fort with safety, he had a communication made under the ditch, by means of a trench dug under the picketing, through which the wounded were conveyed into the fort.

Col. Croghan accompanied Gen. Harrison to Malden, but as the brigade to which he was attached was stationed there, he did not participate in the battle of the Thames. He is remarkable as a disciplinarian, and his orders are given with more promptness, precision and energy, than are usually met with even in more aged and experienced commanders."

The following extract of a letter, written by a fellow student and fellow soldier of Lieut. Col. Croghan, is here introduced as throwing additional light on the military character of that distinguished young officer.

Lieut. Col. George Croghan is a native of Kentucky, and the second son of Major William Croghan, near Louisville. He is the nephew of the gallant hero and accomplished General George Rogers Clark, the father of the western country, and of Gen. William Clark, the present enterprising governor of Missouri. His father is a native of Ireland, and having early embarked his fortunes in America, was a distinguished officer in the war of the revolution.

Lieut. Col. Croghan was born on the 15th November, 1791, and received all the advantages of education the best grammar schools in Kentucky could afford, until in his 17th year, when he commenced a scientific course in the ancient college of William and Mary in Virginia. Both at school and at college he was remarked for an open manliness of character, an elevation of sentiment, a strength of intellect, connected with a high and persevering ambition.

In July 1810, he graduated at William and Mary college, and soon after commenced the study of the law. With this view he continued to visit that university till the fall of 1811, when he volunteered his services in a campaign up the Wabash. A short time before the action at Tippecanoe, he was appointed aid-de-camp to Gen. Boyd, the second in command: and, although from his situation, he was not enabled to evince that activity which has since so much distinguished him, he exhibited a soul undaunted in one of the most sanguinary conflicts of the present day, and accordingly received the thanks of the commanding general.

In consequence of his services on the Washash expedition, he was appointed a captain in the provisional army directed to be raised and organised in the spring of 1812. In August he marched with the detachment from Kentucky, under Gen. Winchester, destined to relieve Gen. Hull in Canada; and to those acquainted with the movements of that gallant but unfortunate little army, the caution, zeal and military capacity of Captain Croghan was conspicuous. Upon visiting the various encampments of the army on its march along the Miami of the Lake, both before and after the attack on Fort Wayne, the ground occupied by Captain Croghan was easily designated by the judicious fortifications erected for the night. On the movement of the army towards the Rapids, he was entrusted with the command of Fort Winchester, at the junction of the Auglaize and Miami river, where he manifested his usual military arrangement. After the defeat at the river Raisin he joined Gen. Harrison at the Rapids, previously to the erection of Fort Meigs.

It is creditable to the discernment of Gen. Harrison, that he relied with the utmost confidence on the judicious arrangements of Captain Croghan, in the trying, brilliant and ever memorable siege of Fort Meigs. In the sortie under the gallant soldier, Col. Miller, on the 5th of May, to the companies led by captains Croghan, Laghan and Bradford, was confided the storming of the British batteries, defended by a regular force and a body of Indians, either of them superior in number to the assailants. Here Captain Croghan's gallantry was again noticed in general orders.

At a very critical period of the last campaign, that of 1813, young Croghan, now promoted to a majority, was appointed to the command of Fort Sandusky, at Lower Sandusky. On his conduct in the defence of that post, the official documents of the time, and the applause of a grateful country, are the most honorable commentary. The character of the campaign was changed from defensive to offensive operations, and its issue very materially influenced by the achievement. For his valor and good conduct on this occasion, Major Croghan was made, by brevet, a lieutenant colonel.

Concise and eloquent eulogium on the character of Adjutant THOMAS POE, late of the Pennsylvania Volunteers, by Lieut. D. Cornyn, of the U. S. army.

ADJUTANT THOMAS POE.

The famous battle of Bridgewater, did not consign to the grave of glory a hero more intrepid than this gallant and distinguished patriot; warmed by the love of country, cherishing correct principles, and animated by the example of the revolutionary veteran his father, he spiritedly grasped the gleaming arms of battle, and Erie, Chippewa and Bridgewater, bear illustrious and honorable testimony to the high and daring virtues of his manly soul; his career of glory was short but brilliant—why did I say short? Posterity will rank him among our dearest sons, and secure to his memory an imperishable and exalted fame.

Yes, once amiable, gallant and beloved Poe! The silent grave that covers your brave remains, cannot enshrine your glory—Sacred be that ground where sleep our hero's bones! Often will the traveller of unborn generations stay his weary course and reverently stoop with the descending sun, over the tombs of the warriors of Bridgewater, his eyes suffused with tears of admiration, gratitude and love—and for them will the fair bosom of female sensibility and beauty, heave throughout every age, the affectionate and tender sigh.

The historian, the painter and the bard, will put genius in requisition, to emblazon the honor of that immortal day, which gave victory to inferior numbers of the sons of freedom, over the victors of renowned but fallen France. Poor Poe! Dear lamented youth! Your noble heart poured forth its generous and crimson current to secure the glories of that imperishable and Spartan battle—A battle, the recollection of which will be as terrible to Albion's haughty sons, during endless time, as is the stupendous and frightful cataract, in the vicinity of which it was fought, to the astounded vision of the traveller. Your death indeed is enviable—how ingloriously the multitude lies down—You rest with heroes and your fame is now eternal—Happy lot!—made sacred by a glorious cause.—Reader, here is the character, the brilliant eulogy, given of this amiable and youthful hero, by an officer,* who witnessed both his valor and his fall.

Adjutant Thomas Poe was mortally wounded and survived but a few hours.—He was brave—he acted the soldier and

*Lieutenant Patton.

Major Croghan acknowledged himself mainly indebted to a private of the 1st Regt. of Pa. Vol. for his success in this affair. Major was entrusted with the management of the defence in a block house. I had this from Brown himself a very reliable Youth.

the gentleman upon all occasions, and his name will be found recorded among the heroes of the age, for generations to come.'

Peace to your manes, patriotic soldier!
Your name will have friends as long as Freedom lives.

SPEECHES ON VARIOUS OCCASIONS.

A SKETCH OF THE Hon. Mr. Holmes' Speech,

In the Senate of Massachusetts, against the proposed amendment of the Constitution of the U. States, to exclude the Slave Representation.

MR. PRESIDENT—Were there no other objections than the manner and time of introducing this amendment, these alone would be sufficient. It has been recommended by an association of men who were probably selected for very different purposes, and who could derive no authority from the law or constitution. I have denied and I still deny that the members of the Hartford Convention had more power than so many unauthorized individuals, to act, recommend or advise. And these individuals would be entitled to more respect did they not assume a tone and consequence to which they are not entitled.

I did hope that the committee of this Legislature who reported this and the other amendments, would have favored us with some reasons for its adoption. But this they have failed to do, either in the preamble to the report, or when called upon at the board. It seems that amendments to the Constitution are to be introduced and passed with as little ceremony as the most trifling resolve—And this too in a time of war and party rancour.

A constitution or charter of government should obtain a character for stability. It should be the offspring of calmness and discretion. It is not made for a day or year, or to gratify a party. Why then, sir, are we called upon at this time, to alter that charter, which was the result of the greatest wisdom and the purest patriotism—the effect of compromise, produced by mutual concession, and candour and forbearance?

I regret, sir, that I have not the aid of the Hon. President of this Senate, as I once before had, in opposing innovations upon the Constitution under the pretext of amendment. I very well remember, that some ten or twelve years ago, in the other branch of this Legislature, that I witnessed the talents and zeal of the President, in offering an amendment to the Constitution upon general principles. We then united in deprecating innovation in the national charter upon frivolous pretences, and without the most pressing and palpable necessity. We urged that such amendments would diminish and destroy that habitual attachment for the Constitution which was essential to its preservation. And we feared that by frequent alterations, the energy of the system might be impaired and our government become the football of every faction. But times are changed—And gentlemen cease to reverence that Constitution, as soon as it ceases to secure to them power and controul.—Had the present minority been the majority in the United States, I am inclined to believe that we should hear them loud in their denunciations of all these innovations which you proffer in the name of amendments. I well know that the opinion of Washington is of little authority with the present majority of this state. But if gentlemen can be induced to look at and respect his opinion, they will find in his farewell address, an excellent text on the subject of amendments to the Constitution.

Have these few gentlemen who met at Hartford, the vanity to presume that they have more wisdom, to discern the general good, and more influence to reconcile conflicting interests, or subdue inveterate prejudices, than the sages who framed this Constitution with a Washington at their head? Could this Constitution ever have been adopted, had not the necessity been most urgent and the danger most imminent? We had just emerged from the war of the revolution. The tempest had subsided, and in the sunshine of peace we had hoped to enjoy the fruits of our patriotic labours. But, thirteen free and independent States, varying in size, power and habits, intoxicated with the attribute of sovereignty and flushed with the prospect of liberty, were to be united under one federal head. How was this to be effected, and upon what terms? Each by the confederation had had an equal vote. These States were now to adopt a government, wherein these differences were to be reconciled. Was the state of Massachusetts to be put on a level with Rhode-Island? Was Virginia to stand on equal ground with Delaware? This would be outrageous. Were the voices of these little States to be in proportion to their members? By this their sovereignty would be extinguished and their names forgotten. Besides, different habits and prejudices were to be combatted—State pride and State jealousy were to be overcome, and the different local feelings and interest of the several sections of the Confederate States, were to be consulted. To see a people who had but just achieved a revolution, and had began to realize the benefit of independence, without an energetic government, torn by feuds and jealousies, and in imminent danger of losing that freedom, which had been gained at so much expense of treasure and blood, was afflicting and humiliating. The friends of liberty began to despond. Some, there were, (now high in the ranks of the opposition) who began, it is said, to think of a master, and a letter was written to a Prince of Prussia, inviting him to come to America, and take upon himself the government of these States. But heaven averted the danger. A Constitution was proposed in the spirit of concession and compromise. The influence of the great Washington prevailed. No one else could have effected the compromise. He is entitled to our gratitude, and so is the present Chief Magistrate of the United States, without whose influence, perhaps, Washington would never have accepted a seat in the Convention. The difficulties were overcome, and the principle agreed to, that the Legislature should consist of two branches, in one of which the States had an equal vote, and in the other the people. Here was the compromise.—The small and large States had a check upon each other, equal to the influence for which each had contended.

Beware how you touch this sacred charter of your government. Approach it with fear and trembling. Put off your shoes from off your feet, for the ground on which you tread is holy.

The clause to be amended was equally the effect of compromise. The people of the south probably contended that their representation ought to be in proportion to their inhabitants. They might well contend that holding slaves was a municipal regulation with which we had no concern. That they had as good a right to disfranchise their black population as we had our children or servants. That these blacks were human beings, and though they had no rights of suffrage, still there were many persons in the Northern States in the same situation, and that whether they were to remain slaves or be manumitted, depended exclusively upon the laws of the States holding them. It was probably contended on the other hand, that these slaves were a species of property, having few or no civil rights; and that they ought not to be counted at all. At last it was agreed that this dispute should also be compromised. Direct taxes were to be apportioned according to representation.—We consented that the slave-holding States should count three fifths of their slaves in making up their representation, provided they would consent to be taxed in the same proportion.—And this article so modified, was accepted and considered as a very advantageous to the Northern States. To prove this, sir, I will refer you to the letters of the late General Hamilton, published in "the Federlist," and will read you some remarks of certain members of the Convention of this state on the adoption of the Constitution of the United States. [Here Mr. H. read parts of the speeches of Messrs. Dawes, Dana, Gore, King, and Jones, who contended zealously and eloquently for this article, and that it was very much in favour of the Northern States, and proceeded.]

Well, sir, has there been any unexpected result from the operation of this article? Has any construction been put upon it different from its meaning or intent? I have heard of no complaint of this sort. Have the slave-holding States taken an undue advantage of that clause in the Constitution which admits their importation until 1808, and leaves it discretionary with Congress to admit or prohibit it afterwards? I believe not. Unless I misrecollect, Congress passed a law to prevent this importation, before the Constitutional prohibition had elapsed, to take effect the moment the Constitution would admit of it. And I believe further, that the Southern members generally supported and voted for the act. And if I mistake not, the principal opposition to that act came from New-England! Surprising as this is, I think it is true. A Mr. Brown of Rhode-Island, in, I think, the only speech he made while a member, opposed the law which prohibited the slave trade. Rhode-Island, the great commercial State of Rhode-Island! which is hankering after an equal representation of the people in Congress, has, since the adoption of the Constitution contributed more to the increase of the slave representation, by an infamous traffic in human flesh, than any other State in the Union. Notwithstanding, it was not in the power of Congress to prohibit the importation of slaves until 1808, still their increase has not been equal to that of the free inhabitants. This is easily proved. In 1800, the whole number of free inhabitants was 4,406,817, slaves 896,849. In 1810, the free population was 6,048,539; slaves 1,191,361.

Free Pop. 1800, 1810, Free Pop. 1810.
As 4,406,817: 896,849:: 6,048,539: 1,230,962.
the proportion of slaves for 1810—So that the actual number is less than proportionable, or has relatively diminished 39,598 in ten years; eight years of which period, Congress had no power to prohibit their importation. It is therefore manifest that this pretended evil is rapidly diminishing.

But, sir, I do not regret that this subject is brought under discussion. It has been magnified and made the cause of great deception. Some have believed that the slaves have actually been voting away our rights and property. Let us strike out the whole number of slaves, and divide the 182 representatives equally among the free inhabitants of the United States. Instead of diminishing the number, let us suppose that Congress, as they might constitutionally do, had apportioned the 182 among the free inhabitants.

Free Pop. Rep. Free Pop. of N. England.
As 6,048,539: 182:: 1,471,973: 44 & a fraction
But their present number is 41 and a fraction—Hence New-England would gain three Representatives from the other States, and her proportion of the present direct tax would be increased about $99,000 annually. But of these three, Massachusetts and Rhode-Island would gain none. There are five New-England States, and you have three additional representatives. Rhode-Island, to have one, must increase her population a third, which would be out of proportion. Massachusetts, in the last apportionment, had a very small fraction, and she would not get one. Connecticut, New-Hampshire, and Vermont, would each gain one with the additional taxes; and poor Massachusetts and Rhode-Island, who have been to all the trouble and expense, and made all the noise, would be left as they were.

But we have now an equivalent, without the additional burden of the taxes. It is clear that between the periods of taking the census, that portion of the United States which increases the most rapidly, loses its equal representation in the same proportion as it gains in population, therefore all the other States gain in population more than in proportion to New-England, the latter is gradually gaining in representation during the period of ten years. For example—if 5,303,666, the population in 1800, gain 1,936,237, in ten years, what ought 1,233,011, the population in New-England in 1800, to gain in the same time? The answer is 450,141; but the actual gain was 238,962, only, being 211,79, less than their proportion. This, consequently is their relative loss of population.—The gain in representation being correspondent, it follows that New-England, at the expiration of ten years, had gained six representatives.—But as this gain was gradual during the whole period, one half of this number is the average gain. So that it results that by the operation of this principle, New-England gains three representatives, and loses three by the slave representation, which exactly balances the account. But it is not to be supposed that the New-England States, especially the large state of Rhode-Island, would be satisfied with an equal representation in one branch of the Legislature, and not in the other. In vain would they seek relief from equality in the House, so long as inequality could oppress them in the Senate. How stands the case there? As the whole free population of the United States is to the whole number of Senators, so is the free population of New-England to eight and a fraction—the number of Senators to which we should be entitled. But we now have, and always have had ten. You will see by this, sir, how much reason New-England has to complain. Equally represented in the House, and over represented in the Senate, and yet complaining of inequality. Rhode-Island is dissatisfied. What would become of her, were she to be made the subject of that equality for which she contends? What good reason can be given for disturbing the public tranquility with such unnecessary and unsavory propositions? Is it to increase present embarrassments? Is it to continue local jealousies, already too much excited?—We are told by the Report of those Convention gentlemen, that we must persist and persevere until the object is effected. You expect then that the United States will yield to your importunities by this seeming threat? The call for this amendment is to be incessant. Our rights have been abridged. The minority cannot control the majority. I repeat it, beware that you touch not the constitution with unhallowed hands. Will you say that we have polluted it? that we have broken it? Who is the judge? Take the beam from your own eye, and then you may, perhaps, see a little better to extract the mote from the eye of a brother. The gentleman from Essex [Mr. White] has said generally, that we had broken the constitution. This, for three years, has been your song. The constitution is violated: the compact is dissolved.

The doctrine of this Senate once was, that the Legislature had no right to declare a law of Congress unconstitutional. I have before me the journal of the Senate of 1799, containing a report in answer to certain resolutions of Virginia, declaring the alien and sedition acts, as they were called, unconstitutional, in which the Senate unanimously, except one, declare, that the decision on the constitutionality of a law of Congress, belongs exclusively to the judiciary of the United States. [Here Mr. H. read the names of the senators who voted for this report, among which were TIMOTHY BIGELOW and JOHN C. JONES. He then read several paragraphs of the report, one of which is as follows:—"This Legislature are persuaded that the decision of all cases in law and equity arising under the Constitution of the United States, and the construction of all laws made in pursuance thereof, are exclusively vested by the people in the judicial courts of the United States, that the people, in that solemn compact which is declared the supreme law of the land, have not constituted the State Legislatures the judges of the acts or measures of the federal government."

Sir, were we to look back two or three years, we should, I apprehend, find much in our own journals in contradiction of this doctrine. We undertake to decide upon the constitutionality of a law of Congress, with as much assurance as if we were wiser than all who have preceded us. I am not clear, sir, that the doctrine of this report does not go too far. I apprehend that a case may happen when it would be proper for the Legislature of a State to declare a law of Congress unconstitutional. But it must be an extreme case. The States are parties to the compact, and so are the people. Our Constitution is a compound. It is a contract in which all the states agree with each state, and also in which all the citizens agree with each citizen. In the case in which a citizen may resist a law as unconstitutional, a state might perhaps do the same. Should Congress palpably and grossly violate the Constitution and refuse redress—should the judicial power become corrupt, and support the oppression act—should an attempt to impeach these wicked Legislators fail, and an attempt to remove them by election be unsuccessful, as a last and dreadful resort, the individual in the one case, and the State Legislature in the other, as parties to the compact, might pronounce this law unconstitutional and act accordingly. But for gentlemen calmly to tell us over and over again, that the Constitution is broken by Congress, and the compact is dissolved, is heresy, bordering on inveterate madness. I fear, sir, I have wandered from the subject. I should not have indulged in these general remarks, had I not been led to them by the suggestion that the proposed amendments were rendered necessary by some supposed infraction of the Constitution. I did intend to have taken another view of the subject, but as the hour of adjournment is arrived, I will not further tire the patience of the Senate.

SPEECH

Of the Hon. Mr. Holmes, on closing the Debate on the Proposed Amendment to the Constitution of the U. States.

MR. PRESIDENT.—Our fathers fought and bled for us—they achieved our independence. Assailed by foes without, and traitors within, their struggle was great, but they triumphed. Our trials and distresses and the barbarities of the enemy, are still fresh in the recollections of many. Peace came—but it brought us no safety. We were without government—distracted and torn by discord. With extreme concern and parental solicitude, the patriots of the revolution effected the adoption of the constitution, and liberty was safe.—The advocates of this constitution, in Massachusetts, were happy under it, so long as their political friends had the management of the government. They rallied round it, were determined to defend it, and affected to become its exclusive guardians. All was right; the constitution was perfect, and its administrators infallible, while these paragons of wisdom were in pay. These disinterested patriots in office, saw that the country was prosperous, and felt that the people of the United States were the most happy people on earth. But, says the gentleman from Suffolk, (Mr. Sargeant) another king rose up who knew not Joseph. Mr. Jefferson was made President. All is reversed—the sun of prosperity is instantly obscured by a cloud—the administration is base, the constitution is intolerable, and the people a “many headed monster.” Notwithstanding the prosperity of the nation, during Mr. Jefferson’s administration, was unparalleled, and our commerce increased beyond the expectation of the most visionary theorist, still all was wrong. The administration were attacked—no energy, no spirit, no national honor—Insipid, pusillanimous rulers, who could not be “kicked into a war.”—Despised and trampled upon by all the powers of Europe, and yet dare not resent! Such was then the language of the present meek, consistent “friends of peace.” After the most unprecedented attempts to drive these rulers from the government; after compassing sea and land to make proselytes, and being discomfited in every attempt—we find these same men wishing to undermine the constitution, under the pretext of amendments.

An unauthorized and unconstitutional assemblage of individuals at Hartford, have proposed a string of alterations, and we are to adopt them without any substantial reasons offered, except that these very wise men recommended them. We are told, sir, with great composure, that it is enough that men of such wisdom have proposed them for adoption. And the gentleman from Essex, (Mr. White) asks, do the minority of this Senate expect that wisdom will die with them?—No, sir—Nor do we apprehend that it will expire with the members of the Hartford convention. If it should, it would have few mourners. You would not mourn, because you would expect to be the heirs, and we should not, because we have no relationship with the deceased.

But, sir, if gentlemen will pardon us, we will venture to question the great wisdom of adopting any of these amendments at this time. We have called upon gentlemen, not only to show these amendments reasonable, but to shew, as they ought, that they were indispensable. How have they succeeded? What evils have grown out of the constitution, which these alterations would have prevented? One gentleman (Mr. Thorndike) tells us very gravely, that the war would not have been declared had it not been for the slave representation! And he taxes our gravity while he attempts to prove it in his way—He states, but does not prove, that Mr. Jefferson was chosen by the slave representation. He then proceeds—had not Mr. J. been chosen, he would not have been re-chosen; and had he not been re-chosen, Mr. Madison would not have been chosen, and so there would have been no war—Wonderful! Wonderful!! I would ask the hon. gentleman, if in his wisdom he can tell what would have been the effect, had not Mr. Jefferson been chosen? Mr. Adams, to be sure, would have been the president—And this same Mr. Adams, is esteemed by that gentlemen and his friends, ten times worse than Mr. Jefferson. What vile things he would have done, God only knows.

We are told, too, that this war would not have happened, had it not been for the facility of admitting new states into the union. No proof of this. What had Louisiana to do with declaring war?—Louisiana, sir, is expending her property and blood to preserve the rights and honor of the country.—But I find that while there was a prospect of New-Orleans being conquered, your party has changed their tone, and admitted its vast importance to the union. Yes, sir, gentlemen who have property at New-Orleans, can very particularly, wish for its defence. And, I am grieved and mortified to find, that the best blood in the western country is to be spilt to defend the property of our northern merchants, while these very merchants are throwing every stumbling block in the way of prosecuting the war, abusing these back-woodsmen, and denouncing New-Orleans as a curse to the nation.

But we should have had no commercial restrictions nor war, had it required the concurrence of two thirds of both houses of congress. Readily admitted. Should these alterations succeed, we shall have no war with England. Her influence in this country is such, that nothing but a miracle could produce a war with her, should these alterations prevail. No, sir—No aggressions, however unprovoked or outrageous, would produce a war. More than one-third in the senate, might be less than one-fifth of the nation; and more than one-third in the house might be the representatives of three states out of eighteen. In either event, there would be no war. Is it too much to say that Britain could always be sure of a third in one or the other branch of the legislature? Look at what has happened and then judge. Where is the instance where your party has condemned Britain in any act of aggression against us? Have you not rather, most unqualifiedly, justified her in every thing? Amidst all her atrocities, barbarities, and vandalisms, who of you has doubted but that she was right? Freebooting, conflagrating, rapine and massacre—all, all, excused and even justified. Show me the man of your party who is an exception, and I will ask his pardon. Let, therefore, her means of influence be what they now are, and human nature must radically change, before any British outrage would be repelled or avenged. These alterations, then, go to the destruction of our liberties, and the subjugation of us to British power. Had these Hartford gentlemen intended to bring us to the footstool of the British throne, they could not have devised a more effectual method than this.

Are you not contented with your frequent usurpation of federal powers? Is it not enough that you have made a most dangerous and fatal inroad upon the constitution, by denying the power of the president over the militia? Will it not satisfy you that you also denied the general government the power to obtain an army except by voluntary enlistment, and that you are about to repeal a law of congress for the enlistment of minors? After these infractions of the constitution, we should have supposed that gentlemen would have been satisfied, without further fettering the general government.

Passing over the proposed exclusion of naturalized foreigners from office, upon which enough has been said in debate upon that article, let me ask why is it necessary to confine the president to one term, and to prevent the selection of a successor from the same state? The gentleman from Essex (Mr. White) has read much from the debates in the Virginia convention, to what purpose, I confess, I could not perceive. Surely the gentlemen would not cite the objections of the minority in Virginia against the constitution, as evidence that a different one ought to have been adopted. The objections of this minority were overruled. The argument of the majority prevailed, and Virginia agreed to adopt this constitution. We cited the arguments of the majority in the Massachusetts convention, which adopted the same constitution; but we never thought that the reasoning of the minority was of any authority. It is the argument of a man who has a bad cause. The same gentleman labored hard to prove that the amendment was to be an offset to that adopted some years since for discrimination in the choice of president and vice-president. But he failed—he stated that that amendment was an injury to the small states, and this was a remedy. It is true, sir, that that amendment diminished the probability of no choice by the people, in which case the states would have an equal vote in the last resort. But how does the proposed alteration help the small states? Not in the least—though the second choice is not to be in the same state, still each choice may be kept in the large states in spite of your proposed alteration. I am sure that no one but that gentleman ever thought of this reason for this alteration. The true reason is that you wish to control the voice of the majority—you find that for some cause, which I do not wish to mention, your power and influence have departed. The people are disposed to confide in men whom they judge to be friends to their country. This does not suit your schemes of power—and this amendment is to abridge their rights.

All these alterations go to impair and finally to destroy the constitution.—In the preamble to the resolution for the appointment of the delegates who have recommended this alteration, you have stated that the constitution was unfit for peace or war—and one of this Senate, in debate, stated that it wanted more energy, and that the executive should have more power.

Is this the way you are to give it energy? What with the construction you have hitherto given it, and the alterations, it will not be worth having. It would be indeed unfit for peace or war. It is then taxing our charity too much, to request us to believe that you are for improving this instrument.—Are you not rather pursuing the very course which Washington predicted? Attempting, by alterations in the name of amendments, to undermine what you dare not violently attack? In debate on the report for the appointment of your delegates, it was openly avowed that you must have redress, even by violence. The constitution was scouted as rather worm eaten. The leading paper of your party, edited by a member of this legislature, and a man who voted for your delegates, has been uniform and explicit, in declaring that there must be resistance. Look at the Crisis, for which the editor is responsible—I ask, is it scandal in us to say that the object of the opposition was a severance of the union. But violence was thought dangerous, and it was best to undermine. Hence, perhaps, these alterations are proposed at this time. I regret that I cannot perceive in them any thing but hostility to the constitution. The prediction of Washington is verified. Put constructions upon the instrument unfavorable to its energy, adopt the alterations which you here propose, and your government is the foot-ball of every faction, and its destruction is certain.

The want of these alterations has produced the war! This fatal, disastrous, disgraceful war. Sir, I hope the time will never come when the American people will look upon war as the worst of evils. This war has not been disastrous nor disgraceful.—It is an additional slander upon the brave men whom you refuse to honor to thank for glorious deeds, to say that the war is disgraceful. We are told that Mr. Madison recommended this war to save his popularity—What a discovery! We had been at peace for thirty years—our habits, our interests and our inclinations, endeared us to peace. We had no soldiers or officers, and few ships.—A war with Britain was a war with her friends in America. With all these facts before him, Mr. Madison recommended war, for purposes of popularity! With all your wisdom you have never found out that he was an idiot.

I remember that in his arrangement with Mr. Erskine, you thought he was too cunning. This crafty and designing Madison, most unfairly circumvented this honest, unsuspecting minister of his majesty. And if this is the man, how can you suppose him so stupid as to recommend a war to promote his election? But several gentlemen have told us a story—that Mr. Clay and others, a committee, waited on Mr. Madison and threatened him, that unless he recommended this war, he should not be re-elected! There is much of the marvellous in this! The fact has been preemptorily denied at this board, and gentlemen have been challenged to produce the proofs. How have they succeeded? As they do in almost every thing. Some newspapers so stated, and it was not, as they knew of, contradicted, and Mr. Pickering asked Mr. Clay, while in the chair, if it were not true, and he returned no answer. And because Mr. Clay treated this insolent enquiry with silence and contempt, gentlemen infer that the fact is proved!

There are already sufficient checks in this constitution to prevent any war against the wishes or interest of the people. The American people do not delight in blood. War is abhorrent to their feelings and not very consonant to the nature of their government. They will endure insult and oppression until they are no longer tolerable, before they will engage in a war.

There are better causes for the war than the defect in the constitution. The opposition in this country were the authors of this war. You told G. Britain that the United States could not be “kicked into a war.” In this way you encouraged her aggressions. So long as her insults and oppressions would be borne, so long they would be continued. But Britain has been once more deceived by her pretended friends in this country. She has been made the dupe of their schemes of ambition.—Nor is the continuance of this war less the effect of your opposition. Is it surprising that Britain should take encouragement from this most unjustifiable opposition? The enemy takes quiet possession of a large extent of your territory. Instead of expelling him, you appoint a convention to divide the states, unless New-England shall be permitted to rule them. You pretended to raise ten thousand troops, but instead of this the Hartford convention met, exploded, recommended to fritter away the constitution, and a mission is sent to Washington on a very extraordinary, and I had almost said, foolish errand, to obtain, forsooth, the United States taxes to be paid into the state treasury! And if Massachusetts can get this money, why then we are to see astonishing military achievements. This is the way you prolong the war. If G. Britain has not lost all confidence in this scolding, professing, threatening party, our conduct will unquestionably prostrate the war. We have made the war disastrous—Boasting Massachusetts—how does she stand in the eyes of the world in this contest? Every act of ours tends to embarrass the government and encourage the enemy. We will not rejoice at victories, nor thank even the defenders of our soil. We insult our conquerors by sea and land, by declaring the war disastrous and disgraceful.

Sir, I would never restrain our representatives of the people from making war. I am far from believing that a perpetual peace with Great Britain ought to be expected or wished. Thirty years peace had well nigh prostrated the liberties of this country.—We were trammelled and handcuffed by British influence. We were sleeping under the fatal operation of this influence. And but for this war, we should not, perhaps, until too late, have discovered the extent of this influence.

I believe, sir, there is a natural enmity between this country and Great Britain. Britain is jealous of our increasing commerce and naval glory—she will never forgive us our independence. This war will give us a navy, and a navy may be the cause of future wars.

The war has been of vast benefit. It has taught Great Britain to remember and respect our strength. It has taught us to respect ourselves, and to feel a confidence in our own power and resources. It has strengthened and perfected our independence by improving our agricultural and manufacturing interests.

The glories we have acquired in this war will command the honor and astonishment of Europe. On the ocean we have humbled British pride. The victories of Erie, Plattsburgh, Niagara, and New-Orleans, rival all the glories of the revolution. I wish, in God, Massachusetts, as a state, could participate in these most brilliant achievements. But look at Penobscot, Massachusetts, how art thou fallen!

Sir, you must come in and help in this contest. The honor of Massachusetts must be redeemed.—This war has been disgraceful only to this state. If we regarded the United States as our country; if we would avoid the scorn and contempt of the world; if we are the sons of patriots who sacrificed their lives on the altar of their country; let us abandon this strange opposition policy, expel the invader from our soil, and participate in the glory of our triumphs over the most powerful nation in the world.

Mr. Hanson's Speech,

Upon his motion to strike out the first section of the Bank bill, in the House of Representatives, U. S. November 29th.

MR. HANSON said, he was not less alive to the critical and awful condition of the country, than the secretary of the treasury, whose letter had just been read by the clerk. The picture he had painted of our financial affairs was not more frightful than the reality. In some features it fell short of the original. Not only had government bills been dishonored, and the interest of the public debt remained unpaid, as stated by the secretary of the treasury, but facts were within the knowledge of Mr. H. still more disreputable and degrading to the administration. So completely empty was the treasury, and destitute of credit, that funds could not be obtained to defray the current ordinary expenses of the different departments. Disgraceful, humiliating as the fact was, it ought not to be concealed from the nation, and he felt it his duty to state to the house, that the department of state was so bare of money, as to be unable to pay even its stationary bill. The government was subsisting upon the drainings of unchartered banks in the district, who felt themselves compelled to contribute their means, lest the rod in terror, which was held over them, should be applied, and an act of incorporation refused. Yes, it was well known to the citizens of the district, that the treasury was obliged to borrow pitiful sums, which it would disgrace a merchant in tolerable credit, to ask for.

Mr. H. mentioned the instance of an acceptance of $3500, which the war department was unable to pay, and persuaded a bank in Georgetown to pay for them. He mentioned several acceptances which he himself had seen for large amounts, which had been protested by the public notary. The paymaster was unable to meet demands for paltry amounts, not even for thirty dollars, which was a well established fact. He spoke also of the failure to meet the public engagements at New-York and Philadelphia. He said he was apprised several days in advance of the explosion, which happened in the latter place, and had attempted to take the floor several days past to prepare the house for the event, but he had not been so fortunate as to catch the speaker's eye. In short, it was difficult to conceive a situation more critical and perilous, than that of the government at this moment, without money, without credit, and destitute of the means of defending the country.

Under such circumstances, I agree, said Mr. H. with the secretary of the treasury, that not a moment should be lost in exerting the constitutional power of congress to its utmost energy, to check or turn aside this evil current of events, which threaten to overwhelm the nation. Not a moment was to be lost in preventing, if possible, further mischief, and in repairing what was already done. But if an opinion was to be formed of the future, from the past proceedings of the house, there was little ground to hope. Congress was in the third month of its session—it had been convened under circumstances appealing to whatever of spirit and patriotism there was in the country, addressing themselves with peculiar force to the authors of our calamities, the party in power. What had been done towards discharging the interesting and sacred trust reposed in the representatives of the people—the guardian of the national honor and safety? The house was dually involved in useless wrangling debates, which, from all appearance were likely to result in nothing but words, and abortive attempts at action.—While the doctors are disputing, (said Mr. H.) about the medicines to be administered, the patient is rapidly approaching to its last breath. It cannot be said of me, sir, that I have thrown obstructions in the way of the ruling party. So far from it, I have abstained purposely from taking part in many interesting debates, in the hope that action would be substituted to words, and from an unwillingness to consume time; every moment of which I deemed precious to the country.

Such is my ardent desire to economise time, as far as it is consistent with intelligent legislation, that I would not now claim the attention of the house, but that my patience is exhausted. I have waited and waited in vain, to see this pernicious measure consigned to the fate which evidently awaits it, and to see some other feasible plan, which the discretion and good sense of the house can sanction, introduced in its place. I can remain silent no longer; its palpable deformity, its utter inadequacy to the ends proposed, and its destructive tendency seem to be apparent to a large majority of the house, who are impatient to dispatch it. A scheme so absurd and visionary, could have been looked for from no other quarter than that which produced it, and I am glad to see that gentlemen on the other side of the house have at last collected the courage and manifested their determination to pursue what they call an Ignis Fatuus (Mr. Calhoun) no further. An Ignis Fatuus, truly, sir, and which, like other jack-o'-lanterns, engendered in the fens of party, will play about the surface of those stagnant pools until it sinks, and is extinguished. It was this same bold and false prophet, who led us into Canada, to conquer free trade and sailors' rights, and such is the sanguine nature of the late chairman of the committee of foreign relations, that I have not a doubt, even now, he would contract, if he could find security for the forfeiture, to capture, in six weeks more or less, the whole British army, and deliver them, bound hand and foot at the capitol.

The Speaker called to order, conceiving the remarks to be personal.

Mr. H. said, that hitherto he had with pleasure, paid the most scrupulous regard to the judgment of the chair, and bowed cheerfully to its decisions, but on this occasion he must be allowed to suggest that the latitude usually indulged in such discussions was favorable to the course now taken in debate.—Besides, the honourable speaker would recollect, upon this very question, the liberality contended for had been enjoyed by the other side of the house in a degree and mode not now proposed to be transcended.

The Speaker said his anxiety to exclude every thing like personality from debate, and a conviction that the rule of the house supported his opinion, were sufficient reasons for his adhering to his decision. And it was due to the gentleman from Maryland to say, that he had always paid that respect to the chair, which was so necessary in supporting its dignity, and that of the house.

Mr. H. acquiesced. He knew of nothing more visionary than the idea of the gentleman from South Carolina, that in the present depreciated state of the public credit, and finances, the enormous sum of forty-four millions of treasury notes could be put in circulation. A scheme of a paper medium so stupendous at a time so critical, destroyed every hope of extricating the country. If sanctioned by the house, so far from relieving the nation, it would plunge it into still deeper difficulties.—He looked with horror and dismay at the project, and was most of all astonished that the house treated it with the respect of entertaining it one day in debate.

Sir, (said Mr. H.) my opposition to this gigantic, rickety, deformed project, cannot be ascribed to a sinister design to embarrass the government, and prevent the relief necessary speedily to be afforded to its finances.—I know, sir, the country cannot be defended, it will be out of the power of the government to save it, if they are so disposed, unless the treasury is relieved. My opposition to the bill proceeds from my extreme anxiety, to place it in the power of those who direct the government, to defend and save the country. I will permit no man in this nation to take precedence of me, in straining every nerve, and stretching the constitution to the utmost limit of liberal interpretation to impart the power requisite to defend the country, and maintain its rights of sovereignty and soil; but I will embark in no rash and desperate measures, which will put every thing at hazard, and entail unnumbered woes upon posterity. "Desperate situations" produce desperate councils and desperate measures. But it is in such times that men of virtue, reflection and wisdom are especially called on to look with dispassionate calmness on the state of affairs, and to oppose with firmness all expedients which are calculated to increase, instead of diminishing the evils to be remedied. At a period like the present, when "men are as much blinded by the extremes of misery," as in times past, they have been intoxicated with the extreme of prosperity, the corrective of sober judgment and wholesome enquiry, is more necessary to prevent irremediable mischief than to guard against probable reverses. It has been said, that "great distress never has hitherto taught, and whilst the world lasts, never will teach lessons of wisdom to mankind." But if wisdom in our councils cannot be assured by past calamities, we may at least avoid a pitfall which is visible to the dullest vision.

I say again, and again, sir, my undisguised, avowed object is to defend the country, and if it be not too late, under providence, to preserve it by prompt and wise, and vigorous constitutional measures.—Nec gentium quies sine armis nec arma sine stipendiis, nec stipendia sine tributis. I am not ignorant that the first and indispensable step towards defending the country, is the recovery of public credit, and the disembarrassment of the finances. But I do fear without a united effort in this house, and throughout this nation, to restore confidence in the treasury, every attempt to reinstate the finances, will prove abortive. I entertain the opinion, formed after much reflection, and a free interchange of sentiment with enlightened men, that unless a general and generous effort is made by all parties, to revive the expiring credit of the treasury, it will continue to languish, daily to depreciate, until I would say the credit of Jacob Barker himself, (if it were not attaching more importance to him, than he merits) will be high, compared with that of the government in the money market. Under this strong conviction, and knowing as every man in the nation must know, that the country cannot be defended without the ways and means, and as far as depends on me, being resolved at every cost, hazard and extremity, consistently with civil liberty, and the constitution, to preserve unimpaired the rights and honour of the nation, I therefore shall co-operate in all measures to defend the country. This can only be done by reproducing and bracing the main sinew of war, money, public credit; without which the nation will be delivered up, bound hand and foot, to the enemy, unless rescued by the energy of the respective state sovereignties. When things come to the worst, that the states can and will defend themselves, I have no doubt, but my object is to defend the country under the constitution, and to prevent a dissolution of the union, which is inevitable if the means are not provided of enabling the general government to defend the states.

If the means are supplied, and they are still misapplied and wasted in fruitless attempts at conquest, the states must of necessity take their defence into their own hands. But the condition of the country is so critical, I see no choice but to take the chance of a correct application of means to be placed at the disposal of the government. The charge never shall be brought against me, that I folded my arms, and looked on an indifferent spectator, while the country was sinking. The men in power shall never be able to throw upon me any portion of the blame of not extricating the country from the difficulties into which their incompetency and folly have plunged it. It will be demanded of them to return the government pure and undefiled, as they received it. Degrading terms of peace I will never agree to, and if our rights and honour are to be sacrificed, they shall never have it to say they were sacrificed, because I, as one of the minority, withheld, from them the means of preserving them. No; they shall have the means, as far as I can give them, I will bear my portion of the odium of their measures for defence, where they do not trench upon the constitution. When they do so trench, when their measures go to prostrate civil liberty, and overthrow the constitution, I will resist them, and recommend resistance to the people. I will draw the sword to put down and punish usurpation and tyranny at home, with the same alacrity, that I would run to the water's edge to repel the invading foe. I now fear nothing from usurpation, because we are now free and able to resist it successfully. The attempt will prove that both the physical and numerical strength of the country lies where it ought to lie, because it will never be exerted, except in defence of the country, and the liberties of the people. Subjugation by a foreign power can hardly be deemed an evil, compared with domestic despotism and slavery. The foreign yoke may be broken and thrown off, but the chains riveted upon a people by their own tyrants, are difficult to be loosened and destroyed. It will be unavailing, and worse than unavailing, to put the country in a posture to meet the enemy without, if a more dangerous enemy within, is permitted quietly and at his leisure, to reduce this people to a state of ignominious bondage.

In coming to the determination to grant the supplies asked for to defend the country, I maintain I am neither inconsistent with myself, faithless to my friends, nor false to the country. The highest of all temporal obligations, according to my moral sense, and the soundest policy, according to my judgment, approve the course I have marked out for myself. The reason is obvious why I shall abstain from a particular discussion of the points of difference, between me and some of my political friends. Either being wrong, I know it is for me to wait the award of an enlightened and virtuous community, having no other palliation to offer, than that if I have erred, it is my firm conviction I have erred on the side of the best interests of my country. We no doubt aim at the same goal, but chuse different routes to arrive at it. I am perfectly sure, that we all prefer our country to ourselves, its good to our own gratification. That my political friends, in common with me, have a single eye to the safety and lasting happiness of the nation, cannot be doubted. We are alike anxious and resolved, if possible, though we may differ in some respects about the means, to save the country. When I say country, I do, of course, not mean those fell destroyers of its rights, peace, safety and honour, whose misdeeds have brought upon the people the sufferings under which they smart, the burdens which force from them the deep groans which are heard through the land. No man feels a more thorough sovereign contempt for the wicked authors of our afflictions, than I do; and if it is said in contributing to the relief and salvation of the country, I incidentally relieve them, I justify, by replying, even such men must be relieved in preference to certain national bankruptcy, and the overthrow of the freest form of government known on the globe. Let the tempest beaten vessel of state be first brought into port, I will then join gentlemen in throwing the treacherous pilot overboard. Now is not the time to put all at hazard, by rash and untried acts of violence. The ship is sinking, I will give a hand to the pump. The temple is in flames, I will hand a bucket.

Such is the perilous situation of the country, visible to every eye, and plain to every understanding, that unless a combined effort is made, to rescue us from the dangers which are seen on all sides, I do fear our case is desperate, our ruin irretrievable, that we are lost irrecoverable. But, sir, while there is yet life, there is still hope. I will not, must not, dare not, abandon the country. If deserted by its true friends now, it will sink so low, that it cannot, hereafter, under the guidance of other councils, be re-elevated to that pinnacle of honour, dignity and glory from which it has dashed by heartless and corrupt men, in their despicable contests for personable aggrandizement. If the country, two years hence, is to be governed by wiser and abler men, I see no reason to conceal the opinion, that the sooner a good and sufficient system of revenue, and a well regulated Bank are organized, the better. They will be necessary instruments for those who may succeed the authors of the burdens, which must constitute the basis of a system imparting efficiency and ability, to the national finances. If we can save the vessel of state from being wholly wrecked, the easier it will be to repair and rig her out again.—But most certain, it is, if our affairs are suffered to go on in their present downward course, a few months hence I might point to the naked crumbling columns of your capitol, as a type or symbol of the government.

Let then a united effort be made to save the country. But, at the same time, be it understood, that we are not to withdraw our opposition to those unconstitutional measures, and that pernicious policy of government, which are adopted with no other view, than that the party in power may be the more firmly seated in power, and the better enabled to persevere in their mischievous career. This we cannot do, without abandoning our most sacred duties, without a base dereliction of those well tried principles, which have stood every test and passed through every ordeal, for a long series of years. No, sir, we cannot be expected to add fuel to the flame, by which we ourselves are consumed; to feed the fever which is raging in our veins; to become the architects of our own ruin; to assist in forging chains for posterity, if not for ourselves.

I confess, sir, I have the less difficulty in voting supplies, and uniting to recover public credit, since the disclosures made to the house by the President, in relation to the discussions at Ghent. Anterior to that communication, the resolution had been formed, as far as I might be supposed to be entitled to political consideration, to join in measures for defence. Although I believed the war was unjust and wicked in its origin, yet a state of things had arisen out of the revolution in Europe, the threats of devastation by the enemy, and his increased ability to execute his menaces, which rendered it necessary to unite in objects of defence, and to strengthen the arm of government for that purpose. Although declared, the war is not now continued from motives and designs foreign to this people. On the contrary, the administration has humbled itself to a degree exciting commiseration, to obtain peace.—Without violating the injunction of secrecy, which locks up from the eye of the people, the most interesting part of the despatches, I will advert merely to such parts as are public. I say then I have the less difficulty in voting supplies, because the administration has changed its ground since the revolution in Europe, and come over to my opinion and views of the fair terms of peace. As the continent now stands, the question of blockade no longer presents difficulties. That of impressment, ay of IMPRESSMENT, is abandoned by the very authors themselves of the calabistic words "FREE TRADE AND SAILORS' RIGHTS." The Napoleon notion of floating colonies is also discarded, since its author has himself been consigned to a state of colonial dependence, being struck from the list of continental potentates, though he preserves all the forms of loyalty in his little kingdom, not so large as the possessions of some of our southern dons, with their thousands of acres and battalions of blacks.

The question of "free ships, free goods" is also put at rest. The right of visit and search is impliedly conceded, and the flag is not to cover the crew. It is not three months, sir, since I myself saw "Free Trade and Sailors' Rights" floating in proud defiance on your flag on the battery at the white house. The mystic words were written on the star spangled banner, which our naval heroes carried into the very British Channel, where it waved in triumph. But, alas! your Hulls, Decatur, Perries and McDonoughs, now know, that the President is content to wave the question of sailors' rights, and to give the go-by to that of "the flags covering the crew." They now know, from what sources, and what motives proceeded all their delusive, senseless uproar about sailors' rights, by the very men who have struggled in times past, to degrade our navy, and in their own words, "would have gone further to see it consumed by fire than to extinguish the flames." Yes, sir, these heroes may now ask for what have we fought glorious battles, achieved brilliant victories, spilt our blood, plucked the brightest gem from the British diadem, when cowardice "has torn down the flag which valor had nailed to the mast."

I may be complained of, sir, for these digressions, but if we are to trace our difficulties to their source, we must mount higher than to this or that particular error and act of folly, which has characterized the vicious system of politics, so long persevered in to the disgrace and ruin of the country. The root of the evil is not this or that blunder, that or the other piece of deception, and mischief, but it is the political system of administration, not only in relation to the finances, but to the general policy of the government. It has been tried, fatally tested, and has led and can lead to nothing but disappointment, suffering and disgrace. Let it then be abandoned, at once and forever, or all efforts to preserve the country will have but a temporary effect, and be productive only of increased difficulties hereafter.

Mr. Speaker, it once was the pride and happiness of the country, (and I bring back the recollections of gentlemen to the period with bitter feelings of regret,) to flourish under the benign influence of a political system, which experience proved to be conducive to our fame and welfare. Preferring the people's good, to the people's favour, the party now in the minority introduced and faithfully adhered to, that system which raised the nation to a state of unexampled prosperity and happiness. Its results are now matter of history. Unfortunately for the country, it was misunderstood, systematically misrepresented and described by the demagogues of the day, and finally rejected by a majority of the people.—Yes, sir, a false and erroneous understanding of it was imposed upon the minds of the deluded people, and it was discarded because they knew not its value. Even after we were denied by the people, it continued our chief care, the principle object of our ambition, the sole motive to exertion to preserve to the country, what had been already gained. We betrayed no unwillingness, that our successors should reap the glory and benefit of our institutions, provided only, they were preserved to the country.—When at last the infuriate passion of party, and the unrelenting spirit of persecution, succeeded in overthrowing and sweeping away most of those institutions, we should still have been content, if the great objects for which they were designed, the peace, honour, and safety of the country, could have been preserved. They have all been destroyed and covered up in the same grave. Gentlemen now feel and acknowledge the loss of one of those noble institutions, the National Bank, and they would recal it, to relieve them from difficulties which cause distress and dismay throughout the land. That cannot be. It is too late. The dead cannot be restored to life. To use the language of the gentleman from S. C. Mr. Calhoun, they who legislate upon party principles, must expect their measures to react upon themselves. Did it not involve the dearest interests and safety of the country, I should rejoice that retribution has at last overtaken the men who have inflicted such deep injuries upon us. Suffer, greatly suffer they must, but the country, we suffer with them, the innocent and guilty alike, except the consolation which a good conscience never fails to administer.

Mr. Speaker, when I reflect on what our country once was, and might still have been, and what it now is; when I think of the blessings thrown away, and the miseries endured, my indignation against the cool, remorseless, perverse plotter of our afflictions and perils, is ready to burst forth on this floor in disorderly exclamations! my heart almost overflows with mingled grief and indignation.—Daily do I expect the happening of some great event, the coming of some awful public calamity to be decisive of our fate. A war of wide spread cruel desolation threatened by a powerful and exasperated foe—the union shaking to its very centre and tottering to a fall—with a government bankrupt in fortune and in fame, and yet where are we, what doing, what have we done? Where are we? Look around! seated on a barren heath amidst ruins! surrounded by the loathsome objects of our dishonor. Indebted to the Vandals for the roof that covers us. The government itself paralysed, chained down as it were by the drowsiness that precedes death. And yet gentlemen seem perfectly at their ease, tranquil as the undisturbed moon beams that play upon the gently waving billows. They repose in the delusive idea, that there is no danger. The sentinel upon the watch tower has told them all's well. When the midnight robber has sallied forth from his covert, and prowls about the street for his prey, when the incendiary has clapt his torch and the city is wrapt in flames, the perfidious watchman "twixt sleep and wake," cries from his box, all's well!

Sir, at this moment, the cold icy hand of death is on this people. The agony cannot be of long continuance. The crisis must soon be over; and if we are doomed to fall as a punishment of our sins as a nation, the day will have come when the blindest party zealot will acknowledge, that but one man stood between his country and its salvation. God knows, sir, no one more devoutly and fervently wishes than I do, that he may be inspired with the wisdom, virtue and energy to save this nation. But all is dark and cheerless; I see no lambent ray of hope gilding the dreary prospect before us. The hand-writing on the wall points to our fixed destiny. It is written in characters so glaring, and so legible, that he who runs may read!—When, says the greatest moral philosopher of any age, did distress ever oblige a prince to abdicate his authority? This bars up every avenue of escape.

Here, perhaps, I ought to stop; but I will not leave the country in so forlorn and desperate a condition. No, sir, I will address myself, especially to this body, holding as it does now with the other branch, the destinies of the nation in its hands. Let them act with promptitude and vigor; and in the language of the secretary of the treasury, resolve not to delay another moment in every constitutional effort to save the country. If they attempt to violate the constitution, they must sprinkle it with blood, with my blood, for I will not outlive the liberties of my country.—Under the constitution, the country can be saved, or let it fall. Consign this bill at once to the fate it merits. Adopt at once measures to revive public credit, to unite the people and fill the armies. My voice and my arm is with you in every just and constitutional measure for the defence of the country. Energy, wisdom and virtue will yet save the republic. If we have them not, if we cannot bring ourselves, regardless of consideration of popularity, to discharge our sacred trust like men, like patriots, let us take the advice of the honorable member from N. York, Mr. Fisk; leave our seats, render back our powers to the people.

Mr. Gore's Remarks,

In the Senate of the United States, on the third reading of the bill laying a Direct Tax, and to provide revenue for maintaining the public credit, &c. &c. (January 1815.)

This bill imposes burthens extremely heavy on all the citizens of our common country, and on those with which I am most acquainted, a load that under existing circumstances, will be intolerable.

With the principle of the bill, in selecting as objects of taxation, the lands and buildings of the United States, I have no fault to find.

I consider them as fit and proper subjects of revenue, and such assessments calculated to equalize the burthens of the country, as imposing them on all parts, and with more impartiality than can be attained by any other mode.

And, sir, I should feel it my duty to vote for a bill, imposing such a tax, to any reasonable amount, had it not pleased the government of the nation to place the State, which I have the honour to represent, out of the protection of the United States and to determine, that while it shall bear a full proportion of the taxes, none of their fruits shall redound to her relief.

The motives of congress, in granting supplies, are doubtless to provide for the defence of the country and the security of its rights, by a safe and honourable peace.

These motives are wise and irresistible. All concur in the necessity of defending our territory against the enemy; and in the assertion and maintenance of our essential rights, at every peril, and if necessary, by the sacrifice of all that conduces to private ease and personal enjoyment.

No one feels this truth more sensibly than myself—no one considers the duty more imperative; with its obligations I have no compromises to make, and in its performance I ask for no limitations, on account of the folly and improvidence with which the war was waged, nor of the degrading imbecility and prodigal waste of treasure, of blood and character, by which it has been prosecuted.

The enemy publicly proclaims his purpose, to spread desolation, far and wide, on our unprotected sea-coast. He proceeds to execute his threats with a barbarity and baseness, in many instances unprecedented.

The mansions of the rich, the palaces of the nation, and the cottages of its poorest citizens, feel alike his disgraceful vengeance. The opulence of the wealthy is destroyed; the means of subsistence, to the impoverished inhabitants of the sands are redeemed from his rapacity by grinding impositions which the charity of such as being out of the reach of his power, are alone able to supply. Even the ashes of the dead are not suffered to repose in quiet. And, as the last act of atrocity, your slaves are seized and seduced, embodied in military array, and led to the destruction of their masters and the plunder of their possessions.

Whether those acts seek an apology in the conduct of our own government, we cannot enquire for the purpose of weighing our duty to repel his attack.—Whoever comes to our shores, in the character of an enemy, must be resisted. We must do all in our power to defend ourselves and our soil from an invading foe.

A question arises—have we any grounds for believing that the grants of men and money, will be wisely applied to the purposes of defence and protection?

Honourable gentlemen will please to go back to Nov, 1811, when the executive, in winding its devious course to the fatal act of June, 1812, addressed the hopes, the fears, the vanity and pride of the people, and avowing its duty to establish the general security, assured the nation "that the works of defence on our maritime frontier, had been prosecuted with an activity, leaving little to be added for the completion of the most important ones." The land forces so disposed as to insure appropriate and important services, and embodied and marched toward the north western frontiers, to seek satisfaction for acts, which it was declared, had alike "the character and effect of war."

The subsequent course of things must be full in the mind of every one, and the result known and felt by all.

We learn that the same measures are to be pursued. The Atlantic coast is to be defended as heretofore, by attempts on Canada. This is frankly and formally told to the Congress, that no pretence can be urged, in future, of disappointment or deception.

I forbear to speak on this subject. In the actual state of things, all reasoning must be futile. The powers of language cease before the eloquent monitors, constantly in our view.

We are doomed to remain in this scene, that we may not, for a moment, lose sight of our degradation and disgrace.

The government had complete informations of the designs of the enemy, months before his attack on Washington. In this city, were all the means of defence, fortresses, ships, cannon, men and money.—Here, too, was concentrated all the wisdom of the administration, to deliberate, examine, decide and prepare for the support of the capital, at least sixty days prior to its destruction, by a few thousand worn down and exhausted soldiers. You have now in full view, the effect of their combined councils, of their individual and united talents, prudence and energies.

These monuments show, in characters not to be mistaken, the future in the past and in the desolation around. They declare the fate of every place, under the influence and protection of our government if approached by the enemy.

Congress continues to grant, with no sparing hand, supplies of every kind to the same men, in the hope, it is imagined, that heaven may, by some miracle, interpose for their application, to the safety and relief of the country.

Permit me, sir, to crave your indulgence and that of the honourable senate, while I relate the condition of the country, which I represent, as the grounds of the vote I am constrained to give on this occasion.

The state of Massachusetts has a sea-coast of about six hundred miles in extent. Its eastern boundary joins that of the enemy. It is, of course, peculiarly liable to invasion. The president of the United States was avowedly of the opinion, that it would be invaded, immediately on the commencement of the war. There were several islands, and one of great importance, on the eastern frontier, the title to which was not definitively acknowledged by Great Britain. The claim of Massachusetts had been allowed, by this power, in a treaty made according to the instructions of the president, which treaty the United States had chosen to reject. The government, therefore, superadded to the general obligation, enjoined upon it, to protect and defend the territory of all the states, had incurred a peculiar responsibility to guard this particular frontier from falling into the hands of the enemy.

This state has been left entirely unprotected and defenceless, and has at no time had within it, and destined to its defence, sufficient force of the United States to protect any one point against a common and ordinary hostile attack.

Shortly after the adoption of the constitution, she ceded to the United States all the fortresses in her possession. These, with all the prominent points of land and cities, appropriate for fortifications to defend the state against invasion, were, and for a long time previous to the war, had been, in the exclusive possession of the United States. The state, therefore, had no authority or jurisdiction over, nor even to enter them, for any purposes much less to assume the defence of their territory, through these means.

One great and principal object of the constitution, was to provide by this government for the common defence, and, by the power and resources of all the states, to protect each against invasion.

The preamble declares:

"We, the people of the United States, in order to form a more perfect union, establish justice, ensure domestic tranquillity, provide for the common defence, promote the general welfare, and the blessings of liberty to ourselves and posterity do ordain and establish this constitution." For this end the states surrendered the principal resources of revenue, over which they, previously, had uncontrolled dominion.

"The Congress shall have power, to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts and excises to pay the debts and provide for the common defence," "to borrow money on the credit of the United States."

Here are ample resources and means commensurate to the duties the United States were enjoined, and undertook to perform.

This cannot be denied by the men now in power: for they abolished many taxes, in full productive operation, at the time they received the government.

Power was also granted to raise and support every kind of force, necessary to ensure the common defence, and to protect the states against invasion, viz.:

"To raise and support armies"

"To provide and maintain a navy."

"To exercise exclusive legislation over all places purchased by the consent of the legislatures of the states in which the same shall be, for the erection of forts magazines, arsenals, dock yards and other needful buildings."

The several states having surrendered their resources, and afforded such ample provision for the common defence, left no doubt of the paramount duty in the United States, to perform it punctually and faithfully.

In the present war, they are without excuse, if this be not fully and perfectly done; for the war was of their own choice: they made it, and at their own time.

The several states received from the United States a solemn obligation, that they would protect each against invasion.

"The United States guarantee to every state a republican form of government, and shall protect each of them against invasion."

If any thing were wanting to show the sacredness of this duty in the United States, and the absolute reliance which the states entertained of its complete performance, it is to be found in the restrictions and privations, which the several states imposed on themselves.

"No state shall grant letters of marque and reprisal. No state shall, without the consent of congress, lay any imposts, or duties on imports, or exports," except &c.

"No state shall, without the consent of congress, lay any duty on tonnage, keep troops or ships of war, in time of peace, enter into any agreement or compact with another state, or with a foreign power, or engage in a war, unless actually invaded, or in such imminent danger, as will not admit of delay."

Having thus surrendered all the pecuniary resources necessary to provide the means of defence, and also the right to raise a force requisite to this end, the several states did rely, and were justified in relying, with perfect confidence, for complete protection and defence, on the government of the United States.

No one will pretend that such defence has been afforded all the states in the union. Massachusetts has been entirely abandoned. The men raised there for the regular army, have been marched out of the state.

Within a month after the declaration of war, the governor of that state was informed by direction of the President, that the regular troops were all ordered from the sea coast; and this threat, if intended as such, was instantly executed. Thus, the moment the United States had placed the country in a situation to require defence, and which it was their duty to provide, they wantonly took away the only force which could afford it.

It may be said, that the President called forth the militia, in June and July, 1812, for the purpose of making the defence, and protecting the state against invasion, and the governor refused to obey the requisition. On the 12th June, 1812 the President, by his secretary of war, requested governor Strong to order into the service of the United States, on the requisition of general Dearborn, such parts of the militia as the general might deem necessary for the defence of the sea coast, and on the 23d June, the same general informed the governor, that war was declared against Great Britain, and requested forty-one companies for the defence of the ports and harbours in Massachusetts, and the harbour of New-port, in Rhode-Island.

The governor of a state is obliged to comply with every requisition of the United States for militia made in pursuance of the provisions of the constitution. He is equally bound by his duty to the states, to refrain from calling them forth, for purposes not within those provisions.

The only case that authorizes a call for the militia of the several states, to act against an enemy, is to repel invasion.

The President, neither by himself, nor any of his officers, ever pretended that this case existed, at the time the requisition issued. The requisition was made expressly, for the defence of the ports and harbours of that state and of Rhode-Island.

The militia is a force which belongs to the several states respectively and exclusively, and is so recognized by the constitution of the United States. The government of the United States is a government of limited authorities, and has no other powers than what are granted by the constitution. A power to call forth the militia, to provide for the common defence, or to protect against invasion, is no where granted to the United States in express terms. All the authority over the militia delegated to the United States, is to call them forth to repel invasion, to execute the laws, and suppress insurrection. The United States is bound to provide for the common defence.

To repel invasion is included in the duty of providing for the common defence; and as invasion may be sudden, even in time of profound peace, and before the United States can bring their forces to meet an unexpected attack, the militia of the several states is granted to the United States, from the necessity of the case as the means by which they may provide for the common defence in such particular instance.

If the United States have authority to call forth the militia, for the ordinary purposes of war for the common defence; or for protection against invasion under any of the general powers granted, such as that to provide for the common defence, there would have been no necessity for the special clause, authorizing congress to provide for calling them forth, to repel invasion; for repelling invasion is undoubtedly one part of the duty of providing for the common defence.

If it were the intent of the constitution to grant to the U. States, expressly, a power over the militia for protection against invasion, it would have declared that for such purposes the U. States might call forth the militia, or it would have said, to protect against or repel invasion. And especially in the clause which enjoins on the U. States the duty of protecting each state against invasion, the constitution would have declared, and that for this purpose, the U. States shall call forth the militia. No such words, no such grants are made in this instrument. If therefore, the authority of the U. States to call forth the militia, to protect the ports and harbours of a state, be granted, it must be by the terms to repel invasion. Common defence includes all the means by which a nation may be guarded, protected, defended, and secured, against danger, both in war and in peace.

To repel invasion, is only one particular and specific act of providing for the common defence. It is contrary to common sense, as well as to all rules of logic, to say that a specific power or duty includes the general power or duty, of which it is a part; it is to say, that a part contains the whole.

To repel invasion, is to drive back and resist that which has already happened.—

To protect against invasion is to prevent its happening, to secure against its existence. The one act is against an event that has occurred—the other is to ensure and guard against the occurrence of such an event.

To protect against invasion, is to erect fortresses, to have them well manned, and supplied with all requisite stores, to provide and equip ships of war, to have an army and navy well organized and disciplined, in peace and in war. To repel invasion is one specific act of war, against another act of the like character.

To repel invasion is one part of the duty of providing for common defence, and for this part a particular force is granted. To say that a grant of this force for this special purpose, includes a grant of the same force for the purposes of protection and defence, is to say, that a grant for one purpose, is a grant for another, and for every purpose, and that the grant of a limited, is the grant of a general authority.—This would be both illegal and irrational. And if under the limitations, which were intended to control the powers granted to the government of the U. States, and especially under the express limitation, viz. "that powers not delegated to the United States, by the constitution, nor prohibited by it to the states, are reserved to the states, or to the people," such construction may be adopted, there remains no security for any right reserved to the states, or to the people.

However conclusive this reasoning may be, it is not to be presumed, that after the strides of power, in which the spirit of party has indulged, it will have any effect on those who direct the affairs of this country. I will, sir, however, refer to opinions and authorities in confirmation of what has been advanced, that to many gentlemen did not formerly admit either of exception or appeal.

These are to be found in the resolutions and arguments of the legislature of Virginia, and of Mr. Madison, one of that legislature, in the years 1798 and 1800. I refer the senate to the third resolution passed by that body, and framed by the pen of the President, in the words following:

"3d. Resolved, That this assembly doth explicitly and peremptorily declare, that it views the powers of the federal government, as resulting from the compact to which the states are parties, limited by the plain sense and intention of the instrument constituting that compact, as no further valid than they are authorized by the grant enumerated in that contract; and that in case of a deliberate, palpable and dangerous exercise of other powers, not granted by the said compact, the states who are parties thereto, have a right and are in duty bound to interpose, for arresting the progress of the evil, and for maintaining within their respective limits, the authorities, rights and liberties appertaining to them."

"It is said, that congress are by the constitution, to protect each state against invasion, and that the means of preventing are included in the power of protection against it."

"The power of war in general having been before granted by the constitution, this clause must either be a mere specification, for greater caution and certainty, of which there are other examples in the constitution, or by the injunction of a duty superadded to a grant of power. Under either explanation, it cannot enlarge the powers of congress on the subject. The power and the duty to protect each state against an invading enemy, would be the same, under the general powers, if this regard to greater caution had been omitted!"

"Invasion is an operation of war. To protect against invasion is an exercise of the power of war. A power, therefore, not incident to war, cannot be incident to a particular modification of war. And as the removal of alien friends has appeared to be no incident to a general state of war, it cannot be incident to a partial state, or to a particular modification of war."

"Nor, can it ever be granted, that a power to act on a case, when it actually occurs, includes a power over all the means that may tend to prevent the occurrence of the case. Such a latitude of construction would render unavailing every practicable definition of limited powers." See proceedings in the house of delegates of Virginia, the 7th January, 1800, on the resolutions of the general assembly of December 21, 1798.

If the observations which I have made, are founded in truth, and justified by the constitution, the following positions are established, viz.

That the United States have no right to call on the several states, for the militia, to perform any act of war, but to repel invasion.

That to defend the ports and harbors of Massachusetts and Rhode Island, the purpose for which the militia was required in 1812, is not within the power delegated by the constitution, to provide for calling forth the militia to repel invasion.

In the case alluded to in 1812, it was not declared by the President, nor even pretended by his officers, that any invasion was made. In fact, no invasion was attempted, until two years after this time. — If the United States had no authority to make the requisition, the governor would have betrayed his duty to the state, in complying with the demand.

That the United States had no such authority, I think evident from the examination that has been made of the powers delegated by the constitution. And the state of Massachusetts, instead of being a just object of censure, by the U. States, has a well founded complaint against this government, for an attempt to usurp her rights and invade her prerogatives.

A question has sometimes been suggested, whether the governor of a state has a right to judge if the requisition be within the provisions of the constitution. A little reflection on the nature of the government of the United States, and of a state, and of the relation in which the supreme executive of the latter stands to the U. States, and to the citizens of his particular state, will show that he is obliged to examine, if the case for which the requisition is made, be within the provisions of the constitution, and if the purposes for which it is declared are manifestly not within the powers delegated by that instrument, to withhold a compliance.

The government of the United States can exercise no powers not granted by the constitution, and so far as this government can support such as its claims on this charter, it is sovereign, and has no other control than its own discretion.

The government of the several states is equally sovereign, with respect to every power of an independent state, which it has not delegated by the same instrument to the U. States, or which is not thereby prohibited to the several states. It is, also, a sacred duty of the government of the several states, to preserve unimpaired every right and authority retained by the state, either in its corporate capacity, or for its individual citizens. Whether the militia, the peculiar force of the several states, and that which is to protect and defend every right and power they possess, is called forth by the United States according to the provisions which they made, in delegating to this government its powers, must of necessity be a question between two sovereign and independent governments, and on which there is no tribunal authorized to judge between them. And if the governors, who are commanders in chief of the militia of the several states, should surrender this force to the United States in a case not authorized by the constitution—they would betray the trust confided to them by the citizens of their states. They must, therefore, examine the case when called upon, and decide according to their duty, as prescribed by the constitution of the U. States, and that of their particular state, shall demand.

General Cushing, while superintendant of the military district, in which Massachusetts is situated, informed Governor Strong that he expected an order from the President of the United States, to request a detachment of militia for the defence of the sea coast, and particularly of Boston. That he had not more troops than sufficient to man one of the forts, and proposed that one should be occupied by the militia, and that while out they should be subject to the command of no officer of the United States, except the superintendant of the district. The governor acceded to the proposal.

General Dearborn shortly after superseded Gen. Cushing, and on the 8th July, by order of the president, and in confirmation of the expectation of brigadier general Cushing, requested a detachment of eleven hundred militia to occupy the forts and harbor of Boston.

Governor Strong, although under no constitutional obligation to call forth the militia for the purposes required, yet seeing the forlorn condition of the country, the vast property of the United States in the navy yard, a ship of the line nearly completed, and a frigate, all abandoned by the government to the mercy of the enemy, at the same time that these offered to him great temptations to attack and destroy the capital of the state and its environs, and feeling authorized by the resolution of the legislature of Massachusetts, detached the militia, in confidence that the agreement made with general Cushing would be fulfilled.

At the end of their term of service, these men were offered an uncurrent and depreciated paper, as their only compensation.

In the beginning of September, General Dearborn notified the governor that the enemy had taken possession of a considerable part of the state of Massachusetts, and requested a detachment of the militia for the purpose of protecting and defending such parts of that state and of New-Hampshire, as were not in the occupation of the enemy.

Such complaints and objections had arisen in executing the order of July, that the governor although he issued an order for troops, found himself obliged to place the detachment under the command of a major general of the militia.

The governor, immediately addressed a letter to the Secretary of state, requesting to know from the President, if the expenses thus necessarily incurred for the protection of the state, would be ultimately reimbursed to that state by the United States.

The answer was, that if the force thus put into service by the governor, had been required by general Dearborn, or received by him, and put under his command, the expenses attending it would be defrayed by the United States. If otherwise, in either of these particulars, the United States were not chargeable with the expense.

Here is a distinct and plain case, in which the United States had neglected that protection which they were expressly bound to afford to the state, and thereby occasioned the loss of a fifth part of its territory,* and then called upon the state itself, to protect the remaining territory. The state obeyed the call, and reserved only that right which the constitution, in express terms reserved, viz. the appointment of officers to command the militia required—and the United States say this expense must be born by the state, and that they will not reimburse the amount, because the militia is not placed under the command of an officer of the United States.†

For this act of injustice, for this neglect of duty in the United States towards the state of Massachusetts, for this abandonment of its territory to be the violence of the enemy, I have never heard the smallest apology.

I forbear to mention the rights of the state, the necessity to which this wanton abandonment by those who ought to protect them, may reduce the inhabitants.—The laws of self-preservation and of nature, confirmed by that of nations, afford the rule for any member of a confederacy thus deserted and forsaken.

I most earnestly hope, that although

* There were, at the attack and capture of Castine, twenty-eight men and a lieutenant in the fort. This was all the protection for one of the most important harbours and rivers in the United States, and affording the best situation for a naval depot for great Britain.

† In the military district No. 1, which includes New Hampshire and Massachusetts, there were less than 1,300 men. These were scattered over an extensive tract of country. In the forts in Boston harbour, there were not 260 men, and in the other forts in this state, a very small corps, inadequate to any defence.

There was, however, a major general, a brigadier general and several colonels. In no one place were there men enough to constitute a colonel's command.

cruelly deserted by the government, which contrary to their entreaties, brought them into this perilous condition, the citizens of the country may be able to defend themselves. They will do all that men can do under their circumstances. But I am confident, that if this tax be collected there and paid into the treasury of the United States, for the exclusive support and defence of others, they will be destitute of the means of making any adequate resistance I cannot, therefore, vote for this bill.

The present year the commonwealth has expended more than seven hundred thousand dollars in her own defence. She is now called on by this bill for six hundred thirty two thousand five hundred ninety two dollars to defend other parts of the territory of the United States, and her citizens more exposed than any other, are left to provide for their own defence.

They who calculate on the ability of Massachusetts to pay, from the exactness and punctuality she heretofore observed in the discharge of taxes, will recollect that her faculty to meet the demands of the treasury, even in times the most prosperous, arose principally from the daring enterprise, unrivalled industry and rigid economy of the inhabitants, that her resources are now annihilated, and she is borne down by obloquy, insult and oppression.

They who have observed the patience wherewith she has submitted to see the public treasure squandered, to purchase slanderers against her citizens, and notwithstanding a complete failure by the full confession of the hireling, that these citizens were so far beyond all temptation, as not even to be approached for dishonourable purposes, has been subjected to the most degrading insinuations, from the first authority. Who has witnessed all the resources of her wealth, all the means of her industry, the object of unabating persecution from the government, and her possessions coldly and expressly abandoned, by the same authority, to the depredations and seizure of the enemy, may conceive that taxes, like these, will still be paid for the exclusive protection of others, but if gentlemen will only condescend to view the people of this country as their brethren, as freemen, as men, they must come to the conclusion, that had they means, they could not possibly have the will.

Mr. Jefferson's Library.

A sketch of the part taken by Mr. King, of Massachusetts, in the House of Reprerepresentatives of the United States, Jan. 26, 1815, in the debate on the passage of the bill for the purchase of the Library of Thomas Jefferson, for the use of Congress.

Besides opposing the bill on the general ground of the inexpediency of appropriating so large a sum as twenty-three thousand dollars, for this object, at a time of such national embarrassment, and when we had no place of safety for a library when purchased. Mr. King observed, that it appeared from the catalogue, there were many books unnecessary, improper and useless for congress, and that on the contrary, this library was destitute of others, indispensable in the ordinary transactions of our business; with a view to remedy these inconveniences, he moved that the bill be committed to a select committee, with instructions to report a new section, as follows:

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That as soon as said library shall be received at Washington, the joint library committee be, and they are hereby authorized and directed to select therefrom, all books not useful and necessary for congress, and to cause the same to be sold, and the proceeds thereof invested in other books for the use of congress.

This motion being negatived, Mr. King observed, that it appeared from the same catalogue, and from the information of intelligent gentlemen, who had seen this library, and it might be inferred from the character of the man who selected it, and from the country (France) where he says he made the principal collection, and from the time when he made it, that there were in this library many books of an irreligious and immoral tendency, embracing many of the works of the French infidel philosophers, who had caused and inflamed the volcano of the French revolution, which in its progress, had desolated the fairest portions of Europe, and had extended its fatal—its destructive effects, to our once happy country; to prevent a general dissemination of this infidel philosophy, and of the principles of a man, who had inflicted greater and deeper injuries upon our country, than any other person, except Mr. Madison, ever did upon any country. Mr. King again moved to recommit the bill to a select committee, with instructions to report the following, as there be, of an atheistical, irreligious, and immoral tendency, and to send the same back to Mr. Jefferson, without expense to him.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That as soon as said library shall be received at Washington, the joint library committee be, and they are hereby authorized and directed to select therefrom, all books, if any

This amendment was first attacked by an honourable gentleman from Pennsylvania (Dr. Seybert) who thanked the gentleman from Massachusetts for the confidence intended by the motion to be reposed in himself and other gentlemen in the joint library committee, but as he neither felt able nor willing to undertake the selection, he would propose that the gentleman from Massachusetts should be made sole inquirer upon the occasion.

Mr. King immediately intimated to him, that he would with great pleasure undertake the business, especially as it might be a violation of the gentleman's feelings and principles to do it.

The motion was next attacked by an honourable gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. Hurlbert) who, after advocating the bill on general principles, with his usual ability and perspicuity, observed, as it respects this motion, and the reasons assigned by the mover in favour of it, that these reasons were inconsistent with the motion, as the section provided for the preservation of those books, alleged to be irreligious, by sending them back to Mr. Jefferson, whereas the motive of his colleague was to prevent the contagion which might spread from them; that if he was sincerely desirous of preventing this evil, he ought to amend the section by introducing a provision for the burning of such books. Mr. King informed the honourable speaker, that he would accept with pleasure of the modification proposed by his colleague: that indeed he had at first drawn his amendment with a provision that these books should be burnt by the library committee, but that it afterwards appeared to him, to comport better with the dignity of the house, to send them back, especially as said committee might be unwilling to perform a task usually allotted to the common hangman. That as the motion now stood, the fears of his colleague as to the ill effects of these books upon the pure minds of Mr. Jefferson and his friends, were certainly groundless, as they were happily secured therefrom by their own depravity.

An honorable gentleman from Maryland (Mr. Wright) next took the floor in opposition to Mr. King's amendment, and in defence of deistical works, observing that Mr. K. had severely censured Mr. Jefferson, as being the greatest enemy of the country, although he had been selected by Washington, as one of his principal officers. Mr. K. remarked that it was very true that Jefferson had been put into office by President Washington, but that it was equally true that he made use of all the influence which that office gave him to supplant his benefactor, in which he but too well succeeded, by the aid of Mr. Madison and his other democratic coadjutors, as the distress and ruin of our country now demonstrate. Mr. W. further asked if the gentleman wished to introduce the inquiry; but Mr. K. thought there would be no occasion for this, as long as the present majority ruled. Mr. W. remarked that some of the ancient authors had been objected to—that without these, many of the most useful inventions would have been unknown to us—and among these, the screw of Archimedes, the utility of which had been so clearly demonstrated in the application made by Mr. Evans, and he wished it more generally applied; but, Mr. K. thought it necessary to introduce it into the house, where Mr. W. found no difficulty, on party questions, of screwing his friends up to any point where he wished them to stick.

Mr. Fisk, of Vt. observed, that it was formerly the practice in Massachusetts to hang witches—and asked if Mr. K. intended to introduce the practice again—Mr. K. replied, that the gentleman himself was a native of Massachusetts, but whether or not he had run off for fear of being hung for a wizard, he would not undertake to say—but he thought there was no danger of it. Mr. K. then remarked, that as his amendment appeared to be displeasing to one of his friends, for whom he cherished the highest esteem and respect. (Mr. Hurlbert) and was likely to take up more of the time of the house than he wished, and by particular desire of another esteemed friend of his (Mr. Hanson) he would withdraw it.

The amendment was accordingly withdrawn, and the bill passed, putting into the pocket of Thomas Jefferson 23,900 dollars, for about six thousand volumes of books, good, bad and indifferent, old and new, useful and worthless, in all tongues and languages, about one quarter French, and another quarter in languages, dead and living, other than English; many which cannot be read by a single member in either house of congress, and more which never will nor ever ought to be read by a member—while the library is destitute of other books, absolutely necessary, in doing the public business. This is true Jeffersonian, Madisonian, democratic economy, which has bankrupt the treasury, beggared the people, and disgraced the nation.

Substance of Mr. Ingersoll's Speech on the Militia Bill.

Delivered in the House of Representatives of the United States, Dec. 9, 1814.

MR. CHAIRMAN—It seems to be the determination of gentlemen to debate all the military, and all the national subjects too, on the present motion. I had hoped that this discussion would have been reserved for the consideration of the resolutions I laid on the table the day before yesterday, and which it was my intention to have called up the moment the present business is disposed of. I never much liked this bill. It embraces the same principles without the powerful effects of the other plan, with a greater complication of machinery. It was originally but a weak, diluted measure, in my opinion; and a bad substitute for the direct classification and draft into the regular armies, which I hold to be the best, and indeed the only efficient system. I had resolved however, to vote for the bill, because I do not perceive that it may not serve as an accessory to the classification: and even eviscerated as it has been by the success of the motion of the gentleman from Virginia, Mr. Eppes, to reduce the term of service from two years to one, I do not yet say that I will withhold from it my support. Something must be done.

To be insensible of the extreme importance of time at this crisis, is to be insensible to the crisis itself. This is the moment for action, not declamation; and gentlemen on both sides may rest assured that their controversies are like a sea fight; surrounded by a mass of destructive element, infinitely more to be apprehended than their own ability to injure each other—an element of destruction, which, if neglected or provoked, will swallow up both the contending parties together, while they are vainly striving which shall overthrow the other. To change the illustration—we are in conflict, sir, as it were, in a vast place of interment, where eternity yawns upon us from ten thousand mouths, and where, which ever party brings his antagonist to the earth, can achieve no more enviable victory than that of being buried altogether in the same unhonored grave. Gentlemen seem to think, sir, that their constituents sent them here with no other purpose than to pull down one administration and supplant it with another. They tell us with one breath that the present administration was forced into this war, and with the next breath they make administration answerable for all its fortunes. They denounce that administration as the most imbecile, indigent and despicable in the world; and yet, with all the wealth and all the talents, they have in vain withheld their wealth, in vain exercised their talents, to thrust this miserable obstacle from their course. They possess exclusively all the physical resources and all the patriotic attachments of the soil of the country—the bone, marrow, sinews and vitals of the state; and they come here to reproach administration for not having prevented or defeated a sudden inroad upon the capital, while a portion of their own territory has been for six months in the undisputed occupation of the enemy—subdued without resistance, and held without an effort to regain it. We can all recollect, Mr. Chairman, how the gentleman from New-Hampshire, Mr. Webster, in particular, demonstrated to us about this time last year, that our war was unpopular and unjust; how he entertained us with distinctions between war offensive and war defensive, between the mercenary spirit of extra territorial conquest and aggrandizement on the one hand, and the generous ardor of repelling invasion on the other; how he proved our inability to conquer Canada, without the cordial co-operation of New-England; and how speedily Canada would be overrun and subdued, if his immediate fellow-citizens could be enlisted into the cause, instead of the armies—and yet now that the war has become offensive to them—now that it has pushed itself into their plantations—now that the conqueror rings the knell of a curfew every evening over their own fire-sides—not a note of preparation or resistance do we hear from their mountains or their sea-board—nor any other note than that of rejoicing in the happy exchange they have made of war without trade for trade without war. Nay, sir, they are more robust than ever in opposition to the war, now that nothing is left in dispute but a canton of their own soil; and they venture to threaten us with disunion for presuming to enact a militia law, when the enemy offers us peace we can accede to at any moment, and leave that section which shakes the rod of dismemberment over our heads, to fight out the battle with Great Britain.

Sir, I do not belong to that slave-holding portion of these states to which such frequent and such angry allusions are made from another quarter, and for particular reasons I look with a degree of reverence and strong regard toward the east. I listen too with pleasure generally to whatever falls from the gentleman from New-Hampshire (Mr. Webster) because, however I may disapprove the doctrine, it is for the most part supported by argument, as to-day it was by eloquence. But it was, if I may so express it, with a very painful pleasure that I attended to his pathetic threats this morning. A dissolution of this confederacy is a national misfortune upon which I never think without great pain. The political school in which I have made my inconsiderable acquisitions, abhors and deprecates so desperate a resort. I know of but one evil more to be dreaded. But there is one, and of that one I inform the gentleman from N. Hampshire. It is the deterring those states who hold a legitimate ascendancy in the government from any measure whatever, by the threat of a dismemberment as the consequence of it. Whenever this is the case the union is virtually dissolved. The substance is gone, and nothing remains but the shadow—a cold and melancholy shade of authority—without warmth, without life—contemptible to our enemies, and formidable only to ourselves. Minorities have their rights, and I should be one of the last to infringe upon them. But majorities have their duties too, and duties to be performed at every hazard. Sir, we have been but too long threatened with dissolution, but too often deterred from proper and constitutional purposes by such apprehensions. The same ground was taken in the same quarter against the embargo laws. The same threats. But there was no resistance to those very severe and unpalatable acts; and I trust there will be none to this militia bill. I do not believe that there will. But whether there will or not shall have no influence upon me. If I consider the thing just, I shall vote for it and maintain it, leaving results to themselves. Is there nothing, sir, from the Potomac to the Penobscot, but one vast sea of administration? Is there no country left to embark upon? Have we no wrongs to avenge? No rights to assert? No enemy to contend with? No home to feel for? Or do gentlemen consider their country, (to adopt a figure of Mr. Burke's) a carte blanche, on which they may scribble what they please? For my part, I rise to-day, Mr. Chairman, the advocate of no administration. I have taken the floor to assert the cause of my country against its foreign enemy; and I think the conjuncture has well nigh arrived when both administration and opposition may give way to nobler views than those of reviling and destroying each other. It is a fact at once mortifying and alarming, that England is waging hostilities, not against your union and resources, but against your divisions and prejudices. Reserving all my animosity for her, and anxious to defend our common cause, permit me cursorily to enquire whether it is really so low and so wretched as seems to be imagined. I am not disposed, I think it would be out of date at this time of day, to enquire into the wisdom of the declaration of war, which is besieged with such pertinacious and preposterous denunciation, by almost every member of this house, who rises to oppose any measure now necessary for sustaining the contest in which we are involved. But this I will say, that I have no doubt whenever the parties and passions of the moment shall be mellowed and melted down by the lapse of years and change of circumstances, that declaration will be recorded by the historian as the wisest and most fortunate act in the annals of America. I had not the honor of voting for the declaration of war—I wish I had. With a full and keen sense of all the dangers and difficulties it has brought upon us, I would vote for it now, were it again in question: Yes, sir, were we now in June 1812, and had I the faculty to pierce the veil of futurity and discover all that has happened since, I would not hesitate. The venerable patriot whose mortal remains we lately consigned to the earth (the vice-president, Mr. Gerry) with the obsequies that became his services and his station, does not bequeath to his posterity a richer inheritance of public gratitude for the vote he gave for independence, on the 4th of July 1776, than will descend upon his children, from any member of the congress, who from pure and patriotic considerations (and I can suppose none other) voted for the war on the 18th of June, 1812.

It is true that we have experienced since then a great variety of fortunes, and that we are now arrived at a conjuncture big with portentous events. But to appreciate our situation properly, we should enquire not what it is or may be, but what it would and must have been, if war had not been resorted to. What then would have been our condition? We might indeed have slumbered on through 1812 and 1813, in the protracted torpor of an ignominious peace. We might have still clung to a sorry remnant of the rags of trade. We might have remained in morbid neutrality, watching the phases of the moon in Europe. We might have witnessed those astonishing transactions there, which, crowding the business of centuries into the space of months, have overthrown the colossus of the continent, and bestrode his fallen carcase with that of the colossus of the seas. We might have hailed the ascendant star of England with a joy unmixed with apprehension, unadulterated with hostility.—We might still have amused ourselves with furious factions and the war of words. Restrictive systems and other such political polemics, would have never failed to separate us into two unrelenting parties, just as we are marked off now. As to making preparation for hostilities under such circumstances, it is absurd to talk about it. And when the spring came for our re-animation from this torpid, creeping, odious, miserable state, to what sort of vernal pleasures should we have risen up? With all the original causes of complaint existing, and aggravated, between you and England, for not one of them would have disappeared but from your demonstrations of resistance, without an officer or a soldier, a fortification or an equipment, distracted at home, despised abroad, you would have been cast upon the tender mercies and the magnanimity of Great Britain. And what has been your experience of these mercies, of that magnanimity? What claims have you beyond the Dutch, the Irish, the East-Indian or the Portuguese, to the forbearance and the fondness of your mother country? Has your revolution left no sting? Or has your subsequent prosperity inflicted no pang? Holland, annexed to England, in return for the Dutch emancipation from the yoke of France, is the volume in which you may read your own fate. I refer gentlemen to an extract from the London Gazette, lately published in our newspapers, by which it appears that not a Dutch vessel is to sail without a British license. And what right have we to be preferred to the Dutch? Instead of a question whether the Canadas should be annexed to the United States, there would have been no question as to the annexation of the United States to the Canadas. If a lady is to be found in this reprobate region, worthy to be united in marriage with one of the worthies of the illustrious house of Brunswick, we should have been wedded to our ci-devant mother, with all the blessings of the incestuous union. This, sir, is but a faint outline of the destiny of America, but for the attitude, the character and the means of self-preservation, for all of which we are indebted to this war.

It is true, to be sure, that we have been consigned, almost without a thought, from nations whose battles we are fighting, particularly that one which offered its mediation, to the bloody and ferocious visitation of those modern buccaneers, who have carried their calicoes for sale throughout the world at the point of the bayonet, plunging the bayonet into every bosom that refused to cover itself with the calico—who have wrapped the four corners of the earth in flames for a monopoly of manufactures. We could not dress but in their broad cloths. We could not eat but with their hardwares. We could not sleep but in their blankets. They had reduced us to Lord Chatham's wish. Not a hob-nail but was English. They had us effectually recolonized without bloodshed or expense. But this did not content them. They must act the farcical tragedy which France performed with Spain. America belonged to England, in effect, as much as Spain belonged to France. But the goose must be killed that laid the golden egg. To this we demurred—we resisted. After a series of endurance and procrastination, to which I never can recur without shame and sorrow, we finally resisted. If we had begun the contest with the cause of it, it would have ended long ago, and ended to our honour. But we deferred it till the eve of a fundamental revolution of things in Europe, which instead of turning European politics to our account, has left us England single handed on our hands. We have accordingly suffered all that the combination of British power and British perfidy could inflict—no inconsiderable matter, sir—for British power, for the purposes of distant maritime aggression, is the most formidable in the world; and I defy all history, ancient as well as modern, sacred and profane, for parallels with British perfidy. We have endured invasion, prosecuted avowedly in defiance of the laws of civilized warfare. After sacking our capital, the enemy, for the first time, I believe, that Christendom ever witnessed, such an act, has proclaimed his purpose to ravage and destroy beyond the precincts of humanity. We have had warriors to contend with, whose first reinforcement was from the savage of your borders—whose last appeal was to the pirate lurking on your shores.—All this we have undergone—the overcharged eruption from the volcano of British aggression. But we survive. The white heat of the fiery ordeal has subsided, and we find ourselves breathing again; with our union, our spirit, our resources, our territory, unsubdued, except the strip on the Penobscot—slowly, it must be confessed, but too slowly making preparation for another campaign. Never was stratagem more hollow, more perfidious, more cruel, more base, than the overture last winter by the Bramble—a stratagem against which this house will do me the justice to recollect that I then admonished them. Never was warfare more barbarous, more inhuman, more brutal, more unmanly, than that waged against us by the English, pending the negotiation for peace, to which they gave the invitation. It has excited against them but one unanimous spirit of hearty detestation.

An honorable gentleman of the other house (Mr. King) for whose person and character I shall always cherish the most affectionate regard, however I may differ from him in politics, who has not been distinguished by his dislike to England, has, within these few days, pronounced his eloquent and sincere reprobation of their remorseless and sanguinary hostilities. Never were preliminaries of peace laid down upon a broader basis of stupid ignorance of inflated misconception, than those proposed by the British Commissioners at Ghent. Never was inflexibility so flexible, or supercilious superiority so soon relaxed—never was a peremptory sine qua non so soon commuted for a paltry, ultio possidetis. When gentlemen treasure labor by the good hour to prove to us how disastrous our affairs have been, I beg leave to commend them to the enemy for a contradiction. I request them to inform me how it happens that mighty England has so soon descended from her towering height, unless she has found reasons in her reverses here, to moderate her tone there. She knows, she feels her disappointment. She recognizes it in acts too strong to be argued out of existence by all the rhetoric and all the logic of this house. While their fleets, without a single occasion for their presence in any other quarter, have in vain attempted to maintain the paper blockade of our coast, our privateers have enforced an actual and absolute blockade of the coasts of Great Britain. While British ships of the line have degraded the naval character by every species of vile exaction and dastardly mischief upon these shores, the American cruiser has visited the shores of England with examples of heroism and humanity. The privateer has taught the man of war the lesson of his art—how to conquer and how to be generous. There are some vestiges, it must be acknowledged, of British conquest, but they are no where to be seen without the bloody print of British vandalism too. Even this capital presents a diurnal spectacle of mutilated columns and demolished monuments. But the blood of martyrs is the seed of the church: and every capital in Europe, which has survived unhurt the occupation of a conqueror, resounds with execration against the British barbarians who one day laid in ashes the capitol of America, and the next day fled to their ships, leaving their wounded to the mercy of those whom they had thus alienated to the feeling of humanity.

But Canada has not been conquered, and my friend from South-Carolina (Mr. Calhoun) has been reminded of his prediction, that it would be. Sir, I deny the retort. To all the purposes of that prediction, Canada has been conquered. It was not that we desired to magnify our republic by adding the Canadas to the confederacy. If the inhabitants could be removed, I should not care, for my part, if Canada could be overflowed by the ocean. But as a means of obtaining peace and not as the end of the war, the conquest of the Canadas has been almost achieved. And for this again I beg leave to refer to Ghent and England. We have performed a campaign on Canada ground, which is worth the acquisition of ten thousand Canadas. We have accomplished officers, and that being done, England knows that we can create soldiers. The American in Europe need now no longer blush to be an American. The European who visits America—after traversing the ocean, every latitude of which is in a blaze with the naval glories of our glorious tars—and who repairs to the falls of Niagara, as the most prodigious of nature's wonders, will find every species of classic recollection, super-added to the natural prodigy of the scene. The grounds round the falls of Niagara, are all sanctified with romantic exploits and brilliant achievements, achievements which have plucked the military as well as the naval plume from British brows—which have been followed by the congratulations and applause of the whole American people.—Whether the campaign has been well or ill conducted, on the part of the administration, I cannot stop to enquire. Whether Gen. Izard ought to have been here and Gen. Brown there, or what share the administration should have of credit or censure, for these operations, I neither know or care. It answers all my purposes that they redound to the honor of the country—that they enhance the American name at the expense of the enemy of America—the rest is matter of controversy, with which I cannot disturb my feelings.

Our ministers in Europe may now with honest pride and independence, declare to those potentates who shrunk from our assistance, though our cause was theirs, because they dared not to aid us—their subsidies would have been stopped if they had—we have triumphed without your reinforcement, aye, without even your countenance, we have vanquished the victors of your conquerors. We do not ask for your alliance. We do not stand in need of it. With the blessing of God and our means, we can do without it. All that we ask of you is, to cause your neutral rights to be respected as we have caused ours to be. Learn from our example how strong a good cause renders the weak against the mighty. Betrayed by inordinate love of peace, and the infamous double dealing of England into but partial preparation for war, we were overtaken unawares by fearful odds. You thought no doubt that the chances were against us. But after a whole campaign of our infernal enemy's utmost scope, not a wreath of laurel have we lost, nor an inch of ground, excepting a small part which was not defended as it should have been. My life upon it, sir, the magnanimous Alexander will find that his esteem for us is greater than he supposed it, and Louis the Desired, in 1815, like his predecessor in 1778, will generously press in with his assistance, since he perceives that we can do without it.

But we must have armies and we must have money. I venture to assert that the mere enactment, by something like unanimity in this house, of a good military system, with indications of acquiescence in it out of doors, would secure us a peace forthwith, without the necessity of enforcing the system. I appeal to these gentlemen, who are so clamorous for peace, to coalesce for an object so desirable. That system, in my opinion, is a classification of the white male population of the country, for the purpose of a draft into the regular armies. You may call it by what odious, ugly name you will—conscription or what not—but it is the only sufficient, the only republican, the only fair, the only equal plan, for applying the physical means to the end of common military defence and protection. Sir, vast improvements have taken place in the military art since the last twenty years. All Europe has in effect adopted these improvements; and this country will be left lamentably behind in the march of mankind, unless, like the rest, it adopts them too. What are they, sir? Simply a return to the great, cardinal principles of republican government, to the principles which maintained Rome for so many centuries on the ascendant, and again for so many centuries on the decline, before her mere declension disappeared in the darkness of the middle ages. The gentleman from New-York (Mr. Miller) was mistaken in supposing that the Militia Romanorum admitted of either alternative or exemption. There was no such thing. Every citizen was in fact a soldier.—Every one was compelled to serve his country under arms, and no citizen was permitted to be elevated to civil honor, who had not served them in the military field. It is some time, sir, since I read Polybius; and Washington is not the best place on earth for reference to books. But, unless I am quite wrong in my remembrance, the gentleman from New-York will find, in the 7th book of that work, the Roman system as I have stated it. But it is somewhat scholastic to refer to such authorities. Let us come down to later times. We all know the military tenures, the scutage, the Knight service and so forth, by which the vassal was bound to serve his Lord, his Lord the Duke, and the Duke his sovereign. We know the ban and arrière ban, which used to carry men into the field for short and insufficient terms of service. We read at still more recent periods, of the Condottieri, the Hessians, the Walloons, the various mercenaries which for the most part composed the armies of Europe. We know that the great Frederick fought his famous seven year's war with troops of this description. But these again may be thrown out of view, together with the Roman precedent. I invite gentlemen to accompany me to England for a conscription, and I pledge myself to find them one, of the harshest and most unequal kind—not impressment for the sea, but conscription for the land service.—I invite particularly the attention of the gentleman from New-Hampshire (Mr. Webster) to the book I am about to read from—it is the English statutes at large—a treatise with which his pursuits ought to make him peculiarly conversant. Here, where there are no naughty assignats nor Napoleons; here in this adorable land of liberty and wisdom, here we shall find conscription at full length. [Mr. Ingersoll then read several sections of an Act of Parliament for recruiting the regular army, enacted in 1756, and to be found in the seventh volume of the English statutes at large, page 625, 28, G. 2, c. 4— and from another act, enacted in 1757, to be found in the eighth volume of these statutes, page 11, 30, G. 2, c. 8.] Thus, sir, it appears that Lord Chatham planned and Wolfe executed a precedent for Bonaparte's conscriptive system. Here we find that all persons without employment are to be drafted into the king's service. For how long? Five years! From what ages? From 17 to 45—For how much? For 40 shillings a head. By what means? By seizing on their persons, and throwing them into confinement till the recruiting sergeant was ready to receive their translation to the ranks.—And who were intended by her sons out of employment? The yeomanry of the country. How does this appear? Most conclusively, from that section which exempts them in the time of harvest. It was not the loungers, the gentleman, the man of fortune, the cockney, that Lord Chatham had hold of as a person without employment. Oh no! His Lordship knew better. He has left, to be sure, the impression of the energies of his character and administration upon this act of Parliament. But he had not the jacobin temerity to meddle with the privileged orders; that was reserved for the Corsican, who, with his own scymitar, cut his own way to a throne; and who, with all the vulgar prejudices of his former situation, devised and executed a scheme for making gentlemen serve their country just like common people. Oh! the monster! The yeoman whom Lord Chatham forced into General Wolfe's army, had no friend at Court. Like the ten thousand American seamen in British ships, he might have writhed in anguish till the flesh rotted from his bones, without an advocate to assert his claims, unless the merchant had become a sufferer too and clamored his country into a war against orders in council. Lord Chatham violated only the sanctuary of the cottage. But Napoleon intruded on the palace.

And for what war, in particular, was it that this act of Parliament raised men by subscription? For the conquest of Canada. Chatham was the minister and Wolfe the commander—names dear to England—illustrious and venerable names. I subscribe to the sentiments, and quote the language of a modern poet, that it is

Praise enough
To fill the ambition of a private man,
That Chatham's language was his mother tongue,
And Wolfe's great name compatriot with his own.

Thus it appears, Mr. Chairman, that Napoleon had a precedent, an English precedent, for his conscription. To argue the objections to this system from its abuse by the late French emperor, is a false mode of argument. He did abuse the engine, to the most extensive and wanton and abominable ends. But it does by no means follow, therefore, that the system itself is a bad one.

Have we no American great name associated with this system, which seems to excite at once all the Gog and Magog terrors that one would think ought by this time to be banished to the Island of Elba? We have, sir, a name never mentioned without reverence, never uttered by the tongue without a glow of the heart, General Washington, after remonstrating for three or four years in vain against militia and short enlistments was constrained at last to have recourse to classification and draft; and our liberties were ultimately gained by American conscripts. Not indeed until our towns were occupied and sacked, our shores in flames, and our prejudices subdued by our stronger feelings—a course of discipline which I am afraid will again be necessary. Our strong measures are almost always reserved for the next year after the occasion for them.

We have ascertained that neither militia nor voluntary enlistments are to be relied upon. The fatal doctrine of citizen-soldier, (as we adhere to it) has cost us more money, more blood, more mourning in six months than a war of six years should or would cost under proper military organization. For proof of this we go to the camp at Ellicott's Mills in this neighbourhood. See every fourth man on his sick bed, or rather sick without a bed to lie upon. Every day a funeral. Count the cost; estimate the expense of actual disbursement and of loss of labour, and no rational, no feeling man can doubt as to the shocking inexpedient of such a system. I appeal to the honorable gentleman from Virginia (General Breckenridge) for the correctness of what I say. With such dreadful scenes of preparation for service, let me refer the committee to a still nearer, and still more painful scene for the inefficiency of militia. I mean the affair at Bladensburg. In making this reference I beg to be understood as intending to blame nobody, from the general down to the private. It always has been, and always will be, impossible with the militia to contend with regulars. It takes several years apprenticeship to make a tinker or a tailor, and is to be conceived that the military science it to be acquired by intuition?

Such are the militia men—and what are they obtained by what is termed voluntary enlistment? Go to the recruiting rendezvous for information. A poor, ignorant creature is coaxed into the dram shop, and betrayed into intoxication. When his senses are gone, the Evangelists are put into his hands, and he is called upon to invoke the Almighty to witness an engagement to serve his country.

A bounty is thrust into his pocket; a cap is put upon his head and he becomes a soldier.—When the fit of drunkenness goes off he is informed of his enlistment—he denies it—he is manacled—he resists—he is confined, until finally he is subdued into voluntary enlistment. Let me not be asked why I support a war which involves these evils. I answer, that war itself is an evil but a necessary one. Whereas these disgusting practices may be easily avoided. They are one of our English legacies. Recruiting is a brutal exercise of violence and fraud over mental alienation. It is an image of the bastard liberty of England. It is slavery called liberty.

The substitute, for it is the most simple, the most republican, the most equal and unexceptionable system in the world—that of militia classification and draft. That is, militia as it should be—not as it is. Of all countries in the world, this is the one best adapted to such a system. It is here alone that all men are treated as equals. By this I do not mean any revolutionary equality. No. Education and even wealth place their possessors above the illiterate and the indigent. In spite of all they do, fortune will make her own selections, and laws cannot controul them. The most powerful and consistent argument extant in favour of republicanism, is to be found in the New Testament, but at the same time the most positive authority for the graduation of the social order. For, as the great republican poet has expressed it, "orders and degrees jar not with liberty, but well consist." But then it should be the constant endeavor of government to maintain a perfect equality in all civil enjoyments and impositions, to burthen the poor with nothing that does not fall likewise on the rich; to call upon the latter according to their opulence for pecuniary aid; and not to call upon the former for any personal services that are not exacted of all alike. Upon these principles emphatically does that military system rest, which, by whatever title denominated, classifies a population and compels them to serve without exemption or reservation.

As to the constitutionality of this measure, I refuse to argue it. I hold it to be too clear for argument. Independent of the explicit terms of the constitution, this power is inherent in the nature of the government. Its exercise and extent must be referred for their regulation to a sound discretion. I adopt the sentiment of the Chairman of the Military Committee, (Mr. Troup) that the constitution authorizes it, and that if it does not, such a constitution is not worth regarding or having.

That it would be popular (I mean in the legitimate acceptance of popularity—agreeable to the people at large) I have no doubt, because it calls upon them for no duty that is not necessary and common to all. And the people never murmur at such calls. In that portion of the country with which I have any acquaintance, I am sure it has been expected from Congress, and would be received with pleasure as the best alternative for the oppressive militia functions. Whether it would be odious or resisted, as is threatened elsewhere, is not for me to determine. I can tell the gentleman from N. H. (Mr. Webster) however, that the glowing picture he has drawn of its effects is but faintly shadowed to that which this country will present, unless some energetic and adequate system be enforced. The late developements from Europe place us, Sir, upon critical ground. On one side, all is peace, prosperity, renown and respect. On the other, war interminable, disunion, devastation, disgrace and irretrievable ruin. Dismemberment would be but a little misfortune, contrasted with what may be our lot, unless we rise up to the exigency. The dangers of despotism which are imagined, are alarming, it must be confessed; but they are not so awful as the degradation and misery which may result from a fear to do what our position demands.—Convulsion is no more to be dreaded than paralysis. For myself, I see no peril but in our own divisions.

The republic is perfectly safe if we pursue those energetic and powerful measures, which alone can save us—which alone are consistent with our duty, and commensurate with the occasion.

Mr. Duval's Speech

In reply to Mr. Miller—in the House of Representatives of the United States; on the bill calling for 80,000 militia from the several states, for the defence of the United States.

MR. CHAIRMAN—My desire to address the committee on the present bill, does not arise either from the hope of fame or distinction. But, sir, I am impelled by my judgment and duty, to protest against the opinions and doctrines which have been advanced by the honorable gentlemen from New-York, (Mr. Miller) on the various subjects which he has brought before this committee—opinions and objections against the powers of Congress, which, if they unfortunately should be brought into practice, would overturn every principle of civil liberty, destroy all subordination and union, and rend into pieces the constitution of the country. Before I proceed to examine the arguments of the gentleman from New-York, (Mr. Miller) permit me to say, I am opposed to striking out any part of this bill, unless I can be persuaded in an hour of alarm and peril to surrender the rights and liberties of the nation. The provisions contained in this bill are not only proper but absolutely necessary. The rejection of the measure would be to disarm the nation, and increase the calamities of war. I had hoped, as the motion of the honorable gentleman from Virginia (Mr. Eppes) had prevailed, to reduce the term of militia service from two years to one, that all further objections on the part of the opposition would vanish—I did not long remain in this error. All the clamor of party has been roused by this measure, and, by gentlemen in the opposition, it is loudly denounced as odious, tyrannical and unconstitutional. Sir, I had hoped, that the stormy passions of party were in a great measure allayed by the perilous situation of the country.—Opposed to a powerful and ambitious enemy, who is collecting all the deluge of war to pour on this devoted land—with a treasury exhausted, and a gallant army reduced in number but not in spirit, I indeed had hoped, that gentlemen in the opposition (under these circumstances) would have stood forward to defend their soil and sovereignty. In this hope I have not altogether been disappointed. Some gentlemen of high and distinguished talents, who now stand at the head of the federal party, have declared their determination to vote the supplies for the government, and on several occasions have nobly triumphed over their feelings, and placed themselves on American ground. This is the duty of every American—they owe it to themselves and their country. I ask not gentlemen to sacrifice their principles. Surely when their aid is demanded to preserve our rights, let them expose the errors of the administration—let them expose the policy which has been pursued by the dominant party—let them endeavor to convince the people, that their confidence has been misplaced and abused; nay, let them exert all their powers to change the rulers of the nation, and call other men and measures into action. But in the name of our common country, I call upon them to prepare to meet the enemy, as implacable as he is powerful.

The member from New-York (Mr. Milles) commenced his arguments against this bill by gravely informing the committee, that he not only objected to this, but to all the military plans which had been offered; because, he says, they are coercive.—Will the gentleman be so obliging as to inform me how long since he made this important discovery? That the civil, criminal and military laws of our country should be coercive on its citizens is surely very tyrannical. But, till the learned gentleman can point out to me a country whose laws have no penalties, and whose military code is not coercive, I must be permitted to believe this strange and visionary notion has only been drawn from Plato's ideal republic. Indeed, sir, this argument is an excellent specimen of the lengthy, learned and elaborate speech delivered by the gentleman on this subject; the whole of which was, no doubt, the offspring of much painful reflection and deep research. It was the most logical, historical and tragical discourse that ever was delivered in a legislative body. I was at a loss to determine, whether most to admire his powers as a historian, his clearness as a logician, or the refined excellence of his poetic fancy. It is rare that one individual excels in more than one science or accomplishment, but the honorable gentlemen from New-York is surely an exception. I feel half inclined to complain of the brilliancy of his fancy, for it threw such a dazzling light round his subject and arguments, that I must own my own mind was often so bewildered as not to comprehend all his nice and excellent deductions. But this was certainly my fault, or rather my misfortune—for the eye of real genius is always clearest and brightest in the blaze of science.

The committee will pardon this digression; it was justly due to the gentleman. This bill has been called conscription for the purpose of rendering it odious to the people. It is not the first time that a measure has been denounced by some peculiar name, in order to produce opposition or to defeat its object. Such a shallow artifice cannot deceive any but those who are willing to be deluded. The gentleman from New-York (Mr. Miller) read to the committee some pages of most pathetic declamation on the distressing scenes which conscription had produced in France; but he forgot to shew the coincidence between the bill before us and the conscription code of France. I say there is no coincidence, no, not even in the classification, and still less in any other feature.—The conscription laws of France were first introduced by their directory, and are in strict imitation of the Roman discipline, which compelled every man to become a soldier. They were adopted for the purpose of aggrandizement and conquest.—All Frenchmen were classed between the ages of twenty and twenty-five only. In this particular it was oppressive and unjust. The conscripts were often treated with the utmost cruelty, and if they deserted their parents were made responsible for their appearance, or their fortunes paid an exorbitant fine. All this was done too to carry on foreign wars without their consent, to gratify an ambitious tyrant. The people of France were controlled by the iron rod of a military despot, who was only governed by his interest and glory. They made no laws—their voice was not heard in their councils. Day after day, and year after year, were they dragged unwilling victims to fight the wars of their master in every part of their continent. The young men saw no termination to their military toils but in the arms of death; and if they survived the period assigned for military service, they were but seldom rewarded for the scars which they bore, while unusual hardships and constant exposure entailed upon them poverty and premature old age. No wonder can then be excited when we are told, that the people of France dreaded and execrated conscription.

Let us now examine this American militia bill, and compare it with the conscription of France. First, all the free male population of the United States, over the age of eighteen and under forty-five, are bound to render military service whenever they are legally drafted. The section which permits a class to exonerate itself by furnishing one recruit for the regular army, so far from being objectionable, is in fact an advantage to the whole body of militia. This difference, and the extension of the term of service six months longer than usual, are the only changes in the militia law now in operation.

If this is conscription, it was practised during our revolution. It has been the invariable practice during the present war, and must continue so as long as we are governed by the constitution. It is nothing more than the people of these states expected, when they instructed their representatives in Congress to declare war against Great Britain. If this be called conscription by the opposition, it is equally so to bring the militia into the field for six or three months—nay, even for a single day. But the member from New-York (Mr. Miller) and his friends, feeling that this argument was too weak to support them even for a moment, turned to the constitution and endeavored to base their reasoning on its sacred principles. Sir, in this they have failed, and their attempt has only more clearly exposed the error of their doctrines. The militia belong to the states, it is urged, and Congress have no right to call them into service, for they may be wanted for state defence.

I answer, the general government is bound to provide for the weal and protection of every state in the union. That the constitution gives to Congress the power to provide for organizing, arming and disciplining the militia, and for governing such part of them as may be employed in the service of the United States. That it also invests Congress with power to call forth the militia to execute the laws of the union, suppress insurrections and repel invasions. Will it be denied that our country is not invaded? No—this must be admitted by the most incredulous. Yet, possessing these powers, and under these circumstances, we are told that this bill is unconstitutional. I ask gentlemen if the very compact which they guard with so much watchfulness, does not recognize the militia as the bulwark of our liberties? And yet they say in effect, that Congress cannot command their services. Before my mind can assent to this strange contradiction, and extraordinary opinion, gentlemen must prove to me that it is unconstitutional to call the militia into service for six or three months, or even for a day, for their reasons will apply as strong in every instance I have mentioned, as they can against this bill.

The member from New-York (Mr. Miller) with great emotion has declared, that were he to vote for this bill, he would disgrace the ashes of his failures, that is, violate the rights of the people who ought to be suffered quietly to enjoy their own fire sides. I will tell the gentleman that he can never disgrace the ashes of his fathers by defending his country; they have given to him an example that should awaken all his pride to emulate; they never refused to defend the soil and independence which their noble valor has since given to their posterity; could their pure and generous spirits witness these scenes and hear such sentiments, they would weep angel tears over the degeneracy and ingratitude of their sons.—But we should enjoy our fire sides! What enjoyment let me enquire, is to be found in this enviable situation, when war is striding over the people, breathing destruction on our borders—can the member from New-York (Mr. Miller) feel in time such as these, the quiet and enjoyment of which he speaks? No, in the interest which he has taken in our various campaigns, in the minute recital of our misfortunes, in the painful and melancholy feelings, which he has illustrated by such frequent quotations of the poetic language of the great dramatist it is disclosed, that he reposes not in these times in quiet content by his own fire side; let us not talk of these enjoyments in the strife of war; this theme the American will reserve for the halcyon days of peace.

But the member from New-York (Mr. Miller) has said that this nation can only be saved by reviving its credit, and recruiting its armies; yet he declares that his assent shall not be given to this end; although he has told us, this and this only can save the nation. Is it possible that the honourable member is so lost to duty and love of country, that under no situation in which we may be placed, he will give his aid to provide men or money for defence.

[Here Mr. Miller rose, and said he was misunderstood by the gentleman from Kentucky, that he had said he would not give any supplies to the government for the conquest of Canada; but that if our army was withdrawn from that country, and the project of conquest relinquished, he would go as far as any gentleman to raise men and money for defence.]

Mr. Duval regretted he had misunderstood the gentleman, that it was neither his object or inclination to misstate his arguments, and no gentleman would accuse him of so mean a subterfuge.

It was but the other day that the member from New-York (Mr. Miller) declared on this floor, that the government had abandoned every object for which this war was commenced. I take him at his word, and the supposed conquest of Canada cannot now be an obstacle; but to remove his fear of conquest, let me offer him proof which is undeniable to dissipate the inquietude which he still feels on this subject. I mean the instructions given to our ministers, and the offer to make peace on their part with the British commissioners on terms of which they have no right to complain. How then can it be seriously urged, that this is a war of conquest? Even the gentleman himself has said that all the objects for which this war was declared are now abandoned; in one breath we are told it would be dangerous to the liberties of the people, to place at the disposal and under the control of the men in power, a great military force; in the next moment the same gentleman declares that the administration have neither talents or capacity to carry on the war; and that such is their imbecility, that were they to furnish the supplies they would be profusely and ineffectually expended. I leave such absurd contradictions to be reconciled by those who claim them as just and unanswerable arguments.

But, said the gentleman (Mr. Miller) beware how you trample on the rights of your citizens, for remember justice never sleeps; I lament that his conduct has not proved the truth of this remark. Justice among the great body of the people I trust will never sleep, but with some in the opposition, she even now slumbers unto death. Justice expired with the gentleman and some of his friends in the opposition, when they declared in this hall and in the face of the whole nation, that this war is wicked and unjust.

That the nation commenced the war before they were prepared, was and is yet my opinion. But that we had not ample cause to justify our resort to arms, I do deny. Was it wicked and unjust to resist the enemy in their illegal decrees and blockades? Was it wicked and unjust to resist the capture and confiscation of our vessels and cargoes? Was it wicked and unjust to resist the imprisonment of our seamen? If none of these contain the wickedness and injustice of which gentlemen complain, I ask in what does it exist? Let gentlemen no longer refuse their assistance—let them not sit calmly by and see the farms of their citizens pillaged, their habitations wrapt in flames; and when the voice of maddening distress shall assail them with petitions, coldly answer, we will not aid or protect you, for this war is wicked and unjust. When our territory is invaded by your enemy, and he bids defiance to your arms—when your citizens, no longer able to resist their iniquitous and rapacious demand, call on you for protection, which you have solemnly sworn under our constitution to give, will you violate the high obligation, and answer, it cannot be given for the war is wicked and unjust? Have you not heard the cries of distress, arising from ruffian profanation? Have you not marked the spots where your villages and hamlets once stood—whose ashes have slacked with the blood of your citizens? and yet are you calm and undisturbed, refuse to redress their sufferings, or to aid in the punishment of the incendiary myridons who have violated your people, because, you say, this war is wicked and unjust?

In vain may the citizens of your Indian frontier recite their sad and dreadful sufferings. The exterminating warfare of a merciless foe, whose joy in blood rises to madness, is suffered with your consent to rage with death and desolation on your borders. The rude children of the brave and daring hunter, and the family of the unoffending and peaceable emigrant sink alike beneath the arm of their savage foe. Do they desire your protection? Yes: but you sternly bid them die, because you still say, that this war is wicked and unjust.

I would ask, from what does this apathy on the part of many in the opposition originate? I fear from local distinctions and invidious remarks, which, with regret and pain I have often heard thrown out in the warmth of discussion. There is a class of politicians in this country who have for years, with the most unwearied industry and artifice, endeavored to make the eastern and northern sections of the union believe, that the southern and western states are jealous of their increasing wealth and commercial importance. This opinion has been supported and encouraged by demagogues for base and perfidious purposes. The good sense of the nation (it is the hope of every American) will soon correct so fatal an opinion. The happiness and interests of all the states are linked together by every tie that can bind society—speaking the same language—living under the same general laws—connected by marriage, blood and friendship, and worshipping the same great benevolent being—How can stronger connexions exist? Is interest more binding? Be it so. The north and east are commercial; the south and the west are engaged in agriculture: if commerce is impeded or suspended, the ships of our merchants are idle and decay; the produce of the south and west remains on the planter or farmer's hands, dead, wasting or unproductive, or becomes spoiled, unfit for market, or is wholly lost. Nature intended that the northern and eastern states should produce the daring and enterprising mariners of the union; to make them so, she has made them fine bays, harbors and rivers—she has placed the fisheries in their neighborhood as a nursery for their seamen—their climate is cold, and soil unsuited to the various productions of raw materials necessary for their factories, which are found in abundance in the south and west. New-England will not only possess the carrying trade of the south and west, but will, from her great and increasing population, necessarily become their manufacturers. All this is so obvious and certain, that the demagogues of either party cannot long deceive the people, by crying out that their interests are separate and distinct. Away, then, with invidious sectional distinctions—let us speak of ourselves as a nation, and not as separate hordes of wrangling and jealous savages. The bold and enterprising mariner of the north may proudly rank with the first in the nation. Yes, sir, these are the men who belong to your navy—who have acquired more glory in two years, for themselves and country, than ever England could boast in half a century—a gem which shall shine with undiminished splendor down the long annals of time. This nation never should forget in peace that a navy is her right arm in war.

It was with pleasure I listened to the gentleman fr. New-York, while he praised the valor of our land and naval commanders, and I could not but deem it strange, that he who seemed so animated at his own recital of their gallant deeds, should yet refuse to follow their example in defending his country.

I did not hope to follow the gentleman from New York through all the various remarks which he pressed into this discussion; nor can I follow him in the sublime poetic effusions, and numberless quotations from celebrated authors. Indeed, sir, it seemed to me that the gentleman's speech was not made for the present bill, but for the bill which has been reported to this house by the honorable chairman (Mr. Troup) of the military committee; but as it is probable it will not be acted on, the honorable member from New-York has transferred his objection from that to the bill from the senate. But nothing is impossible to great genius; no subject is too high or too low, to escape its subtle attention. It delights to bring objects and things radically different, together; and, like electricity, its course is brilliant, wild and eccentric. Hence, we may account for the introduction of Governor Tompkins and his charger, by the honorable member, to this committee, caparisoned in all the pomp of war; and also for the rapid flight which he instantly took from the back of this war horse, as he said, "to pluck bright honor from the pale faced moon," where, for the present, I leave the gentleman.

The attention of the committee shall not be claimed much longer by me, for I throw by many remarks which have been made in the course of debate, in order to call your reflections to a subject that has been too often agitated, to escape reply.—I mean the doctrine of rebellion, which has been trumpeted in our ears by more than one member of this body. It is time that gentlemen in the opposition should allay the fury of passion by the exercise of reason and calm enquiry. Can one individual in this body be found who will advocate principles destructive of the happiness and constitution of this country? Yes, this house has heard discord and rebellion, encouraged and avowed from more than one quarter. The member from New-York (Mr. Miller) has declared, that this militia system, or, as he terms it, conscription, will not be submitted to by the people; that they ought to resist such oppression; such infringement of their rights, and he hoped they would resist.

[Here Mr. Miller rose to explain, and said that the language he had used, were the words of Mr. Livingston, a democrat, and were delivered in a speech when he was opposed to Mr. Adams' administration, and he (Mr. Miller) now adopted them as his own.]

Mr. Duval said he had so understood the gentleman, and although he claimed the benefit of the example introduced, it was not on that account the less mischievous and pernicious; that demagogues belonged to all parties, and were equally to be detested and condemned. Let gentlemen who are giving tone and encouragement to rebellion, beware of the consequences; for, I tell them, they are treading over a burning volcano that may burst upon them in dreadful ruin. Do they propose to better their conditions, or the condition of their country, by such dangerous and mad contention? If so, let me drive from them far the fatal delusion. Look to the French revolution, and learn in time to avoid the bloody scenes which may and will be re-acted in America. How many of all the numerous and daring revolutionists of France are now in existence? Few, indeed, compared to the many who have fallen before the power of that rebellion which owed to them its spring and creation. All France did not produce, with her millions of men, a single individual who could snatch the helm and wield the sword of the nation. Such men are rare creations of nature—five centuries will not produce such another man as the Corsican, who braved the tempest of revolution, and rode on surges of blood to the imperial throne of France.

Beware—in time beware of the fate that will attend your temerity; for believe me when I tell you, ye who create are not the men that can control the tide of rebellion; you, first of all, shall be overwhelmed by its resistless fury. Deceive not yourselves and friends with the vain and foolish hope, that you can "mount the whirlwind and direct the storm," for you will be scattered before it "like chaff before the wind of heaven."

SPEECH

OF THE HON. WILLIAM IRVING,

In the House of Representatives of U. S. on the bill from the Senate, authorizing a draft of 80,430 militia from the several states, for the defence, &c. of the United States.

Mr. Speaker.—It appears to me, sir, that the nice distinctions, that have, heretofore, been made by gentlemen, between a defensive and an offensive war, are no longer of any consequence. The ground on which the war commenced, can no longer, it is presumed, effect the question, whether hostilities shall be carried on with every efficient mean within our power. The terms proposed by the British Commissioners, have been communicated to this house; and the question now is, whether these terms are to be accepted, or, whether we are to employ the means Providence has placed within our reach in the expectation of procuring better?

Sir, I would ask any gentleman in this assembly, whether he is willing to accept of these terms—to dismember the territory of the United States—to lop off the hands and arms of his country, and thus deliver her a prey to the enemy—or, at any rate, take from her every future hope of obtaining either satisfaction for injuries, or security against the exercise of oppression on the ocean. If he says he is willing to do this, it is well; he takes his stand, and we know what he means by opposing this measure. But if, on the other hand, by a feeling of generous indignation, at these new and unwarrantable claims, that violate the integrity of this country, and outrage every principle of reciprocity, he answers that he will not make peace on such ignoble terms, then if he differs with me, it is only as to the expediency of this measure, or its capacity to answer the purpose for which it is intended. It is with a view of investigating these two points that I enter into this debate; for I do not believe there is any honorable gentleman in this house who would recommend a peace on the terms which have been offered. If there is, I should consider it idle to address myself to such a person. It is impossible to create a soul under the ribs of death—and I would consider it equally hopeless to reason against the want of certain feelings, or attempt to excite emotions in a breast steeled by insensibility.

I would then ask, are the present means of raising an army, adequate to the exigencies of the present crisis? No, sir. The history of the war, and the experience of every day, are a sufficient answer to this question. What, with the habits engendered by a long peace—the want of means to pay the enormous bounties, which are necessary to tempt the prosperous multitude of this country—and most of all, the various and unjustifiable means that have been resorted to, for the purpose of impeding or discouraging enlistments, it is found totally impossible to fill the ranks of the army. Are the militia ordered out? it is called oppression. Are they selected by lot? gentlemen cry out conscription—as if there was any analogy between the temperate behests of the law, and the arbitrary will of a despot. Should any man be willing to enlist voluntarily, he is told, that his pay will be withheld, or, that in New-England, several soldiers had sold their certificates at a loss of fifty per cent. And this fact, which, if it be true, was the result of a panic, arising from the suggestions of some patriotic adviser, or conscientious broker, who wished to take advantage of his credulity, is trumpeted from one end of the country to the other—hawked out in newspapers, and recorded in triumph by the friends of their country.

What then remains for us, sir? Are we to go on in this miserable rickety mode of warfare to the end of time, and waste our resources by dribblets in this preposterous economy—this lady-like forbearance of using the means in our power? or are we by one manly and decisive effort, to do that at once, which we must do at last, or submit to a most dishonourable peace? This is not the land of Colchus—you cannot saw dragons's teeth and reap armed men; you must resort to human means—and all human means, hitherto tried, have failed; we must therefore, find others, or we must crouch and cringe, and say to the enemy, in the debased and whining language of cowardice, "take all we have, but spare our lives."

Sir, as a mean of raising an efficient army, I see nothing unconstitutional or illegal in the bill before us, nor, indeed, any very extraordinary hardship.—If the country is worth defending, and I trust some part of it, at least will be considered so, there appears no very good reason, why men should not be called upon to perform that duty. The framers of the constitution thought so, and they have invested the general government with the power of calling out the militia, as a sufficient defence against any force that might be brought against us. If, sir, this resource is withheld, by the delicate scruples of some state authorities—if pretence or construction, or quibble is resorted to—or if men shelter themselves behind an ambiguity, are country, the lakes, and our honour to be sacrificed in consequence? I hope not—I trust not—I am sure not! I do believe there is spirit enough in this house to resist both foreign and domestic imaginary barriers of the constitution, which rather seems to invite the aggressions of the enemy, than to afford safety to those whom this very constitution was intended to protect.

I say imaginary barriers, because I see nothing in the constitution which opposes this classification. It is true, sir, I am no lawyer, expert in legal subtleties, and equally expert in applying either end of the glass to an object, as it suits his purpose, to increase or diminish it. But there is one rule of law, to which I have not been inattentive, and that is, to consult the intention of the law which we are to expound. What was the intention of that section of the constitution, which provides for calling out the militia; in short, sir, what was the whole object of the constitution itself. It was framed solely for the purpose of combining the people of the United States into a community, for mutual defence. If, therefore, the usual resources of militia is insufficient, we resort to regular enlistment; and if, at fails, what are we to do but try other more efficient means, or surrender the honor, and barter the interests of the country, for imaginary constitutional scruples?

Sir, there is one political axiom that cannot be controverted, the country must be defended; and whether this is done by driving the enemy to a distance, or receiving him at our doors, is a matter of policy, and not of conscience. It does not alter the principle one single hair's breadth. For my part, sir, I cannot find in the constitution any one principle that militates against classification, any more than against a draft or conscription, as some gentlemen call it. If there was, cases might occur even then, to justify such a measure, as indispensable to self-defence, which, while that necessity lasts, supercedes all other laws but those of nature.

But it appears to me, that sometimes we "strain at a gnat and swallow a camel." There is a fundamental principle in the constitution, which requires the minority, to submit to the will of the majority, constitutionally expressed, yet some in our country have forgotten that—there is another, that "no state shall enter into a compact with another state," some have quite forgotten that—and there is a sacred principle of union, pervading every article of the constitution, and some have quite forgotten that.

No! Mr. Speaker, having so glorious an inheritance, equal to that promised land, that the Jews were forty years suffering in the wilderness in the hope of obtaining, is it not wonderful, that instead of devising ways and means, for defending and securing the precious possession, we should be seeking for quibbles, to render useless the means that God has provided for its defence?

Sir, we hear the executive of the United States every day charged with incapacity in carrying on the war; but how could we have expected any thing else, when we take into consideration, the situation in which he has been placed? Instead of providing money by taxation, we chose to resort to the expedient of loans, and sent our government out borrowing, until they returned pennyless. The consequence has been, that instead of employing their time the summer past in devising plans how they could most annoy the enemy, they have been scuffling with national penury—perplexed to know, from day to day, how they could employ to the best advantage, their stinted means—how they could exist from hour to hour, with an exhausted treasury, and a depreciated credit. It is vain to expect a well conducted war, and an efficient administration unless we provide money and men to produce both.

Sir, gentlemen talk of this general government as if it were a self-supported superior being; some abstract and independent power; some cloud enthroned Hercules, on whom we are to depend for overcoming our difficulties, without any exertions of our own. What is the government of the United States, but an aggregate of the physical power and wealth of the people at large? It is from those it derives its strength and its energy, and if those are withheld, I, for one, should like to know what means gentlemen would propose for the purpose of supplying that strength and energy.

Sir, you might as well wither this arm by some powerful spell, and stop the current of blood that flows in these veins, and then, when the arm was rendered powerless, and the heart ceased to beat, deride the body for being inert and motionless.

There is but one way of giving energy to a free government that I know of, and that is, by being liberal, not reckless, of the public resources; and it is the special duty of this house, charged as it is with that distribution, to be careful, while it guards the public wealth from waste, and the people of this free country from oppression, to give to the government the means of being strong and energetic.

If we refuse these means, the gentlemen on the other side, who, after having clamoured for taxes as they did for war, and afterwards voted against both, may, if they please, charge the administration with not being energetic! they may attempt to lift the load of responsibility from themselves, but it will cling to them with the pertinacity of some natural deformity; and though they may perchance, deceive themselves, those who trace effects right home to their true causes, will point to this house, which with a most prodigal economy, refused to bestow, what it was content the government should borrow, at a rate of interest beyond what any individual, who was not desperate in fortune and reputation, ever paid.

I came not here, sir, as the advocate of any administration whatever, but as an agent from the part of the country I represent, to promote, according to the best of my judgment, the public good. Still I think it the part of every honest man to vindicate the rulers of his free choice, when he thinks they are unjustly calumniated.—Neither do I impeach any man's motives in saying, that when gentlemen accuse the executive with want of energy, they may as well go a little further and accuse the body of not taking care of the limbs, when the limbs have refused to do their office.

It is this mistaken, this fatal economy that accounts for the ill conduct of the war, of which gentlemen every day, and on all occasions complain. No matter what may be the subject before us, we are condemned on every question to hear a repetition of the same arguments. The clock does not strike, or the centinel walk his rounds more regularly, than some gentlemen go the sing-song rounds of "unjust, unnecessary and unnatural war." They are continually reminding us of the unfortunate cook, who, for want of a little genius to diversify his dinners, every day served up the same dull round of "three roasted pigs, three buttered apple pies." Whenever they are asked for men or money, they either fly out into a passion, and scold the administration roundly, or they resort to as many excuses as a miser dunned for some miserable pittance. One gentleman will not give his money, because his section of the union is not represented in the committee of Ways and Means. Why, sir, this is the first time that I have ever heard the doctrine of the union of taxation, and representation, harrowed down to such miserable localities.—If such a principle is to be introduced into this house, there is not a measure that may not be opposed on the ground. Every state must be represented in each committee, and the jostling of local interest, local prejudices, and local partialities, would in all probability, most effectually prevent any well digested report from ever being made to this house.

Sir, it is here, on this floor, that the final decision on every report is made, and so long as any member of this house can here freely deliver his sentiments and utter his objections, in language that suits either the suavity or malignity of his own disposition, it does appear to me a matter of perfect indifference, whether his section of the union is represented in the committee or not.

Sir, I repeat again, it is this mistaken economy, which by withholding what is necessary, renders what it bestows almost useless, that accounts for the alledged bad conduct of the war, on which the gentlemen dwell with such wonderful and incessant pertinacity. Not having money, the government could not procure men; and not having men, they could not undertake any extensive and splendid enterprize.—And this, in my opinion, is all the bad conduct that can be properly charged upon the administration. Even thus circumscribed by our jealous economy, what one advantage has the enemy gained, except the solitary one of injuring this capital? And that in a national point of view, as effecting the spirit of the nation, has been rather a good than an evil. Something was necessary to rouse the dormant spirit of the nation, and this has effectually done it.

But even this disaster is to be attributed to our own imprudence; not in expending, but withholding the public resources. The want of money, so imperiously felt at the Treasury, which prevented the raising of men, prevented the possibility of having a sufficient force ready to repel the enemy at every avenue of attack: it prevented the erecting of necessary fortifications at every vulnerable point; and it prevented the doing any thing, until the dangers of the moment called the attention of the government to act.

Unable to obtain means for expenditures, that were absolute in their demand, such as the subsistence of troops; the supplying arms, ammunition, ordnance, cloathing, &c. for those already employed, and for erecting fortifications where it was conceived they were immediately wanted, those contingencies that were apparently remote, were not taken into consideration: They were of necessity, neglected; and hence the opportunity given to the enemy to make an incursion into this place; and here we are to look for the cause of the inefficiency of the present administration. We did not provide, in time, the means to enable them to be efficient; and any administration would have been inefficient under similar circumstances.

I urge these remarks on this House, considering it a thinking, reflecting body; a co-ordinate branch of the government, and equally bound with the Executive, in the laws that are framed, to consult the interest, and promote the safety of the people. When therefore, we accuse the Executive of not performing what we did not afford him the means to perform, we either treat him unjustly, or we virtually declare ourselves mere automations, to be directed by his will; which is, notoriously not the case. Sir, let us try to do better in future. Let us provide ample means to insure success—and then, and not till then, can we hold the Executive responsible for disaster and disgrace.

Sir, this is not a time to talk, but to act. When our army is composed of a mere handful of men, and our treasury empty, so that it cannot provide for this gallant handful; when an enemy, powerful and active, is beating against our shores, like the strong wave of the ocean; when every thing is at stake; when personal safety, property, and every thing valuable, and every thing dear to us, lie all exposed to the mercy of momentary events; and when in the language of scripture, we may emphatically say, "we know not what a day may bring forth," surely, such is not the moment for parsimonious feelings in raising taxes, or for forced constructions, to defeat the means for raising men. If we are parsimonious now, the next year every thing is to be done over again—the same expense is to be repeated, and the same result ensues. Sir, this is the way to exhaust a country, without producing one single good. It renders her sacrifices of no avail—it is offering up victims without a hope that the offering will be accepted; it is bleeding a little every day, till the patient is exhausted, while the disease remains.

Mr. Troup's Speech ON THE ARMY BILLS,

IN COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE.

Mr. Troup said, that the bill before them being a bill from the Senate, which had not been referred to the military committee, but which had been taken up on the motion of the gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. Calhoun,) the military committee, as such, were strangers to its provisions. It was not to be expected, therefore, that he could give to the house an exposition of its principles and details. The gentleman from South Carolina, was no doubt prepared to do so; for himself, Mr. T. said he was opposed to the measure of the senate, and would therefore move to strike out the first section of the bill; it would try the principle. The measure of the senate, he humbly conceived, was inadequate to the object. It proposed to give a militia force, when you wanted not a militia but a regular force. He respectfully trusted to the house, in considering this subject, the propriety of endeavouring, in the first place, to establish the principle on which they would rest their military measures for the further prosecution of the war; whether it were the principle of classification and draft, or classification and penalty; whether the principle proposed by the Senate, or any other principle, they could not, he humbly conceived, arrive at any conclusion satisfactory to the house, or useful and honourable to the country, without adopting this mode of proceeding. Having established the principle, the committee of the whole, or a select committee, might consider the details.

Mr. T. said he very well knew that mankind were governed by their hopes and fears; more by their hopes than their fears, and he was not insensible of the effect which the dispatches received yesterday, from our ministers at Ghent might have on the measures under consideration. He should be very sorry if the effect would be to induce the legislature to discontinue or relax the preparations necessary for a vigorous prosecution of the war. If such should be the effect, the enemy might have good reason to exult in the success of a diplomatic trick played off at Ghent, which, lulling us into a false security, would enable him to strike us at the opening of the next campaign, unarmed and unprepared. If he should be able to do so, he would begin to consider himself a match for the Yankees in cunning, and we would repent when it was too late. Mr. T. said he did not mean to say we would not have peace; politics were too uncertain to justify such a declaration; we may have peace in a few weeks. He only meant to say, that calculations founded on events which may happen at Ghent or at Vienna, and which would induce the legislature to relax in the necessary preparations for the next campaign, ought not to be indulged; measures ought to be taken, not on a supposition of speedy peace, but of protracted war. If peace happened, the preparation for war would do no harm. If peace did not happen, the want of preparation would do much harm; it might lose the next campaign, and losing the next campaign, might lose the objects of the war. I only suggest therefore, sir, that it is wise and prudent to act as if the negotiations at Ghent would certainly fail. In submitting, sir, to the committee, the few observations with which I intend to trouble them, on this motion, I will endeavor to satisfy them, that the measure proposed by the Senate ought not to be taken, because it places our reliance for a successful prosecution of the war, on irregular militia; whereas our reliance ought to be placed on disciplined troops, and that some other measure therefore ought to be resorted to—some measure calculated to fill the regular ranks and augment the regular establishment.

In making provision for the further prosecution of the war, there would be but one object common to all—To bring the war to a speedy and honorable termination, by all the means in the power of the Legislature. At least it would be an object common to every genuine American, because every American had an interest in it. The war was a war for the country, and the result of it, whatever it might be, whether glorious or inglorious, would determine the character of the country and government. If glorious, every American, without distinction of party, would participate in that glory; if inglorious, every American, without distinction of party, would participate in the infamy of it. He knew very well that certain gentlemen had said, the war was a party war, a war for the administration—but gentlemen would find ere long their mistake. They will find that Europe, the civilized world, who will alone be competent to pass judgment upon this subject, will not stoop to enquire by what party in America this war was declared—by what party it was prosecuted—by what party brought to its termination. No, sir, they will look to the result, and to the result only, and as that result is glorious or inglorious for the country, so will they determine the character of this country and government. Every American, therefore, is interested to bring the war to an honorable termination by all the means in his power. But how is this to be done? I answer, in the spirit and language of perfect simplicity, by endeavoring to create a motive in the enemy to discontinue the contest. But how is this to be effected? I answer in the same spirit and language, by endeavoring to wound him where he is vulnerable. The enemy is vulnerable in two points—in his commerce on the ocean—in his territorial possessions neighboring to us. If by any possibility (which I do not admit) he should succeed so effectually to blockade our ports and harbors as to shut up completely our public and private armed vessels, he will cease to be vulnerable in his commerce; he will remain vulnerable in his territorial possessions only.—There, sir, I would carry the war without hesitation; there I would endeavor to create a motive in him to discontinue the contest. In proportion as he values his territory, in the same proportion will he make sacrifices to preserve it; as you endanger the existence of his territory, in the same degree will be his motive to discontinue the war to preserve it. That he sets a high value on his territories you have the strongest evidence. He has already made great exertions to preserve them; he has been able to preserve them, only because you have not made great efforts to conquer them. You never will conquer them by taking the measure of the Senate. Will any man believe we can induce the enemy to discontinue the war by manning the lines of our frontiers—standing on the defensive—receiving and repelling his blows as well as we can? No, sir—so far from inducing the enemy to abandon the contest, this mode of prosecuting the war would only increase his motive to continue it, whilst the motive on our part to continue it would be daily and hourly increasing. A dishonorable peace would terminate the contest—a surrender of our independence would terminate it—nothing else could. I would therefore carry the war into the enemy's country, and with a force enabling you to wound him there. But the military force of the enemy has been greatly augmented. It is unnecessary to speak of the events by which this augmentation has been brought about—it is sufficient that we know and feel it; ordinary prudence requires that your own military force be augmented; not merely in the same proportion—in a much greater proportion, because, all other things being equal, he has one decided advantage over you—an advantage which we can neither destroy nor remove—I mean the command of the ocean, by which he compels you to stand upon the defensive on a line of frontier of 2000 miles, and to defend that line with 100,000 men against 10,000 afloat. He comes, no man can tell when, no man can tell where; and to be prepared at all, he compels you to be prepared at all points. I say, therefore, your augmentation ought to be in much greater proportion than his augmentation. But what description of our military force will you augment. Sir, if after what has happened, I could for a moment believe there could be any doubt or hesitation upon this point, I would consider every thing as lost; then, indeed, would there be an end of hope and of confidence—then, indeed, would there be nothing before us but gloom and despondency, and the horror of despair.—But you will not doubt—you will place your reliance on a disciplined, regular force—upon a regular disciplined force alone can you rely for success. It matters not whether you determine to conduct the war offensively or defensively; if you determine to prosecute it offensively, you ought to rely mainly on a regular force—because, to be successful, you must meet and beat in the open field, the regular veteran troops of Europe. Not one step can you advance in the conquest of Canada, until you are prepared to do this. This can only be done by regular disciplined troops. If you determine to prosecute the war defensively, you ought to rely mainly on regular troops; for you must expect to meet and to repel regular disciplined troops—and this can be done most effectually with regular disciplined troops. It will be done not only more effectually, but more economically; not only more economically, but more conveniently for the country. It will save the militia of the country, and in saving the militia it will save the active industry of the country—it will save of course the product of that industry; the product of that industry is national wealth—it will save the national wealth. But not only do these considerations urge you, in my humble opinion, to resort to all the means within your power to fill the ranks and augment the regular establishment; other considerations call upon you to make the army as respectable in number as it is already in character—considerations growing out of that character. An army, little better than two years old, collected hastily from the plough, the loom and the work-shops—without discipline, without even the rudiments of the military science—the officer to be instructed, that he might be qualified to instruct the soldier—this army has performed deeds of heroism and of gallant daring, that would have done honor to the best days of Greece and Rome—that will adorn the page of your own history. It is true that this army has not from the beginning every where triumphed; it is true it has not from the beginning carried every thing before it: it had not strength—it had not numbers. But this much may be said of it, and with truth, that from the beginning to this moment, it has in no one instance dishonored the standard which it bore; unless, indeed, a solitary instance may be appealed to as an exception—an instance as yet of doubtful and undecided character. More recently its triumphs have been more brilliant; in the open field, man to man, it has vanquished the conquerors of the conquerors of Europe. Who can hesitate, therefore, (the war continuing) to make this army as respectable in number as it is already in character, to enable it to continue these triumphs. The bill from the Senate, instead of proposing this, proposes to authorize the President to call upon the states for eighty thousand raw militia; and this is to be our reliance for the successful prosecution of the war. Take my word for it, sir, that if you do rely upon it, the military power of the enemy continuing undivided, defeat, disaster and disgrace must follow; as an auxiliary or secondary force the militia may be relied on, as principal in a contest with regular troops, never. But the state of the army. Upon this part of the subject, sir, I will say nothing, because I can say nothing that you are not already in possession of. You have authorized a force of sixty odd thousand men; you have raised thirty odd thousand; you have a deficiency of twenty odd thousand to supply; these thirty odd thousand men already raised are distributed over a line of 4,000 miles of frontier; is it any wonder, then, Mr. Speaker, that Canada has not been conquered. No, sir, the wonder is not that Canada has not been conquered; the wonder is that this little army has been able to keep its ground; the enemy has been stronger in regular troops at all points from the beginning, and the very annunciation of this fact is enough to cover our little army with glory. You have a deficiency of twenty odd thousand to supply; how will you supply it? Assuredly the bill from the Senate will not supply it; will the mode heretofore resorted to supply it. Will the recruiting system supply it? No, sir, the recruiting system has failed; I mean it has failed to fill your ranks.—What are the facts upon this subject; they are, that 2,000,000 of dollars have been applied since January last, and 13,000 men have been enlisted; this it may be said is doing very well. So it is, but what is the general result? The general result is, that our army is very little stronger now, than it was this time last year, and in testing the operation of the system, it is to the general result we must look. At the rate of 13,000 men per annum, it would take five years to raise the authorized force; the recruiting system therefore has failed; it has failed to fill our ranks. I do not mean to say, sir, that the recruiting system, with the present high bounty and encouragement would not eventually fill our ranks;

I am not disposed to say that it would not (provided the power of the enemy had continued broken and divided by the troubles of the continent) have answered our purpose; but I do say, that under existing circumstances, and for our present purpose, the recruiting system ought not to be relied on, it cannot be relied on to fill our ranks by the opening of the next campaign, and to risk the loss of the next campaign is to risk the loss of every thing. But is there no mode to which you can resort for filling the ranks but voluntary enlistment? I would be extremely sorry if we could not. I have always thought this government, when administered in the true spirit of the constitution, the strongest government in the world, even for the purposes of war; but if the doctrine set up of late be true, this is the weakest and most contemptible government on earth, it is neither fit for war or peace, it has failed of all the ends for which governments are established; it cannot be true that this government, charged with the general defence, authorized to declare war and to raise armies can have but one mode of raising armies, whilst every other government that has ever existed has had an absolute power over the population of the country for this purpose, and has actually exercised it; but this question is not properly before the house, and I will not go into an argument to shew that you can, like other governments, resort to other modes of raising armies than that of voluntary enlistment; that you can resort to classification and draft, to classification and penalty, or any other mode which a sound discretion may, in a particular state of the country, dictate and justify. All I intend to say at present is, that you have an absolute power over the population of the country for this purpose, and that in the present state of the country, it is wiser to resort to classification and draft than to resort to the bill from the Senate; the one will give them certainly and expeditiously, the other will not.

But, sir, compare the measures of the Senate with the measures proposed by your own committee and which are before you. The measure of the Senate proposes to authorize the President to call out 80,000 militia for two years, and this is called a remedy for the evil of state—now, sir, the evil of state as I understand it, is not the want of a militia force, but the want of a regular force. The evil of which the country complains, of which the government complains, of which the militia themselves complain most grievously, is the number of militia in service; the incessant harassment, vexation and oppression of the militia, and the extraordinary and burthensome expense of that particular service. As a remedy for this grievance, the Senate proposes to detach 80,000 militia. The President has at command, and has always had at command, a million of militia; and in this extraordinary crisis of our affairs, when pressed by a formidable enemy, and surrounded with difficulties, the remedy proposed by the Senate is 80,000 militia, which it must be admitted on all hands can be no better, for at least the next campaign, than raw militia called out in the ordinary way. But the bill proposes to furnish regular troops.—How? by holding up in terrorem a militia classification and draft. Exempting every three classes which shall furnish two regular soldiers, from the liability to furnish three militia-men. Do the friends of this measure believe—will they with any degree of confidence assert, that it will have the effect, even partially, to fill the ranks? I think not—and suppose it should fail to furnish regular soldiers, what will be our condition in the months of July and August next? Much worse, sir, than our condition in the months of July and August last. The war continuing, the power of the enemy unbroken, our condition will be desperate. The regular force every day falling off, (for be it remembered these 80,000 militia will be withdrawn from the operations of the recruiting service) we shall have to oppose to the enemy a remnant of regular troops, and these 80,000 raw militia—and who will answer for the consequences? In the months of August and September last, we had in the field the regular army and upwards of one hundred thousand militia, and we no where found ourselves too strong. It is true, the Senate proposed to improve the recruiting system—an improvement which two years ago this house proposed to the Senate, but which the Senate then thought proper to reject. I mean the enlistment of young men between the ages of eighteen and twenty-one. But if these 80,000 militia for two years should happen to be, as they are likely to be, that very description of population upon which this system would otherwise operate, what hope can be entertained that the recruiting system even with its improvements will be as productive the next year as the last. I humbly conceive, Mr. Speaker, that the measure of the Senate, proceeding from the best intentions, will fail in the accomplishment of our object. I conceive, with much deference to the House, that the measures reported by their own committee are much to be preferred. They propose, 1st, to augment the regular establishment to one hundred thousand men. 2ndly, to authorize the President to accept under liberal encouragements the services of volunteer corps. 3dly, to authorize the President to receive into the service of the United States, state troops, which may be raised to serve in lieu of the militia in such states. The principle of the system is, to substitute, as far as we are able, a regular force for a militia force, as more efficient, more economical, and, for the militia themselves, more convenient—and 100,000 regulars would take the place of 200,000 militia—200,000 militia would cost as much as 300,000 regulars. If we can command an hundred thousand regular troops, it may notwithstanding be necessary, on particular emergencies, to resort to the militia. To enable the government still further to spare the militia, volunteers are authorized. They will also be more efficient than ordinary militia. It is impossible to say to what extent these corps will offer themselves—to whatever extent the government is enabled to avail itself of their services, to the same extent will the militia be saved. If government should derive no aid from this source, it has another resource in state troops.—They also will take the place of the militia. The militia will still continue the bulwark of the country. Whenever the existence of the country shall be endangered, it is the militia that must save it. The system proposes to relieve them from the constant harassment of which they complain, and justly complain. To raise the regular troops, you have the alternative proposed by the Secretary of War, or the committee. The plan of the Secretary of War is the only effectual one. If we have energy and spirit to take it, it will fill our ranks and augment our regular establishment certainly and expeditiously. The people will justify the measure, because they will feel that it is necessary to the maintenance of the honour, the character and independence of the country. The plan of the committee, though less efficient, is, in my humble opinion, better than that of the Senate. Where it fails to give you men it will give you money. It will be certain to give some men and some money. I hope the House will agree to strike out the section.

House of Representatives.

October 10, 1814.

The President's Message, enclosing the letters from our Commissioners, published in our last] having been read, Mr. Forsyth moved that it be referred to the committee on Foreign Relations, and that 5000 copies be printed for the use of the members.

Mr. Hanson, of Md. moved to amend the resolution by inserting 10,000 copies in the place of 5,000. He said he was persuaded the information communicated in the Message had awakened but one feeling throughout the House, and stamped the same impression on every member. It had always been his opinion that it became not this government to stand on idle frivolous etiquette, but to speak to the enemy, if indeed we desire to convert him to a friend, to speak to him frankly, plainly and directly, to the end that all ground for his doubting our sincerity might be removed. He trusted that it would appear that our Commissioners had been instructed so to speak, and that they had so spoken. If then on fair and honorable terms proposed, England should have denied us peace—if other and new claims had been set up—if she has attempted to annex degrading and humiliating conditions—if she has presumed to trench upon our ascertained rights as hitherto acknowledged and enjoyed—from that moment Mr. H's determination had long since been formed to unite in supporting the most vigorous system of honorable war, with the hope of bringing the enemy to a sense of justice. Mr. H. was satisfied that nothing more was necessary to make the war national, than to convince the people that an honest and fair effort had been made to obtain peace, and it had been denied upon terms mutually honorable. From that moment it ceased to be a party war, and of necessity became national. Mr. H. said he too well knew the party with which it had been his pride and happiness to act, to doubt of their determining to bear a just share of the sacrifices to be incurred in defending the honor of the nation in a war that becomes just.—Forgetting, as far as possible, their objections to the administration—stifling their complaints as far as might be, against the party that supports it, sacrificing all minor considerations, endeavoring to bury in oblivion the numerous wrongs inflicted upon their party; omitting, to every proper extent, a retrospect of the past, and looking to the present and the future, for the purpose of staunching the bleeding wounds of their country, they would stand forth in this her hour of peril, in asserting and maintaining her established rights and honor. But, sir, said Mr. H. while we have ever been ready to sacrifice our political feelings upon the altar of our country, the sacred duty we owe to it will require of us never to cease insisting on a reform in the measures of the government, and the choice of honorable and enlightened men, competent to conduct its affairs in a crisis so awful. Unfortunately for the country, the character of the men who now directed its destinies was not of this description, nor did they possess the confidence of the nation.

Mr. Oakley of N. Y. said that it was not necessary for him on this occasion to reiterate the sentiments of his hon. friend, Mr. Hanson. His friend, he was confident, had expressed the feelings and opinions of those gentlemen with whom he was accustomed to act, on the nature and character of the demands and pretensions of the British government, as developed in the despatches just read to the House. He did not hesitate, in the fullest manner, to declare, that those demands and pretensions were utterly inadmissible under any circumstances. But, Mr. O. said, while he made this declaration, and while he felt, in common with all gentlemen, the conviction that there could be but one sentiment in the nation, as to the necessity of resisting, by all the means in our power, the unjust and arrogant claims of the enemy, he felt bound to remark, that he could never forget by whom and upon what grounds the nation had been involved in this war—upon the issue of which were now staked the essential rights and honor of the country. The character given by the enemy to the war, had put to hazard these rights and that honor, and they must now be vindicated at an incalculable expense of treasure and blood. Mr. O. said it was notorious, that, at the commencement of the war, a great portion of the people of this country thought it rash and unnecessary. If the administration had been willing to make peace on terms which could be expected to unite the approbation of the nation, they must have been prepared to abandon some of the grounds on which it had been declared. Their conduct in the late negotiation could not be properly estimated until the instructions to our commissioners are laid before the House.—This, Mr. O. said he perceived was to be done. It would then appear how far they had thought it important to maintain the grounds on which they had deemed it expedient to commence a war—the conclusion of which was not now within their control, and appeared to be removed to a hopeless distance.

Mr. O. said it was indispensable to the safety of the nation that its affairs at this awful crisis should be committed to the management of men who could reasonably be expected to unite the confidence of the nation—and who, when they had compelled the enemy to abandon his unjust and insulting pretensions, would not throw new obstacles in the way of peace by setting up any unwarrantable claims on our part.—He would tell gentlemen in sober earnestness, that a war, which, to be successful, must be waged by the united means and vigor of the nation, could never be conducted to an honorable issue by a party administration.

Besides the above remarks of Mr. Hanson and Mr. Oakley, which are reported with critical correctness,

A few remarks were made by Mr. Forsyth, of Geo. and Mr. Wright, of Md. the first acquiescing in Mr. Hanson's motion, and the second approving the spirit of the remarks of his colleague, Mr. Hanson.

The motion to print 10,000 was agreed to.

[The following, communicated by a friend at Mobile, was received too late for insertion among the other like sketches; but it is due to the memory of the brave man to whom it relates, that it shall have a place in this SUPPLEMENT.]

BIOGRAPHY

OF THE LATE

LT. COL. JAMES LAUDERDALE,

Of Gen. Coffee's brigade of Tennessee Volunteers,

Who fell in Gen. Jackson's attack on the British army, below New-Orleans, on the night of the 23d of December, 1814.

When a great and good man falls in defence of his country's rights, the memory of his virtues ought not to perish with him. By preserving the recollection of that, we furnish to the living both a motive and a sample for imitation. When to this consideration is added the suggestion of personal friendship for the deceased, no other reason or motive need be offered for delivering to the world a biographical sketch of the late Colonel JAMES LAUDERDALE, who so bravely fell in the memorable battle of Bienvenu, on the night of the 23d of December, 1814.

This distinguished patriot and soldier was a native of Virginia, and the descendant of one of the most ancient and respectable families of that state. Having been bred a surveyor, he was enabled, by the accuracy of his knowledge in that art, and by his industrious habits, to acquire, in a short time, in West Tennessee, whither he had removed with his father's family, a handsome little fortune. Although no man enjoyed, with more sensibility, the pleasures of a social life, yet his ardent and active mind panted for a theatre of higher glory, and more brilliant achievement. At length, in 1803, when a large force was ordered from Tennessee, and the Mississippi territory, to take possession of Louisiana, Col. LAUDERDALE, with that zeal which has ever characterized him, turned out with a company of militia, and marched as far as Natchez by land; when it was discovered, (contrary to expectation) that the ceded territory was peaceably delivered to the commissioners appointed for that purpose, the Tennessee militia were consequently discharged and returned home.

When in 1812, the then Secretary of State ordered Gen. Jackson, with the volunteers from Tennessee, to descend the Mississippi for the defence of the same country against an attempt which was supposed to be meditated by the Spaniards, he was among the first who repaired to his standard. Such was the opinion entertained of his merits that he was appointed first major in the regiment of cavalry under the command of Col. Coffee; and although no opportunity was then afforded him for displaying that gallant spirit for which he afterwards became so distinguished, yet the cheerfulness with which he bore the hardships and privations to which that expedition was so remarkably exposed by the inclemency of the season, and the scarcity of supplies, the encouragement he imparted to his command, and his strict attention to its discipline and instruction, were sufficient evidence to those who accompanied him, of the celebrity he would one day acquire if his country should become involved in war. An opportunity was at length afforded in the declaration of war against the Creeks, for the display of his talents, and for realizing those high hopes which his friends had so justly entertained. The forces by which this insolent and ferocious enemy, who had so long ravaged our frontiers with impunity, was expected to be reduced to submission, were to be drawn principally from Tennessee. In the foremost rank of those who volunteered their services on that important occasion, stood the subject of this article. He was now appointed lieutenant colonel in the brigade of mounted infantry commanded by brigadier general Coffee. It is impossible, and perhaps useless, to particularize the numerous hardships, privations and dangers, to which all who were engaged in that expedition were exposed. The mounted men being sent in advance for the protection of the county of Madison, in the Mississippi Territory, which was hourly expected to be broken in upon and ravaged, were joined on the 12th of October, 1813, at Camp Coffee, by Maj. Gen. Jackson, with the infantry. Gen. Coffee was now ordered to scour the Black Warrior, and fall in with the main army on its march to the Ten Islands, where the principal force of the enemy was expected to be met. In this excursion, attended with innumerable difficulties and privations, Col. Lauderdale received the particular praise of his immediate commander. Having re-united with the main army, Gen. Coffee was again sent in advance to cut off a considerable detachment of the enemy posted at Tallushatchie. This was the first occasion on which colonel Lauderdale had an opportunity of displaying his bravery and his skill as an officer, in battle. His conduct in that successful expedition, merited and received the highest encomiums. In a few days after that fortunate and splendid achievement, the commander in chief received intelligence that the main army of the enemy, advancing to meet him, had invested Talledega, a fort of the friendly part of the Creeks, with a view of wreaking their vengeance on those who had refused to join in hostilities against the whites, and of possessing themselves of the stores it contained. He immediately determined on attacking them before they should be able to effect their purpose; and with this view put his army in motion at midnight of the same day in which he received the intelligence. Having come up to the enemy on the morning of the 9th November, 1813, a general engagement was commenced, and maintained on both sides with the utmost spirit and obstinacy. On that memorable occasion, colonel Lauderdale greatly enhanced the reputation he had already acquired. His bravery and his skill were alike conspicuous; but unfortunately, while at the head of his regiment, encouraging their valor by his example, he received a wound which disabled him from continuing in the field. The fortitude with which he supported the pain of this severe infliction, was remarkable, even among soldiers. The most excruciating agonies were not sufficient to disturb the habitual cheerfulness of his temper, and he seemed only to lament his misfortune as depriving him of still further opportunities to distinguish himself.

After the battle of Talledega, the want of supplies compelled the commander in chief to return to his encampment at the Ten Islands. The same cause, combined with the excitement of a few turbulent and disappointed officers, continuing to operate, produced the utmost disquietude in the army, and a strong inclination to abandon an expedition which had thus far so gloriously proceeded.—To so high a degree, indeed, had this spirit been fomented by the factious and designing, that it broke out on several occasions, into open and extensive mutiny; and nothing but the energy of the commanding general could have arrested its progress, and prevented the most fatal calamities.—During this critical situation of affairs, Col. Lauderdale, though confined to his tent by his wound, continued to display, perhaps in a higher degree than he had ever before had an opportunity to do, his patriotism and his firmness. While every means in his power was used to bring back the deluded soldiery to a sense of their duty, those who had led them astray found in him the exposé of their hidden machinations, and the sternest opposer of their views. Many of these had been his closest friends, and several of them were his near relatives; but idolizing his country, he was ever ready, when occasion required it, to offer up friends, relatives, even life itself, on her altar.—Never were his feelings observed to undergo so severe a shock, as when he received the intelligence that his regiment, led by the colonel commandant, who was his friend and relation, had abandoned its post, and was returning home. He lifted up his hands and exclaimed, "Would to God the ball which confines me had passed through my head, that I might not have lived to witness the dishonor of my countrymen and friends."

Scarcely had the campaign against the Creeks been brought to a successful termination, when the sons of Tennessee were again called upon to enter into a war of more extensive and dangerous character. Great Britain, disengaged from her struggles on the continent, was left with the means of prosecuting the war against America on a broader scale. Determining to avail herself of the opportunity, a formidable expedition was planned against the southern section of the union, made up principally of the veterans of Lord Wellington. Our government, coming at length to appreciate correctly the military talents of general Jackson, appointed him to the command of the 7th district, and charged him with its defence. It was to be expected that this able officer, who was so well acquainted with the genius and accomplishments of

Gen. Coffee, and who had so often witnessed and directed the bravery of his brigade, should at such a crisis be exceedingly desirous of their services. His invitation was obeyed with so much alacrity and promptitude, that by the time it was known in Orleans that an army was assembling in Tennessee for its defence, general Coffee had reached the head-quarters of the commander in chief at Mobile. Col. Lauderdale, though still suffering under his wounds, was again foremost in tendering his services. Being appointed to the command of a regiment, he continued to display all the qualities of an able officer, and an ardent patriot on the expedition to Pensacola. The feelings which so warmly animated his own bosom, he possessed the happy faculty of imparting to his followers.

The enemy being expelled from Pensacola, the commander in chief immediately determined on placing as much of his disposable force as could be spared from the defence of the frontiers, and of the posts on Mobile, in a situation to protect New-Orleans against the designs which he foresaw the enemy meditated against that important place. With this view a part of general Coffee's brigade, in which was included the regiment of colonel Lauderdale, was ordered to Baton Rouge, there to recruit their horses, and be in readiness to march to whatever point might become the most exposed.—It was not long before a large force of the enemy was discovered to have entered Lake Borgne, and to be advancing towards New-Orleans. To this point, therefore, the commander in chief now directed the forces stationed at Baton Rouge, to hasten with the utmost dispatch. The order was executed with that promptitude which has ever distinguished the movements of Gen. Coffee. In two days after receiving it, he had reached the neighborhood of the city, a distance of one hundred and twenty miles. Never was a forced march more necessary or attended with more important effects. But for that, New-Orleans must have fallen into the hands of the enemy.

Scarcely had this reinforcement thus fortunately arrived when the commander in chief received intelligence that the enemy had succeeded in entering the Bayou Benvenu, undiscovered, and in debarking a considerable part of his forces with which he had advanced to the high lands on the Mississippi, and occupied a position not more than seven miles below the city. Things were now approaching their crisis. Gen. Jackson, foreseeing the danger of suffering the enemy to attack him, determined to become the assailant himself. To execute this bold and hazardous, but wise measure, his eyes were immediately turned to that distinguished corps whose bravery had been so well tried. Every disposition being made for bringing on the engagement that night, the left of Gen. Coffee's brigade was confided to the charge of Col. Lauderdale. The action had already been commenced by Gen. Jackson with the regular troops and the artillery on the extreme right, and the fire was extended to the left, when the right of Gen. Coffee's brigade came in contact with the enemy. This gallant body of men poured upon him so destructive a fire, that his advancing line was instantly halted, although under cover of a fence. At this moment, Col. Lauderdale on the left, was seen animating his men, and in the most gallant manner, leading them into action. But a few rounds had been fired when he received a musket ball in the head which immediately terminated his life. This fatal event produced a momentary confusion in the line, and the enemy now began to advance; but recovering their spirits the followers of the fallen hero soon avenged his death. The enemy was compelled to retreat; when the smoke of so incessant a fire, and a thick fog which arose, obliged the commanding general to draw off his forces.

Colonel Lauderdale was found on the field of battle, with his sword firmly grasped; thus evincing in the agonies of death, that determined courage which had marked the whole course of his life.

No person possessed in a higher degree the confidence and esteem of his commanding general, or of his brother officers. Richly had he merited that confidence and that esteem. No officer was ever more correct in his deportment, or more assiduous and faithful in the performance of all the duties which devolved upon him. Positive and firm in his character, he had introduced into his regiment the strictest subordination; but while he enforced obedience, so impartial was his conduct and so tempered with mildness, that even those who incurred punishment were compelled to approve the sentence under which they suffered. Beloved by all, the whole army mourn his loss as that of a brother.

In private life the worth of Col. Lauderdale was not less conspicuous than in the tented field.—Known to possess the most inflexible integrity, "vice and crime" were confounded in his presence.

Never was man more open and ingenuous. Of him it might truly be said, "he carried his heart in hand, and those who ran might read it."

Humanity and charity were active and discriminating principles in his nature, not consisting in tears, or professions, nor confounding the afflictions of the deserving and the undeserving, but extending substantial relief to those sufferings which crime had not produced.

Of the social circle, Col. Lauderdale was the delight and the ornament. Ever cheerful himself, he diffused the same happy spirit all around him.

Having been buried on the battle ground, it was an early care of the commanding general, after the enemy was driven from our shore, to have his remains taken up and interred with the honors of war, in the Protestant burying ground in the city. His brethren in arms, as a monument of their respect for his virtues, intend to erect a marble tomb to his memory, with a suitable inscription.

Col. Lauderdale has left an aged and virtuous mother, and extensive and respectable connexions to mourn the loss of their dearest friend.

Over his grave the green sod will flourish, watered by the tears of his companions in arms; and the patriot soldier, when he recounts the toils and perils of battle, will have a sigh to the memory of Lauderdale.

A SOLDIER AND FRIEND.

Important Law Case.

CIRCUIT COURT UNITED STATES.

Pennsylvania District, 2
April, 1814 3

GOLDEN vs. PRINCE.

This cause came before the Court upon a case stated, the material parts of which are set forth, by the Judge in his opinion.—It was argued by Shoemaker for the plaintiff, and by Ingersoll, Rawle and J. R. Ingersoll, for the defendant.—After holding it under advisement for some days, the following opinion was delivered by Judge Washington-Judge Peters not having been present at the argument, took no part in the decision.

Washington Judge.—This is an action brought upon a bill of exchange drawn by the defendant on the 10th of May 1811, at the island of St. Bartholemews for value received there, in favour of the plaintiff on himself at Philadelphia, 90 days after sight, which was regularly noted for non-acceptance, and protested for non-payment. This action was brought on the 4th of May 1812, to which the defendant pleaded in bar, his discharge under a law of this state, passed on the 13th of March 1812, for the relief of insolvent debtors, obtained provisionally on the 23d of April, and finally on the 29th of May, 1812. The case agreed states, that the defendant did not give to the plaintiff, or to any agent of his, notice of the defendant's petition, which was presented on the 20th of April 1812, although the plaintiff's attorney was informed of the application, a few days after it was made; nor has the plaintiff proved his debt, under the said proceedings.

The act referred to in the plea, declares that a debtor who has conformed to the several regulations of the law, for the purpose of vesting all his property in the assignees for the benefit of his creditors, and who has received his certificate of discharge from the commissioners, shall be set at large by the sheriff, if he be imprisoned; and that such certificate shall be conclusive evidence of the fact, that such petitioner has been discharged by virtue of that act, and shall be construed to discharge such insolvent, from all debts and demands due from him, or for which he was liable, at the date of such certificate, or contracted, or originating before that time, though payable afterwards.

It is objected to this plea, 1st, That the act under which the discharge is claimed, having been passed since the year 1789, affords no binding rule of decision for this court. 2dly, That the law is unconstitutional and void, in two respects: 1st, as being a bankrupt law, and 2dly, as being a law impairing the obligation of contracts.

The ground of the first objection is, that the 34th section of the judicial act of Congress, passed on the 24th Sept. 1789, which declares, that the laws of the several states, except where the constitution, treaties or statutes of the U. States, shall otherwise require or provide, shall be regarded as rules of decision in trials at common law, in the courts of the United States, in cases where they apply, extends only to such laws of the several states, as were in force at the time when this law was passed. Admitting this position to be correct, it would not follow, that this law would not on that account have a binding force, or furnish a rule of decision in this case.

The laws even of foreign countries where a contract is made, are by the comity of nations, regarded every where as a rule of decision, in relation to that contract, and it would be strange if the laws of one state in which a contract was made, should be disregarded in any other state of the union as a rule of decision. In like manner the laws of a country, which operate to discharge a contract made in the same country, are regarded and enforced by foreign courts. This doctrine was very fully examined in this court, in the case of Camfranke vs. Brunelle, upon a question of bail. Independent therefore, of the act of congress, if a contract made in this state, or with a view to its laws, be discharged under a law of this state, against which no constitutional objection can be made—such laws would be regarded as rules of decision by this court, as well, that which discharged the obligation, as that under which it was created. It was denied by the counsel for the plaintiff, that the contract in this case, had a view to its execution, according to the laws of Pennsylvania; but nothing can be more clear, than that the bill in question amounted to a promise made by the defendant, to pay the sum mentioned in it, in the city of Philadelphia, 90 days after sight. Payment could have been demanded no where but in Philadelphia, in order to enable the plaintiff to recover. The bill in this case, is precisely like that in the case of Robinson and Bland, 2nd Burr, and is consequently within the principles laid down in that case.

These principles would be sufficient for the decision of this part of the case, without resorting to the act of congress, which has been mentioned; but as other cases may occur where the general rule admitted by the comity of nations, may not entirely apply, and as there appears to me, to be no difficulty in giving a construction to the 34th section of this act; it may not be improper, to take this opportunity of doing it. It is to be remarked, in the first place, that the words of this section are general, so as to include as well the laws of the respective states, which might thereafter be passed, as those which were then in existence. The reason for construing this section prospectively, as well as in reference to the time when this law was enacted is equally strong.

The powers bestowed by the constitution, upon the government of the United States, were limited in their extent, and were not intended, nor can they be construed to interfere with other powers before vested in the state governments, which were of course reserved to these governments impliedly, as well as by an express provision of the constitution. The state governments, therefore, retained the right to make such laws as they might think proper, within the ordinary functions of legislation, if not inconsistent with the powers vested exclusively in the government of the United States, and not forbidden by some article of the constitution of the U. States, or of the state; and such laws were obligatory upon all the citizens of that state, as well as others, who might claim rights, or redress for injuries, under those laws, or in the courts of that state. The establishment of federal courts, and the jurisdiction granted to them in certain specified cases, could not consistently with the spirit and provisions of the constitution, impair any of the obligations thus imposed by the laws of the state, by setting up in those courts, a rule of decision at variance, with that which was binding upon the citizens, and which they were bound to obey. Thus the laws of a state affecting contracts, regulating the disposition and transmission of property, real or personal, and a variety of others, which in themselves are free from all constitutional objections, are equally valid and obligatory within the state since the adoption of the constitution of the United States, as they were before. They provide rules of civil conduct for every individual, who is subject to their power, in all their relations to society, and, consequently, cannot in cases where they apply, cease to be rules, by which the conduct of those individuals is to be decided, when brought under judicial examination, whether the decision is to be made in a federal or state court.

The injustice as well as the absurdity of the former deciding by one rule, and the latter by another, would be too monstrous to find a place in any system of government. Thus for example, if the laws of a state which regulated the distribution, or transmission of property in the year 1789, should afterwards be totally varied by a subsequent law, the latter only would be the rule, by which property could be distributed or transmitted, from the time the law came into operation; and it can never be seriously contended that a person interested in this property, and from the adventitious circumstance of his residence in another state, entitled to make his claim either in the federal or state court, should recover more by resorting to the former, than he would have recovered, had he applied to the latter court.

With respect to the rules of practice for transacting the business of the courts, a different principle prevails. These rules form the law of the court, and is in relation to the federal courts, a law arising under the constitution of the United States, and consequently not subject to state regulations. It is in reference to this principle, that the 17th section of the same judicial act, authorizes the courts of the United States, to make all necessary rules, for the orderly conducting business in the said courts, provided the same are not repugnant to the laws of the U. States; and under this power, the different circuit courts at their first sessions, adopted the state practice as it then existed, which continues to this day, I believe, in all the states, except so far as the courts have thought proper from time to time, to alter and amend it.

Indeed the counsel for the plaintiff in this case seemed to admit the distinction, between general laws affecting rights, and those which relate to the practice of the courts; but still he contended that the act of assembly in question afforded no rule of decision for this court, and could not be pleaded in bar of the action, because it was enacted since the year 1789. Now it is most clear, that a law which discharges a contract, is no more a law of practice than one under the sanction of which the contract was made. If it would bar the action in a state court, it would equally do so in a federal court—although the particular mode of setting up the bar, might depend upon the practice and rules imposed by the state law upon the former courts, and those which the latter may have thought proper to adopt.

The next question is, whether the law relied upon by the defendant, to bar the present action, is repugnant to the constitution of the United States, and on that account is not to be regarded by the court in this case. I shall reverse the order pursued by the counsel, and consider, in the first place, whether this law is repugnant to the constitution, upon the ground of its impairing the obligation of contracts.

It may be proper to premise, that a law may be unconstitutional, and of course void in relation to particular cases, and yet valid to all intents and purposes, in its application to other cases within the scope of its provisions, but varying from the former in particular circumstances. Thus a law prospective in its operations, under which a contract afterwards made, may be avoided in a way different from that provided by the parties, would be clearly constitutional; because the stipulations of the parties which are inconsistent with such law, never had a legal existence, and of course could not be impaired by the law. But if the law act retrospectively as to other contracts, so as to impair their obligation, the law is invalid, or in milder terms, affords no rule of decision in these latter cases.

The question then is, Whether a law of a state which declares that a debtor by delivering up his estate for the benefit of his creditors, shall be forever discharged from the payment of his debts due or contracted before the passage of the law, whether the creditor do any act or not in aid of the law, can be set up to bar the right of such creditor to recover his debt, either in a federal or state court. I feel no difficulty in saying that it cannot, because the law is in its nature and operation one which in the case supposed, impairs the obligation of a contract.

What is the obligation of a contract? It is to do, or not to do a certain thing; and this may be either absolutely or under some condition, immediately or at some future time or times, and at some specified place. A law, therefore, which authorizes the discharge of a contract by a smaller sum, or in a different manner, than the parties have stipulated, impairs its obligation, by substituting for the contract of the parties, one which they never entered into, and to the performance of which they of course had never consented. The old contract is completely annulled, and a legislative contract imposed upon the parties in lieu of it. That a law which declares an existing contract to be void, impairs its obligation, will, I presume, be admitted by all men who can understand the force of the plainest terms; or if not so, then I should be curious to know in what manner the obligation of a contract can be impaired? And if this be the effect of such a law, in what respect does it differ from another which declares that a debt consisting of a specified sum, and due at an appointed period of time, shall be discharged at a more distant or indeed at a different time, or with a smaller sum? The degree of injury to the creditor, may be not so great in the one case as in the other, but the principle is precisely the same. That the framers of the constitution were extremely jealous of the exercise of such a power by the state governments, is apparent from other parts of the section, in which the provision I am examining is found. It would have been a vain thing to prohibit the state governments from passing laws, by which a contract might be annulled or discharged, by the payment of a less sum than it stipulated, if they could emit bills of credit, and make them, or any thing but gold and silver coin, a tender in payment of debts; and therefore they are expressly prohibited from passing any laws, which might produce such a consequence. And yet a law which should make a depreciated paper currency, a tender in payment of debts, might be infinitely less injurious to the creditor than one which discharges the debt altogether, upon the payment of perhaps a shilling in the pound, or any other sum less than that stipulated to be paid.

The opinion given upon this last point, decides the cause in favour of the plaintiff, and I might well spare myself the trouble of examining the other objection, made by the plaintiff's counsel, to the validity of this law. But when I observe from the case under consideration, that such a power is deemed by one state at least, to be rightfully vested in the state legislatures, for otherwise I must suppose it would not have been exercised, and when I recollect that the constitution of the United States contains a grant of other powers to the general government, which may equally with that immediately under consideration, be exercised by the state legislatures, if such a right exists in either case, I hold it to be my duty to embrace the first opportunity which presents itself, to express the unhesitating opinion, which I entertain upon these great questions, and thus to pave the way for as early a decision of them as possible, by the Supreme National Court.

No citizen feels a higher respect than I do for the state governments, or would be more cautious in questioning the validity of any laws which their legislatures might think proper to enact. But I should very unfaithfully discharge my duty were I to remain a silent witness of designed or unintentional usurpations by those governments, of powers properly belonging to the general government, when a case comes judicially before me, which demands an expression of my opinion upon those subjects. The sooner the limits which separate the two governments are marked by those authorities which can alone define and establish them, the less danger there will be of serious if not fatal contestations hereafter arising respecting essential powers to which a prescriptive right may be asserted by the one in opposition to the chartered rights of the other. It is from these considerations that I venture respectfully, yet firmly, to examine the question, whether the power given to Congress to pass uniform laws of bankruptcy, be exclusive of such power in the state governments, and whether the latter may exercise it whenever the former has not thought proper to do so.

It would seem at the first view of this question, that if an unqualified power be granted to a government to do a particular act, the whole of that power is disposed of, and not a part of it; consequently that no power over the same subject remains with those who made the grant, either to exercise themselves, or to part with it to any other government.

But if the application of this principle to the complicated systems of government which prevail in the United States, should be liable to doubt, it will, I presume, be admitted with this qualification, that whenever such a power is given to the general government, the exercise of which by the state governments would be inconsistent with the express grant, the whole of the power is granted, and consequently vests exclusively in the general government.—In such a case the people resume the powers which before resided in the state governments; as to this subject, without which they could not grant the whole to the general government; and if resumed it would seem to follow that the state governments can in no event exercise the same powers without shewing either an express grant of it, or that it is fairly to be deduced from the circumstance upon which the claim is founded.

That the exercise of the power to pass bankrupt and naturalization laws by the state governments is incompatible with the grant of a power to Congress to pass uniform laws on the same subjects, is obvious from the consideration that the former would be dissimilar and frequently contradictory, whereas the systems are directed to be uniform, which can only be rendered so by the exclusive power in one body to form them.

It was admitted in the argument of this cause, that whenever Congress shall think proper to exercise the power delegated to that body, to pass uniform laws of bankruptcy, the state governments cannot legislate upon the same subject. But it was contended, that if Congress shall decline to exercise the power, the right to pass bankrupt laws results to the state governments. This conclusion appears to me to beg the whole question in controversy. It resigns all claim to a concurrent right in the state governments, and sets up one which is to arise on a condition, not to be found in the constitution, but which is gratuitously interpolated into it.

If then this claim of the state legislature is not founded upon any express grant made to them in the constitution, is it to be deduced from the circumstance of a non user of the power of Congress? This doctrine appears to me as extravagant as it is novel. It has no analogy that I know of, in legal or political science. It must in some way or other be likened to the case of forfeiture, which could not as I conceive, answer the purpose, because if the power of Congress is, upon principles purely legal, de vested by an omission to exercise a valid right, it would not of necessity result to the state governments, but would more naturally fall to the people. If the forfeiture be political, then this absurdity would follow, that Congress would possess a right to do by omission, what it must be admitted they would not effect by any direct and positive act. That is, to delegate to the state governments, the power of legislation over a particular subject, of which the people had thought proper not only to deprive the state governments, but to vest exclusively in the national legislature. The inconvenience of dissimilar and discordant rules upon the subjects of bankruptcy and of naturalization, no doubt suggested to the framers of the constitution the remedy which that body adopted, of vesting the right to legislate in those cases in the general government, that some uniform system might prevail throughout the United States, if Congress should think that any regulations upon these subjects ought at all to be made. Now it would not only violate the express grant of these powers to Congress, but the policy which led the convention to withdraw them from the state governments, if they should be construed to result by implication to the latter, on account of the omission of the former to exercise them. But let us examine into the reasonableness of this pretension of the state legislatures, and see if the policy which induced the grant of these powers to Congress, be not effectually answered by the omission of Congress to legislate on those subjects, as much so as if they had. Suppose then the subject of a bankrupt law to be brought before Congress, and the questions to be whether such a system be a wise one under any circumstances, or be at all suitable to the present state of the country, and that body should in its wisdom decide negatively on those questions. It would seem to follow that no bankrupt law ought to exist in the United States for the reasons which induced the rejection of any plan to establish such a system. In this case what is Congress to do in order to give effect to this measure of policy? The answer is plain, reject the bill and do nothing. Then the law of the land would be that no man is compelled against his will to deliver up his property to be distributed amongst his creditors, and consequently that he is at all times liable to the payment of his debts unless discharged by some other legal means. Nor will it be said that the state legislatures availing themselves of the silence of Congress on this subject, can be at liberty to thwart the very policy which induced it, and pass laws upon the subject not only changing the state of the law as Congress had constitutionally left it, but impugning the policy which led the convention to deprive the state legislatures of the power altogether; by imposing upon the country at large a variety of systems, instead of one uniform system? To argue, that to prevent such an absurd consequence, Congress must legislate upon the subject, is to assert that in the exercise of a power intended to promote the general good, Congress must do some act which in its wisdom it believes will produce a public evil—Do wrong that good may come of it—a doctrine as pernicious in politics as it is wicked in morals. How would state laws upon this subject and in the case supposed, differ otherwise than in degree, from similar laws passed, inconsistent with such as Congress might think proper to enact upon the same subject? In the one case the policy and the law of Congress might be opposed in part only by the state law. But in the other, the whole policy and law is defeated by inconsistent rules upon a subject, where Congress supposed that it was unwise to establish even a uniform rule.

The subject of naturalization is strongly illustrative of the principles which this course of reasoning is intended to prove. The power to pass laws upon this subject is found in the same section, and is expressed in words of the same import with that respecting bankruptcies. Now suppose Congress deliberating whether the naturalization of foreigners ought upon any, or upon what terms to be allowed.—That the consultation of that body should end in the conviction, that the natural population is most conducive to the public interest, and therefore that no encouragement ought to be given to the migration of foreigners to the United States. In what manner is this policy to be rendered effectual? Congress cannot for the purpose of preventing the state legislatures from interfering in this business, pass a negative law, declaring that foreigners shall not be naturalized, because if the constitution forbids the exercise of such a power by the state legislatures, such a law would be worse than unnecessary; and if it does not forbid it, then it would be void. Nothing then remains for that body, but as in the former case, to do nothing.

This then, according to the argument on the part of the defendant is to be the signal for the state legislatures to commence their operations. Virginia, for example, is of opinion that for the purpose of settling her extensive waste and uncultivated lands, the migration of foreigners to that state ought by every means to be encouraged, and in order to favour this policy, she declares that the residence of a year or a month without any other restriction whatever, shall be sufficient to entitle all foreigners to the right of naturalization in that state? They are accordingly made citizens, and after the constitutional period, are chosen to represent that state in the national legislature, and emigrating to the other states, they claim all the privileges of natural born citizens of those states.

The other states might well complain, that although the people had declared their willingness to admit foreigners to the privileges of natural born citizens, provided the regulations under which this admission is granted were formed by the united wisdom of the representatives of all the states, but that they had never granted to one state the right of legislation over the other states. They might contend that the introduction of foreigners to the electoral franchise, and still more into the national legislature, was an experiment dangerous to the tranquility and the welfare of the nation; that they might be tainted with principles unfriendly to our republican institutions, and with foreign attachments, wholly incompatible with their duties as citizens and legislators; that if admitted at all, they should not only abjure all allegiance to any other government, and if of the order of nobility, renounce all claim to the same, but that they ought to be men of good moral character, and attached to the constitution of the United States: and finally, that the grant of this privilege should be preceded by a probationary residence in the United States for a length of time sufficient to afford the necessary proof of the reality of these qualifications in the applicant.

To these complaints what could reason oppose? Nothing—She must be silent. And is this then a case where powers not expressly given by the constitution are to be assumed by construction and implication? It certainly will not be contended, that the powers to pass bankrupt and naturalization laws are by the amendments to the constitution reserved to the states, in cases where they are exercised by Congress, because this reservation is made only of such powers as are not granted to the general government—if granted, it would seem to follow that they are not reserved to the states or to the people.

But it is not in my opinion correct to say, that Congress by refusing to pass laws on those subjects, has not exercised the powers confided to that body by the constitution in relation thereto. The refusal amounts to a declaration of the public will, that such laws are unwise, and ought not to exist. And yet upon the argument in favor of state pretensions, this monstrous doctrine must be maintained, that one or more states may pass laws not only in opposition to the policy and legislative will of the general government, but to the laws of the other states, enacted upon the same subjects, which to a certain extent, they partially repeal: a doctrine leading to such absurd and dangerous consequences ought to have something more solid to stand upon, than a constructive grant of power.

I am, upon the whole, of opinion, that the law under which the certificate is pleaded in bar of the action is altogether unconstitutional for the reason last assigned, and is so in reference to this debt for the first reason.

I desire, that it may be distinctly understood, that I do not mean to give any opinion on the subject of insolvent laws, acts of limitation, and the like; because they are not now before me; and sufficient to the day will be the evil thereof. I have introduced the subject of laws of naturalization, because I find that subject in all respects, precisely like that which is particularly involved in this cause.

Forgery Legalized.

The following case, extracted from the first Volume of Espinasse's Nisi Prius cases, is interesting to the American people, as evincing the ideas of morality entertained by the British government. What must be thought of a government professing a rigid adherence to the Laws of Nations, when the highest legal functionary of the government can proclaim in open court, that in this infamous transaction he sees nothing contrary to the Laws of Nations or of good faith? May we not apprehend that the noted Stephen Burroughs has already been engaged by that government, to inundate the country with forged paper through Castine? In the Dictionary of the British Government, it would seem that dolus meant forgery, and virtus, conflagration, rape, and robbery.

SHONGITHARM VS. LUKYN.

Case on a promissory note—The note was drawn by the defendant, payable to one Calson, and by Calson endorsed to the plaintiff. The plaintiff proved the defendant's hand writing,—the endorsement by Calson.

Erskine for the defendant, stated his defence to be, that Lukyn was a stationer, and the plaintiff an engraver; and that the note upon which the action was brought was given to Calson for the purpose of paying the plaintiff for the engraving of copper plates, upon which French assignats were to be forged, and contended that, as the consideration of the note was fraud, that it contaminated the whole transaction, and rendered the note not recoverable by law.

Calson, the endorser, was called as the witness. He proved that Lukyn, the defendant, having it in contemplation to strike off impressions of a considerable quantity of assignats to be issued abroad, had applied to him for the purpose of recommending an engraver for the purpose of engraving the necessary plates, and that Lukyn represented to him that they were for the Duke of York's army.

He said that they applied to Shongitharm, the plaintiff, who at first declined the business totally; but that being assured by the witness that it was sanctioned by the government, and was for the use of the Duke of York's army, he then consented. The witness further denied, that it ever was communicated to the plaintiff, that they were to be circulated for any purpose than he had represented.

Lord Kenyon said, that if the present transaction was grounded on a fraud, or contrary to the laws of nations or of good faith, he should have held the notes to be void; but that it did not appear that there was any fraud in the case; or any violation of positive law. Whether the issuing of these assignats for the purpose of distressing the enemy was lawful in carrying on the war, he was not prepared to say; or whether it came within the rule an dolus an virtus quis in hoste requirit? But let that be as it might, it did not apply to the present case. It was not in evidence that the plaintiff was a party in any fraud, or that it was ever communicated to him that the assignats were to be issued for any improper purpose. On the contrary, he supposed that they were circulated by the authority of the higher powers of this country, and therefore did not question the propriety or legality of the measure.

His Lordship declared his opinion to be, that the consideration was not impeached, and that the plaintiff was entitled to recover.

The Jury found a verdict for the plaintiff.

Important Report on Medical Science.

The following able and interesting report was unanimously agreed to by the Senate of this state, on Tuesday, the 11th instant. It thus appears that the recent attempts made for organizing another Medical School in New-York, in opposition to the acts of the Legislature and the regents of the university, have completely failed of success. Facts justify the assertion, that, in the means of instruction, the College of Physicians and Surgeons, of that city is second to no similar institution in the United States, and that this school of medicine is eminently deserving of the support of an enlightened Legislature.

Albany Argus.

Mr. Cochran, from the committee to whom was referred the bill, entitled "an act to incorporate the trustees of the Medical Institution of the state of New-York," reported,

That the preamble to the bill states, "that Archibald Bruce and others have been for several years associated for the purpose of giving instruction in all the branches of medical science, and have, for that purpose, selected skilful lecturers, and provided a suitable building, together with chemical and philosophical apparatus, anatomical preparations, and other things necessary to accomplish the end they have in view; and, therefore, pray to be incorporated."

The objects stated in the preamble, to be carried into effect by the provisions of the bill, are undoubtedly laudable; and if the attainment of them by the means proposed, were not inconsistent with that general system of education adopted by our laws and the interests of established institutions, your committee could see no objection to the bill which they have had under consideration.

The various laws which have been passed since the revolutionary war, to promote the diffusion of literature and science throughout the state, while they disclose difficulties, evince at the same time, the strong solicitude which our legislature have always felt on the subject. Without a particular reference to these acts, it will only be necessary for the present, in order to form a more correct opinion of the matter submitted to your committee, to give a short history of the origin and progress of the medical institutions in this state.

In the year 1792, the board of trustees of Columbia College, organized a medical faculty, connected with the College, and professors of distinguished talents were appointed to deliver lectures on the different branches of medicine. Though the annexation of such a faculty deserved commendation, yet, for causes not necessary to mention here, the benefits arising from it were very limited—only thirty-four students since its creation to the year 1814, had completed their courses of study, and received the medical honors of the institution.

By an act, passed as early as the year 1791, power was given to the regents of the university of the state, to establish a college of physicians and surgeons within the state. Believing that only one medical institution in the city of New-York, with power to confer degrees sanctioned by authority, and conducted with ability and attention, would best promote the advancement of medical science, the regents were unwilling to exercise the power vested in them by said act. Considerations of expediency, however, affecting the interests of science, as well as other interests arising from causes not implicating the distinguished gentlemen filling the different professorships in this medical school, determined that honorable body on the 12th of March 1807, to grant a charter, establishing the present college of physicians and surgeons of the city of New-York. The incorporation of this institution, under the patronage of the regents, and its sanction by the legislature, gave very general satisfaction, and the benefits which have resulted from it during the period of its existence, are to be seen in the annual reports to the regents of the university. Its successful progress was, however, for a short time retarded by feuds and discontents among the professional members of the institution, and of others, arising principally from competition and rivalry between medical schools in the same city, whose objects were the same. It was therefore deemed advisable by the regents, to whom representations of these disorders had been made, to re-model the college of physicians, and this was accordingly done on the first of April 1811, ingrafting alterations upon their character, principally with a view to their union with the medical faculty of Columbia College. This union was finally and happily effected at the last session of the regents, in 1814, and to the satisfaction of all concerned; and the United School now combines the most eminent medical talents in the state in one splendid seminary, under the general superintendence of the honorable the regents, aided by the patronage and liberal endowments of the legislature.

It is not now deemed necessary to state particularly any additional facts with regard to the medical college of New-York. How extensive is the system of medical education which it embraces, will be fully understood when the committee make it known that complete courses of instruction are provided for in the College of Physicians and Surgeons in the city of New-York, on anatomy, surgery and physiology; on the theory and practice of physic and clinical medicine; on chymistry; on materia medica; on the principles and practice of surgery; on the clinical practice of medicine; on midwifery and the diseases of women and children; on natural history; on medical jurisprudence; and on natural philosophy, by able professors appointed for the purpose.

After perceiving so many difficulties and so many impediments to harmony, at length removed by the united efforts and exertions of the regents of the university, and of some eminent professional gentlemen, connected with the then medical institutions in the city of New-York, that your committee should countenance the application before them, would be to renew the like misunderstandings and the like dissensions, which have hitherto prevailed, much to the injury of medical science.

It is of some importance to take into view, on this occasion, the well digested plans contained in our laws, so admirably calculated to promote useful knowledge in the various departments of science.

The act constituting the regents of the university of the state, gives to that body the right at discretion, under its particular provisions to incorporate colleges and other seminaries of learning, and a superintending power over them. Being enabled to hold property, real and personal, to the amount of the annual income of 40,000 bushels of wheat, and possessing no inconsiderable funds from the liberality and munificence of the state, its judicious distribution from time to time, among the academies in the different counties, is evidenced by the success which has attended it in the present flourishing state of learning. As a part of this excellent system, the committee recognize the law incorporating medical societies in each county, for the purpose of regulating the practice of physic and surgery. In all this is seen the efforts of the best men and the most enlightened legislators of our country. It has been the work of time, and in the result of much experience.

To incorporate, therefore, by special acts of the legislature, seminaries of learning, upon the application of private associations, and particularly another medical institution in the city of New-York, would in the opinion of your committee, by such innovations upon this admirable structure, totally derange, if not break down some of our most useful and settled literary establishments. Your committee are therefore of opinion that the bill ought to be rejected.

To the Legislature of Virginia.

The memorial and petition of the Religious Society of Friends (commonly called Quakers.)

Respectfully Show,

That your memorialists, estimating the high regard with which the legislature will be disposed to consider every subject affecting the great principles of civil or religious liberty, beg leave to solicit your attention to the militia laws of this commonwealth, and to the incompatibility which sometimes results between the requisitions of the law, and the obligations of religious duty.

In this enlightened age and country, and before this legislature, your memorialists conceive it unnecessary to urge the unalienable rights of conscience, or to adduce any arguments to show, that the relations between man and his creator, neither can nor ought to be prescribed or controlled, by any human authority. It is unnecessary, because the proposition is self-evident, and especially because it is one of the fundamental principles, upon which the civil and political institutions of this country are established. This principle is recognized in the bill of rights; it is confirmed by the law of 1795, passed in the enlightened and liberal spirit of that instrument; and the state itself, by its convention which ratified the federal constitution expressly declared, that "the liberty of conscience cannot be cancelled, abridged, restrained, or modified by any authority of the United States." The free exercise of religion, therefore, is not merely tolerated; it is declared in the most solemn form, it is confirmed in the most explicit manner.

But the liberty of conscience, your memorialists conceive, cannot be restricted to the mere liberty of thinking or to the silent and unseen modifications of religious opinion. Religion has duties to be performed; and it points out offences to be avoided; its free exercise must therefore consist in an active compliance with its dictates, enforced by no legal compulsion, or restrained by no legal impediment.

Your memorialists, in common with every virtuous citizen, would disclaim any exemption, under the colour of religious liberty, from the universal obligations of moral duty. But the law of 1785, in making "overt acts" of an injurious nature, the limit of the privilege, and the criterion of the abuse, removes all danger to the community. Any encroachment on the rights of others, or violation of the moral law, under pretence of liberty of conscience, would immediately betray its own guilt and hypocrisy, and afford a legitimate cause for the interposition of the civil authority.

These considerations are suggested, as applicable to the case, which is now submitted to the wisdom and justice of the legislature.

Your memorialists are Christians; and impressed with the firm conviction that war is forbidden under the gospel, they cannot bear arms. To require it under legal penalties, is then to reduce them to the alternative of refusing a compliance with the laws of their country, or of violating what they most solemnly believe is to them a law of God, clothed with the same most lawful sanctions.

Your memorialists plead no new doctrines; they set up no novel pretensions.—They ask permission only to practice the precepts of Jesus Christ—to adhere to the principles which prevailed through the first centuries of the Christian dispensation, which pious men through every subsequent age have maintained; and which their predecessors from the time they have been known as a religious society, under various forms of government, and through sufferings imposed by rigorous and persecuting laws, have uniformly supported.

It is true that in the lapse of time, the spirit of persecution has faded before the lights of truth. Our own country, as already stated, has been particularly distinguished for maintaining the principles of civil and religious liberty, and for rejecting those of coercive law and religious intolerance. The very grievance to which we now solicit your attention, has been acknowledged and redressed. A legislature, composed of enlightened statesmen and sages, who had assisted in establishing the chartered rights of America, who had seen the principles which your memorialists maintain, tested through the revolutionary war, convinced, it is believed, of their sincerity and the justice of their claim, exempted them from the obligation to bear arms, and from certain fines and penalties which had been imposed on their non-compliance with military requisitions. But the laws are changed. They now require that your memorialists, notwithstanding the insuperable objection of their religious scruples, should be trained to arms. Their refusal subjects them to fines, which, within certain limitations are fixed at the discretion of the courts martial, and become in numerous instances extremely oppressive. Nor is this all—your memorialists conceive that a voluntary payment of a fine imposed on them for adherence to their religious duty, or the receiving of surplus money arising from the sale of their property seized for the satisfying of these demands, would be to acknowledge a delinquency which they cannot admit, and to become parties in a traffic or commutation of their principles. Hence also considerable loss is sustained. And notwithstanding your memorialists may acknowledge that many officers of the government, in these cases manifest great reluctance, and execute their trust with scrupulous regard to the sufferers; yet there are other instances, in which wanton depredations are made on the property of individuals.

Your memorialists are aware that it may be said that the law does not discriminate between them and others, and that they ought equally to support the public burdens, and yield their services to the exigencies of the state. This objection supposes that a general law cannot have a partial or unequal operation. It supposes too, that what may be deemed a national concern, may supersede the chartered rights and privileges of the people. But your memorialists cannot suppose that these principles, which indeed are no other than maxims of tyranny, will ever be deliberately adopted or acted upon by this legislature. If one member of the community believe it his duty to fight, and slay the enemies of his country, and if any believe that he is prohibited by divine command, from planning the destruction or shedding the blood of his fellow creatures; the question, as relates to the present subject, is not, which, or whether either is wrong, but whether the law, commanding both to take arms, would not operate unequally, and violate the rights of conscience! It would operate unequally, because it does not discriminate; because, to the conscience of the one it would enjoin the performance of a duty; to that of the other the commission of a crime. It would violate the liberty of conscience, because it would compel, under pains and penalties, the performance of an act, which is believed ofensive to the Divine Being. Human authority cannot like the great searcher of hearts, try the spirits of men respecting truth and error, it cannot remit the penalties of sin, or control the convictions of the heart; and, therefore, in this country at least, the liberty of conscience is wisely placed beyond the sphere of legislation, and protected from the encroachment of any power in the government.

It may be recollected too, that in every nation of the civilized world where this society is found, they profess and maintain the same principles. That no hope of reward, no dread of punishment, nor confiscations, imprisonments or death, would induce them to bear arms against this country, or in any other cause whatever, and that every attempt to coerce them would result on the one side, in the triumph of principle, however severely tested, and in unavailing persecution on the other.

While it is therefore evident that the ostensible object of the law, for training them to arms cannot be effected, and it is presumed, from the general notoriety of their principles, that it is not even expected to be attained—while your memorialists believe that the principles they hold can in no sense prove injurious to the community, and are persuaded that this legislature would disclaim the idea of raising revenue by laws inflicting fines on the free exercise of conscience—they trust that a privilege conferred by the Supreme Being, and by the highest authority in this country declared sacred and inviolable, may be safely expected from its justice and liberality.—They therefore respectfully petition, that the laws imposing military requisitions and penalties for non-compliance, may be considered, as they respect your petitioners, and such relief afforded, as to the wisdom of the legislature, shall seem just and necessary.

Signed by order and on behalf of a meeting of the representatives of the aforesaid society, held in Dinwiddie county, the 17th of the 11th month, 1810. By

BENJAMIN BATES,

Clerk at the time.

The following letter was addressed by Benjamin Bates (bearer of the above memorial,) to a member of the legislature.

The friendly manner in which we discussed together the principles of our memorial (now before the legislature) induces me to hope, that a few additional observations, will receive a candid and impartial consideration.

It would be useless, I apprehend, in introducing the subject, to enter into any minute inquiry respecting the nature and rights of men in society; or to examine any of the various theories of government, to find in how many ways, those rights have been abused. The American people understand this subject. They did not, in establishing the empire of liberty, on the basis of equal laws, look to the pittance of privilege, which had in different ages, been extorted from bigotry, or wrung from the grasp of power. No; they were men, and conscious of their rights; they were brethren, and saw that their rights were equal. To preserve them, they did not set up human beings like themselves, with crowns and mitres on their heads, and commit to their ambition, cupidity and caprice, for safe keeping and distribution, those sacred immunities with which their Creator had endowed them—which he had made coexistent with mind itself—inherent and unalienable. It was to preserve to themselves these inestimable blessings, to transmit them to their children, to guard them for ever from usurpation, that, viewing the whole ground of polity with a discriminating eye, they declared irrevocably, that conscience belongs to God, and civil government to the people.

On this principle their whole political structure is erected, hence the law emanates, and every power in the government is bound by its authority. So it stands upon paper; but how does it operate in practice? Is the liberty of conscience indeed preserved inviolate? Do the laws impose no other restraints on religious freedom, than are sufficient to preserve the peace and order of society? Are none of the honest, and inoffensive inhabitants of this commonwealth taxed, fined or harrassed in their persons or property, on account of their religious tenets? These are questions which the patriot and statesman may ponder, but the answer is obvious and undeniable. The liberty of conscience is abridged; the laws do impose other restraints than those contemplated by the act, "establishing religious freedom;" and a number of peaceable and useful citizens, are exposed to fines and penalties, on account of their religious principles. How is this infraction of natural and constitutional right to be accounted for? It will not be said, that either those people or their principles were unknown, when the declaration of rights was made, and the form of government established. It will not be pretended, that they were excluded from the common privileges of citizens, and the common rights of humanity. No, but it is said that the government must be defended; and they are therefore enrolled for the purpose of learning the use of the firelock and bayonet, and for acquiring the art of inflicting death with the greatest expedition and effect; men whose religion is a system of universal benevolence; who believe God Almighty forbids animosity, revenge and violence; and who are assured, that disobedience to his commands, involves dreadful and eternal consequences.

This society maintain, with the framers of our constitution, and in conformity with the repeatedly declared sense of the American people, that government has no right to bring the laws of God and man into competition, and that there exists no authority in any department thereof, to cancel, abridge, restrain or modify the liberty of conscience. When this declaration was solemnly made the last time by the people of this state, and reciprocated by the whole union, the society of Friends were exempt by law, as well as by their constitutional privileges, both from militia duty and personal services in war. Did not the law which afterwards subjected them, under heavy penalties, to all the requisitions of the military system, "abridge" this liberty of conscience which had been thus solemnly guaranteed? And if it did, ought not an evidence of the fact, and an appeal to the justice of the country, to be sufficient to restore them to their rights? The fact is undeniable—the appeal is made, and its success, perhaps, ought not to be doubted. But in the mean time, the subject is variously canvassed, and many objections and difficulties are thrown in the way. We have referred, in our memo-rial, to the rights of conscience, as a natural and constitutional privilege; but we are told the liberty of conscience is an abstract principle, and as such is not to be relied on in particular cases. What is an abstract principle? Is it some remote indefinite truth, which may be indifferently remembered or forgotten? Or is it some proposition to which the understanding assents, but which is still to be tested by experience?

Now, it cannot be supposed, that the men, selected by the people, to mark out the boundaries of the law, and to fix the limits of power in a great, free and enlightened nation, would so insignificantly employ their time and abuse their trust, as to set down as a declaration of rights, any random propositions that might chance to occur to their recollection as true. The fathers of American liberty did not attract to themselves the gratitude of their country and the admiration of the world, by writing merely what was true, but for selecting the very truths they meant to establish—for drawing an insuperable, unalterable line of separation between those powers which a free people may confide in their government, and those inherent and unalienable rights which they retain to themselves. It was expressly for the preservation of those rights that the constitution was formed. Its barriers were laid strong and deep around them; and whenever they are broken down, tyranny and oppression will resume their course. Nor can it be thought that this liberty of conscience was introduced as a new or untried principle. The statesman of our country were not such novices in the subject of law and government, or so unacquainted with human nature, as to suppose, that the rights of conscience had never been tested. Nor would they, if such had been their opinion, expose the nation to difficulties and danger by a novel and presumptuous experiment. No—These men understood their subject. Its nature, its history and its importance, were familiar to their minds. They knew how readily the pride of opinion and the possession of power, combine to produce intolerance—They knew that a denial of their rights constitutes the worst species of tyranny. Nations have groaned for ages under its influences, and to preserve this country from a similar fate they held forth the right of conscience—Not as an abstract metaphysical notion, but as a living, indestructable privilege, of which no law should ever deprive a citizen?

But why was it necessary to guard those rights with such anxious solicitude? Why enshrine them in the constitution, and protect them with such jealous care from the powers of the legislature? Is not the government derived from the people? Is it not administered by their agents, and solely for their benefit? And cannot the people be trusted with the guardianship of their own privileges? The answer is plain—a government of the people is necessarily a government of the majority, but the majority, if they are not bound by constitutional restraints, may, in securing their own rights, overlook or violate the rights of others.—But would it not be mockery to tell the minority, under those circumstances, that they ought not to complain—that their country is a free republic, and themselves integral parts of the sovereign authority? Would they not be sensible that their rights and liberties depended on the will and lay at the mercy of individuals, and that however many or few those individuals might be, and under whatever forms their proceedings might be conducted, an arbitrary government is still despotism, and the subjects of it are slaves? Hence the necessity of constitutional restraints; and when those are properly established; when government simply occupies the ground on which it is placed, and exercises only the powers which have been submitted to its direction, the decisions of the majority become the legitimate rules of action, and every member of the community (whatever may be his opinion of their wisdom or expediency) is bound to obey them. This is presumed to be the true definition of a free government. But of what avail, under any form of government, is the attempt to enslave the mind? As soon would the academy devise means to arrest or control the revolutions of the solar system, as the legislature of any country to find laws that would bind the free spirit of man. How long has tyranny tortured its invention, and varied the apparatus, for discovering this grand desideratum? Creeds, tests and anathemas have been tried. Stripes, fetters and dungeons have done their best. Racks, flames and gibbets have exhausted all their powers, and all have ended in miserable disappointment. And is it not difficult to conceive how the notion ever came to be entertained on this side the Atlantic? The genius of our country did not borrow even the mildest feature of such a system; and it is certainly not congenial with our habits of thinking, to suppose that the mind may be fettered by putting a chain upon the leg, or that a man's heart can be divested of its convictions, by a warrant to take his cattle.

But admitting, that the liberty of conscience is both a natural and constitutional right, and that it is physically impossible to control the free agency of the mind, still it is contended that an expedient may be found which shall protect those rights from violation, and at the same time satisfy the law, which would otherwise infringe them.

Thus, if the legislature enjoin the performance of certain duties, on which it is supposed the very existence of government depends, and those duties happen to interfere with the constitutional rights of any individual, let that individual pay an equivalent, and be excused. If it be a military service, for instance, and his religious principles forbid him to fight, let him pay a tax for the support of schools, and make the tax equal to the military service. The argument fairly stated, stands thus: The legislature shall not restrain the free exercise of conscience, but they may levy a fine upon the advantages derived from the exemption.

Have I any objection to the support of schools? Far from it. I should rejoice to see knowledge and virtue diffused among the lower classes of society. I would cheerfully pay an equal tax for the purpose, and might be disposed to encourage it by a voluntary contribution. But when I pay a partial tax, a fine, I am neither discharging the common duties of a citizen, nor doing an act of benevolence; I am paying what is considered by the government as a debt; and for what consideration? Plainly for being allowed the liberty of conscience. But I do not desire the liberty of conscience from the government; I hold it by a tenure antecedent to the institution of civil society—it was secured to me in the social compact, and was never submitted to the legislature at all; they have therefore no privilege to grant or withhold at their pleasure, and certainly no pretence of right or authority to sell it for a price.—It appears then, that this exclusive tax for the support of schools is a groundless and oppressive demand. It is a muster fine in disguise, and violates the very principle it seemed to respect. But is it not unreasonable, it is asked, that our fellow-citizens, who believe war to be allowable and necessary, should be subjected to the hardships and privations incident to the training and service, while we, under the protection of our religious principles, enjoy complete exemption?

We answer, no. If those citizens do believe that war is necessary for their defence, if they conceive it to be their duty and their interest to fight—if it accords with their religious principles to repel aggressions by the sword—if in the full exercise of their privileges, they give to the government authority to command them in these services, this is their own act and they cannot complain of the consequences.

But a man is not the judge of his neighbour's conscience, and if the powers they surrender for themselves, involve constitutional privileges, they are binding only on those who have consented to them.

May I enquire what it is that constitutes the obligation to fight for one's country? I mean to apply the question to a free people, for under a despotism the will of the master is the obligation of the slave. What is it then in a free country that induces a man to go to war? Is it the protection of his rights? But what rights has he to protect, whose most essential privileges are already wrested from him? Or is it the interest which every individual feels in preserving his property, his home, his children, his friends? Have not all some interesting attachments? Have not all some endearing objects that cling about the heart? And is not the heart? And is not the aggregate of those their country? Every man, therefore, engaged by common consent in a defensive war, considers that he is fighting for himself and his domestic enjoyments. His home is identified with his country, and he is using those means which his own reason and conscience approve, for its defence. We too have homes, and a little property, and children and friends, whose welfare is dearer than life. We too connect them with our country, and for their preservation, would make any sacrifice which our reason and conscience could approve. But these forbid us to fight.

The power to whom we are indebted for all our enjoyments, and whose divine providence is their best protection has not committed to us the right to destroy our fellow-creatures, or to seek the redress of our wrongs by the shedding of human blood. But we know that he has communicated to man a principle capable of silencing war and violence. There is, my friend, in the religion taught by Jesus Christ, a power able to reconcile us to God and to one another. It can divest the heart that receives it of its propensities to wrongs and violence; and implant in their place the disposition to suffer wrongs and violence for its sake. Thousands of living witnesses bear testimony to this divine principle—thousands, who would suffer any privation or punishment, rather than impede, by their example, its influence and increase. And ought it not to console the friend of his country, and of his species, to see its growth, and to be assured by indubitable evidence, that it is possible, in its support, to return good for evil, to love even our very enemies; and for man, in all situations to be the friend of man.

Connecticut Legislature,

Hartford, January 25.

This day the Honourable General Assembly of this State convened in this City. The Session was opened in the usual form; when his Excellency the Governor delivered the following

SPEECH:

Gentlemen of the Council, Mr. Speaker, and Gentlemen of the House of Representatives.

The Convention of Delegates, from this and some of our sister States, having fulfilled the objects of their appointment, I have considered it my duty to afford you an early opportunity of acting on their Report.

In laying these important proceedings before you, I feel assured you will give them that consideration which is due to the opinions of revered patriots, formed from a deliberate survey of the national affairs and dictated by a zealous regard to the interests of individual States, and the lasting welfare of our country.

I shall not detain you, gentlemen, by a minute reference to the various subjects comprised in the report. Your attention will undoubtedly be first directed to those measures which are recommended as necessary for our defence against the common enemy. Should the war continue we have as yet no assurance, either that the mode of conducting it is to be essentially changed, or that any part of the heavy contributions levied upon our citizens will be applied to their protection. Hence, unless seasonable precautions are taken, we are to expect a repetition of that annoyance by the enemy, and of those embarrassments from our own government which were so largely experienced during the last campaign. The plainest principles of justice and of self preservation demand, that whilst the burden of defence is laid upon the state so much of its resources as may be adequate to that end, should in any event be retained. It is desirable that on this subject an explicit arrangement should be made with the general government, nor ought we to doubt that an immediate application for that purpose would be successful. You will consider how far the reasonable overtures suggested by the convention are calculated to meet this object.

But in the midst of our efforts to resist hostile attempts from abroad, let us beware of oppression at home. It was not the least of the evils which were apprehended from an offensive war, that both the temptation and the means would be thereby afforded, to invade the sovereignty of the respective States, and to break down those barriers between the national and state governments which were wisely intended as the most effectual safe guards of the rights of the People. It is painful to observe to what an extent these fears are already realized. We shall fail in our duty, Gentlemen, if we neglect to guard with equal vigilance against foreign dominion and domestic usurpation. With evident propriety, therefore, your particular attention is invited, in this report, to such acts of the general government in the prosecution of the war, as are unsupported by the principles of the Constitution.

This Assembly have expressed their opinion of the attempts to subject the militia or other citizens to forcible drafts and impressments, for the purpose of filling the ranks of the regular army. We have the satisfaction to perceive that these bold attacks upon the liberties of a Free People have hitherto failed of success. Schemes nevertheless, formed with such deliberation, and urged with such zeal are probably not abandoned. It is consequently proper to inquire by what legislative provision; our fellow citizens can be effectually secured against their operation.

The convention have not limited their views to the present distresses of the country. They purpose to lay a foundation for the permanent tranquillity of these States, by several important amendments of the National Constitution. The Legislature of Connecticut have rarely manifested a disposition to effect even the slightest alteration in that instrument. Whilst faithfully performing the duties enjoined upon them by the federal compact, the have viewed with nearly equal concern the repeated and successful attempts of others to modify and to violate it. But without reciting the causes which have reduced our once prosperous nation to its present condition, the question may be confidently asked, whether the time has not arrived in which radical reforms are indispensable?

I forbear to enlarge on other parts of this interesting report. We are to presume that a sense of justice will induce the administration to assent to the proposed arrangement, and that the ulterior resort recommended by the convention will be therefore unnecessary. Should different sentiments unfortunately prevail, the General Assembly will hold its usual session in time to provide for such a state of things as would then exist.

Those who have believed that our suffering called for more prompt and efficient modes of redress, will be satisfied that moderation is no less than firmness is the dictate of an enlightened and just policy, and that it would ill become the uniform friends of liberty and order to dishonour their principles by rash councils or precipitate measures. The temperate and magnanimous course proposed for our adoption cannot fail to allay the apprehensions which many have professed to entertain, and to enliven the hopes of all who cherish our national union, and are disposed to place it on a solid and durable basis.

GENTLEMEN,

It is not expected that the ordinary business of the legislature will occupy much of your time at the present session. You will feel the importance, however, of paying a particular regard to our financial concerns. To render the operation of the treasury successful and by means the least burdensome to our constituents, is a subject which claims, and I doubt not will receive, your earnest and faithful attention.

Of the proceedings of the Executive under various acts and resolutions of the last Session you will be informed by a separate communication.

At this season of wide-spread calamity, it becomes us, Gentlemen, in all our deliberations, to look to the Divine direction, and to implore the smiles of a merciful Providence on our country and upon our united endeavours for its deliverance and safety.

JOHN COTTON SMITH.

General Assembly;
Special Session, January, 1815.

(Reported for the Democratic Press.)

The Commonwealth, vs. Maj. Thos. Robinson. The following important decision of the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, on the act of Congress of the last session, which authorizes the enlistment of minors, not under eighteen years of age, without the consent of parents, masters or guardians, was pronounced on the 15th instant, after hearing the case argued.

Tilghman, C. J. The habeas corpus in this case was issued on the affidavit of Abraham Polinger, under the act of Assembly of the 18th February, 1785. It appears by the return that Jonas Roop was enlisted as a soldier in the army of the United States. At the time of his enlistment he was a minor, above eighteen years of age, and bound by an indenture of apprenticeship to Abraham Polinger. But it was not at his request, nor by his desire, that the habeas corpus was issued. On the contrary he is well satisfied with his situation, and wishes to remain in the army. The object of the Act of Assembly was to secure personal liberty, not to decide disputes concerning property. The court "after examining into the facts relating to the case, and into the cause of the confinement or restraint, is to bail, remand or discharge the party, as to justice shall appertain." Now here we can neither bail; remand nor discharge, because there is neither confinement nor restraint. The party wishes to remain where he is. In short it is a mere dispute between the officer and the master who claims a right to the service of his apprentice. The case therefore is not within the provisions of the Act of Assembly. But a habeas corpus may be issued at common law, under which courts have gone so far as to deliver the body of an infant to his parent, and sometimes an apprentice to his master. It is discretionary, however, whether to proceed to that length or not. In a case like the present there is no occasion for a summary proceeding, because the master has his remedy by action against the person who takes away his apprentice. But there are strong reasons against proceeding in any other manner than by action. It is understood that the validity of an act of Congress is to be brought into question. The subject is worthy of the most solemn discussion and mature deliberation. And above all it is desirable that it should be brought on in such a form as will admit of a removal to the Supreme Court of the United States, the tribunal in the last resort for deciding all questions arising out of the constitution or laws of the United States. This court, therefore, would not have thought it expedient to interfere in a case where personal liberty is not concerned even if the habeas corpus had been issued at common law.—Having considered the facts in this case, Jonas Roop is permitted to remain in his present situation, because he desires it.

Messages and Speeches.

In the messages and speeches of the governors of the several states, we have a pretty good epitome of their political history, &c. We have, therefore, devoted a considerable space for the record of those that the pressure of other current matter compelled us to postpone.

LEGISLATURE OF MASSACHUSETTS.

GOVERNOR'S MESSAGE.

Gentlemen of the Senate, and Gentlemen of the House of Representatives,

In compliance with the request of the members from this commonwealth, of the convention of delegates from the New England states, which lately met at Hartford, I have directed the secretary to communicate to the legislature, their report which was transmitted to me for that purpose, and which appears to have been the result of moderation and firmness.

Immediately after your adjournment five persons were appointed to constitute a board of war, agreeably to the act of the 20th of October last. A copy of the instructions given them, and an abstract of all the accounts by them allowed and paid, prior to the 14th day of this month, together such proceedings of the late commissioners for the protection of the sea-coast, as have not before been communicated, will be laid before you. From these documents I think the legislature will be satisfied, that the board of war, and commissioners for sea-coast defence, have discharged the duties assigned them with fidelity, and with much advantage to the public.

The secretary will also deliver to you returns from the quarter-master-general, of the ordnance and military stores, and of the tents, entrenching tools, &c. the property of this commonwealth, stating the quantity, quality and places of deposit, and also a return of the quantity of military stores and munitions of war, that have been delivered to sundry towns for their defence, by order of the commissioners for the protection of the sea-coast. These returns will enable the two houses to judge whether the state is deficient in any of the articles that will be essential for the general defence, in case of extremity.

In erecting fortifications in this town and its vicinity, and in other exposed places on the coast, the inhabitants of many of the neighboring towns have labored cheerfully and without recompence on the works that were deemed necessary for defence. The patriotism manifested in those voluntary services, merit the public approbation and gratitude.

By the resolve of the 11th of October last the treasurer was authorized to require of the banks within this state, according to the provisions of the several acts of incorporation, and upon such terms as are therein specified, the loan of such sums, not exceeding one million of dollars, as might be necessary to accomplish the purposes of the resolve of the fourteenth of June. At that time it was supposed there would be no difficulty in procuring the requisite sums from that source, and the treasurer soon obtained loans to a considerable amount. But the directors of some of the banks declared themselves unable to lend, and others have expressed such reluctance, as forbids an expectation that the whole amount can be obtained in that way, during the continuance of the present cautious operations of the banks. Besides, the sums to be provided for the payment of interest on the money borrowed, and for the ordinary expences of government, will be greater than usual, from the failure of the United States to pay the interest on their stock, and the increased difficulty of collecting taxes. These circumstances show the necessity of speedily providing means for meeting the expenditures which the public exigencies may require. Indeed the efforts of defensive preparation, which were made in this state the last year, will, if continued at the expence of the commonwealth, be fatal to our finances; and will render it necessary to impose hereafter such burdensome taxes, as must be extremely injurious to the manufactures and agriculture of the state; nor will all the resources which remain to us, be sufficient for any length of time, to furnish the requisite supplies.

The attention of the executive was early directed to the provisions of the act of the 20th October, to establish a military corps for the defence of the commonwealth. But as the act was passed at the close of the session, some delay was necessary to obtain information concerning the persons proper to be selected in the various parts of the state, for the officers contemplated in the act. When the council again met it was thought expedient, from the changes in the aspect of our affairs, to incur no immediate additional expence. The council therefore advised that commissions should not be issued until the general court would have an opportunity of varying, if they thought proper, their measures of defence, according to the change of circumstances.

On the 8th of December, I received a letter from the secretary of war, stating that the president had authorized general Dearborn to take measures for the purpose of expelling the enemy from the district of Maine, and suggesting that any aid which I might be able to afford in providing the funds necessary for the execution of the enterprise would be gladly received. In my answer I informed him that the legislature had authorized me to borrow a sum not exceeding one million of dollars, to be applied for the pay and support of the militia who had been called into service.

—that it would be difficult to borrow a sufficient sum for those purposes ; and that I had no authority, even if the money could be obtained, to borrow for any other ; and therefore it was not in my power to make any advances for the objects mentioned in his letter. A copy of the letter, and of my answer to it, will be laid before you.

We have heard it observed, that the state legislatures have no right to express their opinion concerning the measures of the general government. This doctrine is repugnant to the first principles of liberty, and the remark could not have been made by any one, who had well considered the organization of our governments, or the arguments used by the advocates of the national constitution when that system was adopted. The government of the United States is founded on the state governments, and must be supported by them ; the legislatures of the several states either elect the members of the executive and legislative branches of the national government, or prescribe the manner of their election. It would then be strange, indeed, if they were denied a right, which the meanest citizen of every free state enjoys. In the arrangement of the different powers, the state governments are to many purposes, interposed between the government of the United States and the people. If the latter think themselves oppressed, they will complain to their immediate representatives, and the remonstrance of a state legislature, on their behalf, will not often be slighted by a wise and just administration.

The powers of the United States government are limited by the constitution, which points out the extent of these powers, and the manner in which they are to be exerted. The constitution, however, will be of little service unless it is religiously observed. If, at any time, the national administration disregard its authority, either by violating its express provisions, or by the assumption of powers, with which it has not entrusted them, their commands become unjust, and they are guilty of a dangerous abuse of confidence. But on subjects of this kind, every private man is not a competent judge. The state legislatures are the guardians, not only of the individual citizens, but of the sovereignty of their respective states ; and while they are bound to support the general government, in the exercise of its constitutional powers, it is their duty to protect the rights of the states and of their constituents, and to guard the constitution itself, as well against silent and slow attacks, as more open and daring violations.—The security thus afforded to the people would be lost, if the state legislatures should be implicitly devoted to the views of the national government, or were deprived of their right to enquire into its measures.

In all free states, the people have, at some periods been hurried into rash and dangerous excesses, to oppose either real or imaginary grievances. An individual, who is under the influence of passion or prejudice, will be likely to form erroneous opinions and pursue indiscreet measures, and yet, in the highest paradoxism of anger, he is checked by a sense of responsibility. But when the passions of a multitude are inflamed, they have little restraint of this kind, and will be in danger of proceeding to excesses, of which, as individuals, they would be incapable. In this manner the abuse of liberty has often terminated in the loss of it.

To prevent such fatal excesses, whenever the conduct of the general government or its officers is thought to be unconstitutional or oppressive, and no remedy can be obtained in the ordinary course of justice, the people of the state have a right to apply to their legislature for assistance in obtaining redress. Their petitions, I presume, will be attended to, though not with a disposition to impute improper motives to the agents of the general government, or to condemn their conduct upon slight grounds or frivolous pretences. If the members of the legislature are convinced that the complaint is well founded, they will employ the most prudent and effectual means for redress. This course was thought to be regular when the constitution was adopted ; and it seems to be the most efficacious as well for the relief of oppressed individuals and for the preservation of the rights of the state, as for the maintenance of order, and the support of a just administration of government. I hope, therefore, that the people of this commonwealth, however they may at any time think themselves injured by the national agents, will not resort to unauthorized and intemperate measures, which may prove extremely hurtful to themselves and to the public, but cannot be advantageous to either.

Before war was declared, when we saw the tendency of the national measures, we expressed our most ardent desire that hostilities might be avoided. We could hardly conceive it possible, that under the pretence of guarding our commerce, we should adopt a course by which it must be annihilated ; or that to protect our seamen, we should engage in a war that would lead to their destruction. We knew that whenever the war between France and England should terminate, the evils we complained of would cease ; and that our commerce, if unobstructed by internal restraints, would be more profitable during the war in Europe, than after peace should be established. If in the arduous conflict between Great Britain and France, and their respective allies, the combatants did not always suspend their blows when we happened to get within reach of them, yet we could see no reason for our interference in the quarrel. But the government became impatient, and though there was apparently some embarrassment in deciding which of the belligerents should be attacked, and whether it would not be expedient to attack both at once, it was soon determined to select that people for our enemies, with whom we were the most nearly connected, whose commerce was most important to us, and who were able to do us the most mischief.

Soon after the declaration of war, we learned that the orders in council were repealed. With a view to open the way to peace, the British government proposed an unconditional armistice, to which our administration refused to agree. The rejection of this proposal appeared to us an extremely unfortunate event, as a compliance with it might have saved the honor of the government, and extinguished the war before it was kindled to a flame. It was also unfortunate, as together with other circumstances, it served to convince the British nation, that the war was waged, not for the protection of our maritime rights, but for other purposes, and particularly to obtain possession of the Indian country, and to conquer the adjoining provinces of Great Britain.

These apprehensions have been manifested by the British government in the negotiations for peace. The terms first proposed by Great Britain, undoubtedly implied a want of confidence in our pacific views, both with regard to themselves and the Indians. But the British ministers knew that the same men who commenced the war, still administered our government; they might, therefore, be more apprehensive that former measures would be repeated. Should the conditions of peace, to which we may find it convenient ultimately to agree, be not the most favorable, the fault will not consist in making peace, but in having made the war. This fault will not be diminished by postponing a reconciliation to a distant period; neither the political character, nor the moral stain of an unnecessary war can be effaced, though the war should be continued many years.

We still flatter ourselves that there will soon be a favorable issue to the negotiations in Europe. But so long as hostilities are continued, and we are left to defend, by our own exertions, our extended maritime frontier, the duties of the legislature of this state must be arduous. I hope that under the influence of that wisdom which is from above, the measures you adopt will be suited to promote order and tranquility in the state; to protect, as far as we are able, our exposed towns on the sea-coast; and to preserve, unimpaired, the constitutional privileges to which we are entitled.

CALEB STRONG.

January 18th, 1815.

The documents which accompanied this message, were,

1. A letter from the secretary of war through General Dearborn, to the governor, informing, that the United States contemplated taking measures to expel the enemy from Castine, and Eastport; that 5000 militia of the state, under General King, would be employed for the purpose; and requesting the governor to furnish the money to support and pay these troops, and promising remuneration in the course of two months.

2. Governor Strong's answer: in which, besides his inability to comply with the request, it was added that well informed men had given it as their opinion, that any expedition of the kind contemplated would add to the inconvenience of the inhabitants of the district said to be occupied by the enemy; and could not be efficacious in expelling them without the aid of a naval force adequate to the command of Penobscot bay.

3. Report of the treasurer of the monies borrowed of the banks, agreeably to a resolution of the last session, which amounted, December 10, 1814, to €31,000 dollars; and stating the difficulties which attended the mode of obtaining supplies.

4. The annual return of the quarter master general.

5. The report of the commissioners of sea-coast defence. [Their expenditure about 400,000 dollars.]

6. Copy of instructions to the board of war, &c.

7. Report of the board of war.

8. Annual report of the adjutant general.

9. A letter from the honorable George Cabot, president of the convention which assembled at Hartford, inclosing two copies of the proceedings of that honorable body.

LEGISLATURE OF VERMONT.

GOVERNOR'S SPEECH.

Delivered at Montpelier; October, 15, 1814.

Gentlemen of the Council, and

Gentlemen of the House of Representatives,

The unsolicited approbation of my conduct the year past, considering the extreme embarrassments, under which I entered upon the duties of my office, is highly gratifying, and will not fail to produce renewed exertion to promote the best interests of my fellow citizens. At the same time it affords the pleasing hope that my future services in the discharge of the duties of the office, which I have again undertaken, will be considered with the same indulgence. Without this, I should despair of discharging those duties in a satisfactory manner in this most difficult and eventful period.

The true patriot can submit to no sacrifice of truth or principle to procure his own advancement, or to promote the interests or views of a party. Men may change—and parties may change—but truth, principle and virtue are immutable. It ought, therefore, to be our firm determination to pursue the plain path of duty with steadiness and fidelity.

In declaring my undeviating attachment to the principles of our wise and excellent system of government, independently of any regard, or blind devotion to those who may have administered it, I am sensible that high sounding professions are not the surest test of sincerity, and shall, therefore, only refer you to the general tenor of my conduct for future expectations.

Our foreign relations and defensive operations being exclusively committed to the management of the general government, excepting in particular cases, in which assistance may be required, our attention is principally confined to the local concerns of the state. And it affords me great pleasure to have it in my power to observe, that the internal quiet, security and prosperity of our fellow citizens, for the year past, has been unexampled for times like the present.

Justice has been promptly, and, I believe, impartially administered, the laws duly respected, and litigation gradually diminishing—the natural and certain consequences of a well placed confidence in an upright and intelligent judiciary. Our fiscal concerns have been conducted with that fidelity and correctness, which were to be expected from the acknowledged talents and integrity of the officer at the head of that department.

Our schools and seminaries of learning have not suffered that diminution and depression which might have been expected, excepting, that it has been deemed advisable, that the operations of one nearest the seat of war should suffer a temporary suspension, that, at a future, and more favorable period, they might be renewed, under better prospects, and with increased vigour and energy.

The economy and correctness with which that liberal and humane institution, established for the security and correction of state criminals, has been conducted, affords the consoling prospect of its great usefulness to the community—evinces a general improvement in the state of society, and probably will afford some revenue to the state.

Notwithstanding the corrupting and demoralizing tendency of a state of war, our citizens have enjoyed their civil and religious privileges in an unusual degree.

The distinguished talents, integrity and experience of which your honorable body is composed, will render my duties less arduous, and afford a sure pledge to our constituents, that their best interests will be promoted.

Man never appears in a more responsible and truly dignified station, than when called to act as the representative of a free, sovereign and independent people. We are elected from among our fellow citizens, not for the base and degrading purpose of securing our own promotion, aggrandizing our particular friends, or to favor the views and interests of a party—but to consider the whole community as one common family, and, as faithful guardians of their rights, endeavour to promote the general welfare.

Yours is the duty, and on you, gentlemen, rests the responsibility of selecting proper persons to fill the various offices in this state for the ensuing year—persons, to whom we may safely trust the administration of justice in all its important branches, and on whom we must, in a great measure, depend for the preservation of the peace and internal quiet of the state. It will likewise become your duty to select a suitable person to represent this state in the senate of the United States, from and after the third day of March next.

In the execution of these important duties, the most perfect confidence is entertained, that you will, unbiassed by local or party considerations, be influenced by a single view to the public good.

The great importance of a well organized militia in a free state, cannot escape the notice of a wise legislature. The want of precision and energy in our present military system, must be apparent to every man who is conversant in military affairs—and demands a revision to adapt it to the exigencies arising from our exposed situation. It would be desirable, that the burthen should be equalized, as far as is practicable, that the weight may not rest on those who are least able to bear it.

We have a right to demand from the general government full protection and security. Still it is but too evident from past experience, that much depends upon our own exertions. May not this consideration suggest the expediency of adopting some further measures for arming the militia, and providing field artillery and munitions of war, which may be applicable to sudden emergencies? We have before us the example of many of our sister states for raising a small volunteer corps, which may be relied on, in case of sudden alarm, and serve as a rallying point for other and efficient aid.

As we are authorised by the constitution to look to the general government for that protection which our exposed situation may require, it must be perfectly evident, that the militia were only designed to be called in aid of the regular force in particular cases. Those instances, which have occurred during the last year, have been met by our patriotic and brave citizens with a promptitude, spirit and zeal which are highly honorable to themselves, and which render them worthy of the gratitude of their country.

To meet a request of General Macomb, for assistance, on a late incursion of the enemy, which terminated so gloriously for the American arms, there being no portion of the militia detached or called for by the president, in conformity to the laws of the United States, it was considered that a call-upon our patriotic citizens for their voluntary services was the only mode, by which efficient and timely aid could possibly be afforded.

The result has been such, as many of you, gentlemen, have witnessed. It far exceeded, in extent, our reasonable expectations. By it the enemy have been taught a useful, although mortifying lesson, that the soil of freemen will not bear the tread of hostile feet with impunity.

At the same time, it reflects the highest honor on the patriotism, spirit and valor of our fellow citizens, who, without distinction of age, character or party, were ready to brave the danger, in its most formidable appearance, for the defence of their country. And it would seem, that it ought to palsy the tongue of slander—every desirable object having been secured, and in a manner the least burthensome and offensive to the feelings of a free and enlightened people.

Much is due to General Strong, and our brave volunteers; and I am requested by the secretary of war to present them the thanks of the general government "for their prompt succour and gallant conduct in the late critical state of this frontier."

I should do injustice to my own feelings, as well as violence to every correct principle, were I to refrain from testifying the high sense which I entertain of the brilliant achievement of Commodore Macdonough, and his intrepid associates, on Lake Champlain, over a far superior naval force—an achievement which renders all encomium feeble and inadequate.

I should likewise do injustice, if I should neglect to notice the cool, persevering, and brave conduct of Brigadier General Macomb, and his alike brave associates in arms, in the discomfiture of a greatly superior force of veteran troops, commanded by experienced officers.

These glorious achievements are not surpassed in the records of a naval and military warfare. New lustre is added to the national character. But the effects are more immediately experienced by the northern sections of the states of Vermont and New-York.

This late special interference of the Almighty in our behalf, in completely defeating the hostile designs of the enemy on our northern borders, cannot fail to render it a subject of respectful legislative notice. And although it may not be in our power to add to the laurels of those gallant commanders, and their brave associates, who, under Providence, were the authors of our protection and safety—yet we may express our gratitude to heaven, and to them, for so great a deliverance.

I have received a letter from the governor of the state of Pennsylvania, which enclosed a resolution of the senate and house of representatives of that state, proposing an amendment to the constitution of the United States—by which the term of senators in Congress shall be reduced from six to four years. I have received likewise a letter from the governor of Tennessee, enclosing a resolution of the general assembly of that state, proposing an amendment of the same import. These papers will be laid before you. And should any thing further of importance come to my knowledge during the present session, of which you are not possessed, it will be made the subject of a special communication.

On the subject of the war, in which our country is most unfortunately engaged, I feel disposed, at this critical period, to say as little as may be consistent with duty. But I consider it due to myself, and more especially to my constituents, explicitly to state, that the events of the war have in no wise altered my opinion of its origin or its progress. I have conscientiously and uniformly disapproved of it, as unnecessary, unwise, and hopeless, in all its offensive operations. And notwithstanding the few brilliant successes we have met with in our operations of defence, I can see very little in its general complexion which affords the least consolation.

Many very considerable places on our seaboard are now in the possession of the enemy. The capitol of our country, that proud monument of better times, has been possessed and destroyed by him—a humiliating reflection to every real American. And I consider that we are now suffering the evils, which have, from the mistakes and misconduct of rulers, befallen this, as well as most of the nations of the earth.

It therefore becomes us to look calmly and firmly on our dangers, and meet them like men, who are mindful of what they owe to their own characters, and what they owe to their country.

It would have afforded me heartfelt satisfaction to have been able to announce to you the return of peace to an afflicted people. But our reasonable hopes, on this subject, not having been realised, and the particular spirit with which the war appears to be prosecuted by the enemy, renders defensive measures and operations not only necessary, but righteous and just; in which we may engage with feelings most honorable and praise worthy, and with a firm reliance on the Almighty, who has never forsaken us in the hour of peril.

I shall now, gentlemen, cheerfully proceed in the discharge of the duties of the office assigned me—and in the prosecution of the bu-business of the present session, you may be assured of my cordial co-operation in every measure, which has for its object the promotion of the public good.

MARTIN CHITTENDEN.

[Mr. Chittenden had been re-elected governor by the legislature, the day preceding—for Mr. C. 123 votes, for Mr. Galusha 94. There was no election by the people. Mr. C. had 17,469, Mr. G. 17,411, and there were 451 scattering—the constitution requires a plurality.]

OFFICIAL PAPERS.

*In general assembly of the state of Vermont,
October 21, 1814.*

On motion and leave, Mr. C. H. Dennison introduced the following resolution, viz:

In general assembly, October 21st 1814.

“Resolved, That his excellency the governor, be requested to lay before this house, copies of any correspondence he may have had, with any commanding officer of the United States army, or any officer under his command, relative to detaching the militia of this state, particularly the request of general Macomb, alluded to in his excellency's speech of the 15th inst. together with any other information on the subject, which in his opinion, may not be improper to communicate to this house.” Which resolution was read and ordered to lie on the table.

October 26. The resolution lying on the table calling on his excellency for certain information, relating to any correspondence he may have had with general Macomb, and other military officers, was called up, read and adopted; and on motion, Ordered, that Mr. H. C. Dennison wait on his excellency, with a copy of the resolution.

EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT.

Montpelier, October 27, 1814.

Sir—In compliance with the resolution of the honorable house of representatives, of the 25th inst. I herewith transmit to you and through you to that honorable body, several letters and communications, marked No. 1 to 14 inclusive.

A copy of the answer to general Macomb's first letter, dated the first of September last, I find, by examining my papers, has been mislaid.

It was short, and in substance, as well as I can recollect, that attention should be paid to his communication, and such aid afforded, as should be found necessary, and in my power constitutionally to grant.

An introductory letter to general Macomb, was given to general Strong on crossing the lake, stating his laudable exertions in inducing volunteers to turn out for the defence of their country, and recommending him as an old experienced officer, in whose judgment and integrity the fullest confidence might be placed.

Of this letter, it being made out in haste, I did not take a copy.

I am sir, respectfully, your humble servant,
MARTIN CHITTENDEN.

Hon. D. Chipman, speaker of the house of representatives.

Copy of a letter from brigadier general Macomb.

Plattsburgh, August 4, 1815.

I am at this moment informed, that the enemy is advancing in full force towards this place, and have already proceeded so far as to cross the Chazy at Champlain-village. It is perhaps in your power to throw a detachment over the lake, so as to advance to our assistance on the road leading from Essex. These men should be light armed. We shall be able to hold our ground until they come to our assistance, in case they should be too powerful for us to meet the enemy beyond our defences.

With sentiments of respect, I have the honor to be your most obedient servant,

ALEXANDER MACOMB,

Brig. gen. commanding the U. S. troops.

His excellency, Martin Chittenden,
gov. of the state of Vermont.

Copy of another from the same.

Plattsburgh, 1 P. M. September 4, 1814.

Sir—It is now ascertained, beyond a doubt, that the enemy will march for this place, with his whole force, this morning. Every preparation is made and making that our time will admit. The enemy must besiege us, as our works are now in a tolerable state of defence. This will give time for succors to get to our assistance, which may possibly end in a complete discomfiture of his designs and oblige him to raise the siege. Much is at stake at this place, and aid is actually wanted, as the garrison is small, and the enemy in considerable force. Under these circumstances your excellency will, I am sure, not hesitate to afford us all the assistance in your power.

I have the honor to be, sir, with perfect respect, your most obedient servant,

ALEXANDER MACOMB,

Brig. gen. commanding.

His excellency Martin Chittenden,
gov. of the state of Vermont.

Copy of the answer.

Jericho, September 4, 1814.

Sir—I have the honor to acknowledge your note of this day, and shall take the most effectual measures to furnish such number of volunteers, as may be induced to turn out for your assistance. They will probably cross at McNeil's ferry.

I have the honor to be with respect, your humble servant.

MARTIN CHITTENDEN.

GEN. A. MACOMB.

Copy of a letter from governor Chittenden to general Newell.

Jericho, September 4, 1814.

Sir—Enclosed I transmit to you the copy of a letter, this moment received from general Macomb, which will show you the situation of our army at Plattsburg, and the necessity of such assistance as can be afforded. I would recommend it to you to take the most effectual method to procure such number of volunteers as may be had, for his immediate assistance, from your brigade. It would be advisable for the troops to cross the lake at M'Neil's ferry.

I am respectfully, your humble servant,
M. CHITTENDEN.
GEN. JOHN NEWELL.

Copy of the answer.

Charlotte, September 5, 1814.

Sir—I received late last night your excellency's letter of the 4th instant, with a copy of general Macomb's letter to yourself, of the same date enclosed, in which you have referred me to gen. Macomb's letter to learn the defenceless situation of Plattsburg, the force and approach of the enemy, and his request of your assistance, with the militia of Vermont. You have also recommended to me, to procure such number of volunteers, from my brigade as may be disposed to repair to Plattsburg, and have them cross at M'Neil's ferry. If I rightly understand your letter I can perceive no request or order from your excellency, directing me to have the militia under my command, or any portion of them, march to Plattsburg, or any other place, for the assistance of general Macomb, or for any other purpose. From your letter, therefore, I consider myself unauthorized to order out any portion of the militia under my command, or to do more than your excellency has recommended, namely, to offer my advice, which may be followed or not. As I consider myself with the brigade I command, fully under your direction and control, and as our assistance is requested, and seems very much needed at Plattsburg, I regret that your excellency has not ordered either the whole, or a portion of this brigade to their assistance, as I shall cheerfully obey any request, direction or order, you may give to repair to Plattsburg, or any other place, to assist in opposing the enemy, protecting our territory and citizens, and defending our country from invasion.

I am, sir, with great respect, your excellency's most obedient servant,

JOHN NEWELL.

His excellency, Martin Chittenden.

Copy of a reply to gen. Newell.

Jericho, Sept. 5, 1814.

Sir—I have received your's of this date, and state in answer, that I do not consider myself authorized, either by the constitution or laws under which we act, and from which all our powers are derived, to order the militia out of the state. But considering the peculiar situation of the army at Plattsburg, it was my desire that every aid, constitutionally in our power, should be afforded. And I am induced to believe, that a request in such a case, would have more effect than an attempt to assume unauthorised power, on all such as are willing to turn out for the defence of their country.

I am respectfully, your humble servant,
MARTIN CHITTENDEN.

GEN. JOHN NEWELL.

Copy of a letter from colonel Fassett.

I learn by Mr. Wadsworth, there is a considerable quantity of fixed ammunition at Vergennes, subject to your order. Can I have a part of it for volunteers? Please to inform me by my son. I am, sir, yours,

ELIAS FASSETT.

His excellency, M. Chittenden,
Jericho, 7th Sept. 1814.

Copy of the answer.

Jericho, September 7, 1814.

Sir—I have the honor of acknowledging your note of this date, on the subject of fixed ammunition for the volunteers. If there is any at Vergennes, subject to my order, this letter may be considered as a sufficient order for such part of the same as may be wanted.

I would inform you, that agreeably to your suggestion I enclosed, and sent by express, on Sunday evening, to general John Newell, a copy of general Macomb's letter, and strongly recommended it to him, to use every exertion to procure such number of volunteers from his brigade, as could be immediately induced to cross the lake to the assistance of the army at Plattsburg.

I am respectfully, your humble servant,
MARTIN CHITTENDEN.

Col. Elias Fassett.

Copy of a letter to general Macomb.

Burlington, Sept. 11.

Sir—The bearers, Amos W. Barnum, esq. my military aid, and Samuel Swift, esq. secretary to the governor and council of this state, will go to Plattsburg for the purpose, if practicable, of communicating with you, and of receiving any information you may please to communicate, that we may know how to govern ourselves, in endeavoring to furnish assistance. They will communicate to me any necessary information you may give them for this purpose.

I am with high consideration, your humble servant,
MARTIN CHITTENDEN.

Gen. Macomb.

Copy of a letter from general Samuel Strong.
September 10, 1814.

Sir—I am sorry not to have it in my power to give you a correct statement of the British force approaching this place. From the best information I can obtain, which was from general Mozer, they are 8000 or 9000 strong.

all regular troops, except a few. The artillery has not been made use of against us yet, although it is believed they have considerable. I have been up the river this morning, five or six miles, which was lined with the enemy on the north side. They have made several attempts to cross but without success. This is the line that is to be defended. I have ascertained, to a certainty, the number of militia from Vermont, now on the ground, well armed, is 1812—from New York 700. Regular troops under general Macomb, he says, 2000. He treated me very friendly. I presume Dr. Pomery gave you the particulars of the first interview we had. We have strong expectations of 2000 detached militia, ordered out by gen. Mooer, arriving soon. He has written to governor Tompkins to send on the militia, he says he expects him in person. I hope you and your friends will send four or five thousand to our assistance as soon as possible, if you should think best. If not, we shall, if our courage holds out, keep close to them. Do not, sir, let my wishes turn you from the correct principles you have heretofore pursued, as governor of Vermont. Permit me, sir, to subscribe myself your friend and humble servant,

SAMUEL STRONG.

Copy of a letter from the same, September 11, 1814—Sunday, 7 o'clock, P. M.

Dear sir—We are now encamped with two thousand five hundred Vermont volunteers, on the south bank of the Saranac river, opposite the enemy's right wing, which is commanded by general Brisbane. We have had the satisfaction to see the British fleet strike to our brave commodore Macdonough. The fort was attacked at the same time, the enemy attempted to cross the river in every place fordable, for four miles up the river. But they were foiled in every attempt, except at Pike's encampment, where we now are. The New York militia were posted at this place, under generals Mooer and Wright. They were forced to give back a few miles, until they were reinforced by their artillery. The general informed me of his situation, and wished for assistance which was readily afforded. We met the enemy, and drove him across the river, under cover of his artillery. Our loss is trifling. We took twenty or thirty prisoners. Their number of killed is not known. We have been skirmishing all day on the banks of the river. This is the only place he crossed, and he has paid dear for that. I presume the enemy's force exceeds the number I wrote you. What will be our fate tomorrow, I know not; but am willing to risk the consequence attending it—being convinced of the bravery and skill of my officers and men. We are abundantly supplied with ammunition and provisions, from general Macomb.

I am, dear sir, yours with esteem,

SAMUEL STRONG.

If God, permits, you shall hear from me again, soon.

Copy of a letter from the same.

Vergennes, Sept. 16, 1814.

Dear sir—I received your letter of the 14th inst. on my return at Burlington, where I had the satisfaction of expressing your thanks to the citizens who had turned out to repel our invading foe at Plattsburg. At the same time, I was mortified to hear citizens of a government like ours—while all officers are limited in their official powers, urging the propriety of that power being executed in an unconstitutional and arbitrary manner. We, as citizens, have rights secured to us by the blood and wisdom of our forefathers. The constitution wisely secures to us, certain rights and privileges, that ought not, and I say with thousands of others, shall not be infringed on. The late invasion will convince our enemies, and our citizens at home, that our freedom and liberties are not to be taken by force, or intrigue.

I wrote you on the 11th. Nothing appeared to oppose on the 12th, and we left all the ground in harmony, returning to our families, except a few, who were killed or wounded. If God be with us, who can stand against us?

I am, sir, your excellency's friend and humble servant,

SAMUEL STRONG.

His excellency, Martin Chittenden.

From the secretary at war.

War Department, Sept. 15, 1814.

Sir—The force under general Macomb, being exposed to imminent danger, I have to request your excellency, to order to his aid, immediately, such a reinforcement not less than two thousand of the militia of your state as may be adequate to the object.

The emergency is such, as to make it necessary that you call into service, en masse, the militia from the counties most convenient to the scene of action.

The extravagant and pernicious views of the enemy, make it of the highest importance, to the best interest and union of these states, that their career should be checked.

It is in the power of your excellency, with the means in your hands, to afford such aid as effectually to check it.

I rely on your patriotic zeal, to make the exertions necessary to the end.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, sir, your most obedient servant,

JAMES MONROE.

His excellency, Martin Chittenden.

Copy of a letter from Charles J. Nourse, assistant adjutant general.

Burlington, Vermont, Sept. 27, 1814.

Sir—The dispatch herewith, would have been handed to your excellency at an earlier day, but that the late glorious success of our navy and army in this quarter, rendered it unnecessary.

I am directed by the secretary of war, to present the thanks of the general government through you, to the brave and patriotic citizens of your state, for their prompt succor and gallant conduct in the late critical state of this frontier.

It is the wish of the government that two thousand of the militia of your state should be drafted and organized, for immediate service, subject to the call, when necessary, of the commanding officer in this quarter.

There are arms at Montpelier, from which such as may be without, can be furnished.

I have the honor to be, sir, most respectfully, your obedient servant,

CHAS. J. NOURSE,
Assistant adjutant general.

His excellency,

Martin Chittenden, gov. of Vt.

Copy of a letter to the secretary of war.

Burlington, Sept. 28, 1814.

Sir—I have the honor to acknowledge yours of the 15th inst. and have the great satisfaction to inform you that every object contemplated in your communication has been effected.

Volunteers to a much larger number, than that mentioned in your request, turned out, and crossed the lake to meet the enemy, without distinction of age, character, or party, exhibiting a spirit and zeal for the defence of their country, which reflects the highest honor on themselves and the country they have signally aided in defending. The glorious event of our success against a far superior force, both by land and water, is of the highest importance to this portion of the union, and cannot fail, so to be considered, in a national point of view.

I have the honor to be respectfully, your humble servant,

MARTIN CHITTENDEN.

Hon. James Monroe, sec'y. at war.

Vermont Legislature—in council

REPORT OF COMMITTEE.

To his excellency the governor and the honorable council, now in session:

Your committee, to whom was referred the following question, proposed by his excellency—Can the militia when in the actual service of the United States, be lawfully commanded by any officers but such as are appointed by this state except, by the president of the United States?

VOL. VII.

REPORT,

That the constitution of the United States, article 1, section 8, declares, "that congress shall have power to provide for calling forth the militia to execute the laws of the union, suppress insurrection and repel invasion: To provide for organizing, arming and disciplining the militia, and for governing such part of them as may be employed in the service of the United States, reserving to the states respectively the appointment of the officers and the authority of training the militia, according to the discipline prescribed by congress." In article 12, section 2, "The president shall be commander in chief of the army and navy of the United States, and of the militia of the several states when called into the actual service of the United States."

It is the opinion of your committee that the different clauses quoted from the federal constitution, should receive a construction so as to render one clause consistent with another. The president may, undoubtedly, command the army and navy of the United States, by officers lawfully commissioned by himself; but he cannot so command the militia of the state when called into the actual service of the United States; for the appointment of their officers, is a right reserved "to the states respectively." If, therefore, the president would command the militia, when in the actual service of the United States, he must do it in person or exercise his command over them by officers appointed by the states. The congress have power to provide for organizing and disciplining the militia, and governing such part of them, as may be employed in the service of the United States; but to constitute this act as a constitutional right of placing the militia under the command of any officer not in the militia, except the president, would render nugatory the following reservation, that is, "reserving to the states respectively the appointment of the officers, and authority of training the militia," &c. Your committee consider this an important reservation in the federal constitution, favoring the sovereignty of the states, and tending to secure the rights of the people. It is not therefore to be surrendered to the general government. As well might the officers of the militia, appointed by this state, claim the right to command the army of the United States, as the officers of the army of the United States, to command the militia. There is no constitutional provision for either to claim such right or to exercise such command.

WM. CHAMBERLAIN,

For committee:

Montpelier, October 28, 1814.

The following is the resolution adopted by the honorable council, in compliance with the preceding report:

Resolved. That it is the opinion of the council, that it is not made the duty of his excellency, by the constitution of the United States to put the detached militia of this state, when in the actual service of the United States, under the command of any officer commissioned by the president; but such militia are to be commanded by officers appointed by the state or by the president in person." Adopted unanimously.

6

LEGISLATURE OF CONNECTICUT.

Report of the committee of defence, to the honorable the general assembly.

The committee to whom was referred the documents relating to the militia in the service of the United States, accompanying the governor's speech,

FURTHER REPORT,

That the late unexpected measure of the officer of the United States at New London, in withdrawing from the militia, in the national service, all supplies, appears by the documents before them, to have been grounded on an express order from the secretary of war.

For some time past—with what propriety your committee do not now enquire—the United States have been divided, by the national executive, into military districts, of which Connecticut and Rhode Island constituted one. In each of these districts is placed an officer of high rank, who by order of the president, assumes the sole power of calling for, and stationing the militia, and of commanding all forces, within his precincts, in service of the United States. To this district brigadier general CUSHING has been assigned, and is stationed at the garrisons in New London and Groton, with about half a regiment of soldiers under his command.

On the first of July the president of the United States, issued a circular from the war department, requesting the several executives to furnish their respective quotas of ninety-three thousand five hundred men, with proper officers, for the purpose of strengthening the Atlantic frontier against the public enemy, and assigned three thousand with a major general and other officers, as the proportion of this state. During the administrations of Washington, Adams, Jefferson, and the present chief magistrate, calls on the executives for detachments were made; but in every instance, which has come to the knowledge of the committee, were expressly authorised by a law of congress. Those laws have all been temporary—generally enacted for the occasion—and never of very long continuance. Before the late call by Mr. Madison the last had expired; and with a due regard to propriety, he denominated that an invitation—not claiming it as a measure of authority. The commander in chief, being very solicitous to preserve entire harmony in conducting the defence of our sea coast—although he had previously given orders to the whole militia of the state to be in readiness for service—detached and organized a corps of three thousand, and major general Taylor was assigned to the command. On the first day of August following, when a brigade under maj. general Isham was in the service of the United States at New London, and about three hundred militia on other parts of the coast—general Cushing was induced, by the number and hostile movements of the enemy, to call for a major part of general Taylor's detachment, and expressed his uncertainty how long the detention of the brigade already in service might be necessary. At the same time, he requested that the new troops might be under a brigadier, and the whole to be subjected to his command. As there was already in service more than the command of a brigadier, and a majority of general Taylor's corps was now called to the field, his excellency, with a just consideration of what was due to the rights of individual states by the national constitution and laws, directed that the commander should accompany his men. No doubt was entertained that the national officer would cheerfully acquiesce in the arrangement. The ill health of general Taylor delayed his arrival till the 11th September, before which time the brigade under general Isham was dismissed. As the Connecticut troops on that station had taken orders from the officer of the United States until the arrival of general Taylor, it was matter of just surprise, that any jealousy should be manifested by the general government, on account of the exercise of just command by an officer of the militia—and of still more surprise, that the only objection to the command was, that he had not men enough for an officer of his rank: when the general, who assigned that objection, had but about one half of a regiment in his district.

By the 98th article of the rules and articles of war, enacted by congress, when a body of militia and another of national troops so unite as to form one corps, the officer of highest grade shall command the whole. Whether the soldiers in the garrisons formed one corps, with the militia encamped at New London, within the meaning of the statute, the committee do not enquire, as the command of those forts has never been claimed by an officer of this state, and the superior rank of general Taylor renders the claim of the national officer to command his troops, unquestionably groundless. A major-general commanded at the same place, during a great proportion of the preceding season, with a much smaller detachment—and the troops were supplied and paid by the United States.

To the course adopted by general Cushing, he conceived himself bound by the secretary of war. In those orders the secretary expressly declares, "that when any number under four thousand is required, a major general cannot be recognized." Had the whole detachment of general Taylor been in the field, the consequences must have been the same. From that corps the supplies must, even then, have been withdrawn, though its organization was in precise conformity with the direction of the president; for it did not contain four thousand as required by the secretary of war.

Officers of this state have in no instance sought to command the national forces. When the troops, in the ordinary course of events, felt under an officer of high rank, no doubt can be entertained whether he ought to exercise the command assigned him, over the militia of this state. The course adopted by his excellency was in conformity with our constitutional rights, and with the plainest principles of law and military usage.

Since this unwarrantable measure of the general government, supplies have been furnished by the commissary of this state. Our defence against the public enemy cannot for a moment be abandoned. The people of this state will defend their territory from invasion, whatever they believe of the origin of the war—will submit to no unjust demands of a foreign nation—nor cease to discharge every constitutional duty, though deeply sensible of the injustice which they suffer. The wise and conciliatory course adopted by the commander in chief, evinces that the evils we endure were unavoidable, and that harmony with the national rulers could not have been more perfectly preserved, without a formal surrender of those high prerogatives, expressly reserved in the great charter of national sovereignty. By the blessing of Divine Providence, the states which share in the common calamities may still find redress, and the people of the nation become regardful of our rights. Signed by order,

HENRY CHAMPION.

In the upper house the foregoing report is accepted and approved.

Attest THOMAS DAY, Sec'y.

Concurred in the house of Representatives.

Attest CHARLES DENISON Clerk.

[The principle of this report is openly at war with the preceding adopted in Vermont, as to the right of the United States' officers to command the militia. "Who shall decide when doctors disagree?"]

HARTFORD, (CON.) Nov. 9.

The general assembly of this state closed their full session yesterday. Enclosed I send you the address of the governor to the two houses, and a copy of a resolution which was passed by an unanimous vote in the council, and with but six dissenting votes in the house.

Gentlemen of the Council, Mr. Speaker,

And Gentlemen of the House of Representatives,

I return you the thanks of the state for your faithful services during a protracted and laborious session—You assembled at a moment of great anxiety, and the inauspicious change in the national affairs which was soon after announced, has added a deep interest to your deliberations. The alternative of a degrading submission to a public enemy, or a manly resistance has occasioned you neither doubt, nor hesitation. Without changing your views of the character of the war, or of the mode of conducting it, you have evinced by your effective preparations, a just sensibility to the security and honor of your country.

But the extravagant demands of a foreign enemy, do not constitute the sole ground of alarm. It cannot be concealed that dangers of a most serious aspect approach us from another quarter. The embarrassment already experienced from the course pursued by the general government, connected with the bold and hazardous system of measures now in a train for execution, give to the affairs of this nation a solemnity which few of us have ever witnessed.

The eventful history of our commonwealth will undoubtedly show that the fathers of New-England have at times been assailed by equal dangers; and the same record will also show the spirit with which they repelled them. We have inherited the first fruit of their toils; shall it perish in our hands?

Let us hope that ere long a sense of justice will alike influence the common enemy, and our national councils, and that the constitution, that great bond of union, will escape the threatened violation; but let us remember that our security under the favor of Divine Providence, must depend on our own unceasing vigilance and exertions. You will feel the importance, gentlemen, of inculcating on our fellow citizens at this momentous juncture, that unanimity and firmness which you have here so eminently displayed. It is not improbable the preservation of our highest interest will require you to re-assemble at no distant day—at present, accept my devout wishes for your personal happiness and for the safety of our country.

RESOLUTION.

Whereas a plan of the secretary of the department of war for filling up the regular army of the United States has been submitted to the congress of the United States now in session, and a bill for an act to carry a part of the same into execution is pending before the house of representatives of the United States, the principles of which plan, and bill, if adopted, will place at the disposal of the administration of the United States' government, not only all the militia of this state, but the troops raised for the defence of this state, at a period when the state was left unprotected. And by the principles of which our sons, brothers and friends, are made liable to be delivered against their will, and by force, to the marshals and recruiting officers of the United States, to be employed, not for our own defence, but for the conquest of Canada, or upon any foreign service upon which the administration may choose to send them; or impose upon the people of this state "a capitation or other direct tax," limited by no rules but the will of officers appointed by the president of the United States.

And whereas the principles of the plan and bill aforesaid, are, in the opinion of this assembly, not only intolerably burdensome and oppressive, but utterly subversive of the rights and liberties of the people of this state, and the freedom, sovereignty and independence of the same, and inconsistent with the principles of the constitution of the United States.

And whereas, it will become the imperious duty of the legislature of this state to exert themselves to ward off a blow so fatal to the liberties of a free people—

Resolved by this assembly, That in case the plan and bill aforesaid, or any other bill on that subject, containing the principles aforesaid, shall be adopted, and assume the form of an act of congress, the governor of this state is hereby requested, forthwith to convoke the general assembly; and, to avoid delay, he is hereby authorised and requested to issue his proclamation, requiring the attendance of the members thereof, at such time and place as he may appoint, to the end that opportunity may be given to consider what measures may be adopted to secure and preserve the rights and liberties of the people of this state, and the freedom, sovereignty and independence of the same.

A true copy of record examined by THOMAS DAY, Secretary.

The following are some of the laws passed at the late session of the general assembly.

A law authorising the governor to borrow on the credit of the state 40,000 dollars.

A law increasing the salary of the governor to 1500 dollars; that of the lieutenant governor to 1000 dollars; and that of the comptroller of the state to 1000 dollars.

A law granting to the committee of safety 4 dollars each, for every day they may be called together for the service of the state.

A law authorising any city in this state to make bye-laws directing where a military rendezvous may be held, where soldiers may not be marched and exercised, to prevent disturbance from the soldiery on the sabbath, &c.

A law increasing military fines to 4 dollars for non appearance on the usual days of exercise; it provides also that the militia when called out en masse, pay 17 dollars for non-appearance, and 20 dollars for every month's delinquency. Commissioned officers are to be exempted from poll-tax the same as privates.

A law subjecting each and every owner of an extra stage, carriage, waggon, cart or sleigh, who shall be convicted of running the same in any town in this state on the sabbath (except in going to or coming from public worship), to a fine of 20 dollars. It also subjects the owners of mail stages to 20 dollars fine for every passenger they shall be convicted of having conveyed in such stage or stages on the sabbath. The passengers, if caught, are subject to the common fine for trespass of the sabbath.

A law authorising the governor, at his discretion, to employ any part of the military force of this state in defence of any adjoining state.

The governor is also authorised to purchase 2000 muskets, and a quantity of ordnance and other munitions of war.

A tax of two cents on the dollar on the list of 1813, is laid, payable in June next.

LEGISLATURE OF NEW-JERSEY.

GOVERNOR'S MESSAGE.

Gentlemen of the Council, and Gentlemen of the Assembly,

Since your adjournment the militia of our state, in the service of the United States, have all been discharged; the largest portion of which have been paid off, and satisfactory assurances given that the remainder will be paid in a few days. By the care and diligence of the treasurer, two months state allowance to the militia was paid about the time it became due; the remainder, being about one month's allowance, has been necessarily delayed a few weeks until the coming in of the annual tax, and will be discharged as soon as the pay rolls can be perfected.

The experience of the last year has manifested some defects in the militia law, which will require your particular attention. In pursuance of your joint resolution of the 8th of February last, I have obtained from the war department, an engagement to repay the monies expended by the state in the repairs of the arms mentioned in said resolution, as soon as vouchers shall have passed the proper offices. As those repairs were not done under my direction, I am not in possession of the necessary vouchers to enable me to present this account for adjustment. The adjutant general will lay before you the annual return of the militia. Sufficient time has not elapsed since the discharge of the militia to procure proper returns of the arms, ammunition and camp equipage. As soon as this can be done, a general return will be laid before you. In the recess of the legislature I have received communications from the governors of Georgia, North-Carolina and Vermont, accompanying resolutions of the legislatures of those states, which are herewith laid before you. It would have afforded great consolation if the prospect of peace had kept pace with the liberal and enlightened policy of our government to promote it; that the enemy have abandoned the iniquitous project of establishing a savage barrier between civilized nations, might have afforded some hope, if this had not been counterbalanced by new pretensions equally exceptionable.

It cannot have escaped your observation, gentlemen, that a combination is forming in the eastern states hostile to the constitution and government of the union, threatening a separation of the states. An honorable union, formed under the pressure of common danger, and cemented with the blood of patriots; a constitution devised by the venerable statesmen and sages of the revolution calculated to preserve the liberties and promote the happiness of unborn millions; are about to be broken up and cast to the wind, in a paltry struggle for the gratification of a silly ambition to govern. Had this section of the union in time of peace seceded from the union, the act would have been greatly to have been deplored, and would in that case, have merited the appellation of folly; but to meditate the desertion of their brethren in the midst of a dangerous war, and thereby excite the exertions and encourage the hopes of a vindictive enemy, gives rise to emotions easier felt than described. Language scarcely furnishes epithets of sufficient opprobrium, to apply to this dereliction of every honorable feeling of the mind. Was it for this return that the intrepid warriors of America, led by the illustrious Washington, unfurled the triumphant banners of the union on the plains of Massachusetts, and drove the enemy in disgrace from the capitol? Can it be endured that the holy edifice of our freedom, erected by the combined wisdom and labor of the revolutionary patriots, should be demolished by the wicked acts of a combination of men whose claims to public consideration rests on no better foundation than an insatiable thirst of power? It must not be understood that it is intended to involve in this censure the body of citizens of the eastern states—their steady habits and virtuous deportment entitles them to great respect and consideration. Candor, however, requires us to deal plainly with them, apprising them of the situation in which they are placed, that they are artfully led by unprincipled ambitious men to the verge of treason, and a favorable opportunity only wanted to plunge them and their country into irretrievable ruin and disgrace. There is every reason to hope, that as soon as the veil in which this conspiracy against the happiness and prosperity of America is attempted to be shrouded is fully removed, and the monster exposed in its naked deformity, that the virtuous yeomanry of New-England, warned by danger, and animated with patriotism, will rise in their strength and strangle it in its cradle.

Should it be said that the object of the eastern malcontents is not to dissolve the union, but only to compel the general government to change its measures, and pursue those marked out by them, or at most to compel those in the administration to abandon their stations to make way for themselves, the deleterious effect on the constitution would in that case be even worse. In one case, a portion of the union would be severed from the great body, which might become scander by the amputation; in the other, the constitution itself would be shaken to its foundation. If an eastern confederacy can control the government, why not a middle, a southern or a western do the same? It requires no argument to prove that a body with four or five heads constitutes a monster.

The fate of Greece ought to furnish a lesson of instruction to every subsequent confederacy of states. While united, it successfully withstood the combined powers of the Persian empire; but as soon as the league was broken by a combination of members against its head, and jealousy among themselves, it fell an easy prey to the first invader, and at this day groans in chains, a deplorable monument of the folly of selfish policy, local jealousy and private ambition. One defect in the Grecian confederacy was, that the laws acted on the states in their aggregate capacity, and not on the individual citizens; delinquency was therefore punished by coercing the states; this necessarily produced violence, and violence anarchy. The framers of our excellent constitution have wisely corrected this defect. The laws of the United States act on the citizens independent of the state authorities. The violators of the laws of the union may be brought to justice and compelled to obedience, without consulting the states or in any way intermeddling with the portion of sovereignty reserved to the state governments. The friends of the government will therefore have a rallying point, and find protection in the laws of the United States. This principle well attended to will be found to have an important influence in the preservation of the union.

Whatever may be the real motive, the ostensible complaint against the government at this time is the war. I think I am warranted in saying, that no well informed man, free from British attachments, is to be found, that denies that the injuries inflicted on the persons and property of our citizens by Great Britain afforded, on the principles of the laws of nature and nations, a justifiable cause of war. These injuries were avowed, persisted in, and justified by the British ministry, and satisfaction for the past and security for the future directly and peremptorily denied before the war was declared. The war must, therefore, be considered a legitimate legal war in the view of civilized nations; and, as it respects ourselves, constitutionally declared. It must, however, be admitted, that there are a considerable number of respectable citizens in our country, who think that it would have been wiser to have borne in quiet the injuries inflicted on us, than to have encountered the calamities incident to a state of war, to redress them; that on this question of public policy the government misjudged. The result of the frequent elections since the declaration of war evinces, however, that this is not the sentiment of the majority of the nation. But in compliance with the desires of the minority, the government has done every thing towards obtaining peace that could be done consistently with the safety and honor of the country. Very soon after the war broke out, our government, in answer to a communication from admiral Warren, offered the British government to treat of peace, and for nearly two years have had commissioners in Europe for that purpose. These commissioners, with full authority from the government, have offered the enemy reasonable terms of peace; these terms have not yet been accepted, but on the other hand the enemy have set up unreasonable and humiliating demands on us, such as no man in our country has yet been found so destitute of virtue and public spirit as to advocate the acceptance of.

It appears to me, that a man who opposes the prosecution of the war is bound to say that the condition of peace offered by the enemy is such as ought to have been accepted; otherwise he is involved in the absurdity of acknowledging that we cannot have peace, and yet declaring, by his actions at least, that we must not have war. A candid examination of the communications contained in the despatches from our commissioners in Europe, must carry conviction to every mind, that our government is seriously disposed to peace. Should it, however, so happen that the enemy should offer us such terms of peace as ought to be accepted, and, contrary to every reasonable expectation, the government should be so insensible to its duty and regardless of the interest of the nation as to reject them, we should stand in need of no partial convention at Hartford, or elsewhere, to stop the progress of the war. The unanimous voice of a free people would be heard; no administration would be hardy enough to refuse to listen to it.

In our present situation we have no alternative left but war or submission. After the glorious stand made the last campaign against the power of the British empire, nothing short of the basest cowardice or foulest treason can suggest the latter. Heaven has committed to our keeping an invaluable stake, no less than the liberties and independence of the only free government on earth. A remembrance of the virtues of our ancestors urges to the performance of a pious duty; posterity requires it at our hands; nothing more is wanting to the accomplishment of this great object than a love of country. With a strict observance of this vital principle of free government, and a rational reliance on an all-wise and overruling Providence, we may look forward with confidence to a happy issue to the conflict in which we are engaged.

I have not the presumption to say, that in making the foregoing observations I have not been more under the influence of feeling than wisdom. It is difficult, however, to judge correctly of the interest of the nation, without feeling for its happiness and prosperity. If an apology is wanting for touching upon this subject at all, it is to be found in the momentous crisis in the affairs of our country, calling for measures of a decided and determined character.

WILLIAM S. PENNINGTON.

LEGISLATURE OF PENNSYLVANIA.

GOVERNOR'S MESSAGE.

To the senate and house of representatives of the commonwealth of Pennsylvania.

Fellow-Citizens—Since the adjournment of the last legislature, events have occurred of a character more interesting and impressive than any to be found in our annals for the last thirty years, nor has the history of the old world been less eventful or imposing. The extraordinary overturnings and raising up of thrones in Europe, and the elevation and prostration of royal families, have been so wonderful, rapid and unexpected as to excite our profoundest astonishment, and most serious reflection. Our extensive commerce, spirit of enterprise, and surplus productions have so intermixed our interests with those of the nations of Europe that even in a time of peace we could not have been indifferent or uninterested spectators of the mighty scenes which have passed before us. Involved, however, as we are in a just and unavoidable war, with one of the most powerful nations of the world, we could not but mark with solicitude, events which promised to relieve our enemy from all resistance and restraint elsewhere, and enable him to turn his whole force, resources and undivided attention upon us. The enemy has availed himself of such a state of things, so far as to send considerable reinforcements of veteran troops to his North American possessions, and a large fleet and well appointed army, to blockade our bays and rivers, and bombard, destroy, and lay waste all our assailable villages, towns and cities. This force, by a rapid movement, exposing itself to capture or destruction, penetrated to Washington city. It was captured with attendant circumstances of barbarism, which disgrace and render hateful the conquerors, who thus outraged all the laws and usages of honorable warfare. The consternation which was excited on the seaboard, is almost inconceivable to those who reside in the interior. Happily, however, for our country and for human nature, it was the last triumph of barbarian arms. Discomfiture and disgrace have followed hard upon him ever since. At Baltimore the militia marched forth to meet the veterans of Britain, the spirit of the revolution was roused, the invading army were compelled to retreat, and the bombarding fleet compelled to retire, and the mothers, wives and children of the brave once more slept in quiet.

The army of Niagara, under the dauntless general Brown, stayed the onward course of the British troops and by displays of consummate skill and heroic bravery taught them to do homage to American soldiers. On Lake Champlain the squadron of the gallant commodore Macdonough has conquered and captured another fleet, again irradiated with glory our flag, and in conjunction with the army of the brave general Macomb has preserved the peace of an immense tract of country and shielded the inhabitants from the tomahawk of the savage.

Our small ships and privateers have covered the seas; and on the seacoast of the enemy, they have been so vigilant and courageous that it has become unsafe for him to pass even from one of his own ports to another—they have retaliated upon the enemy the system of capturing and destroying to an extent greater than he could have imagined, and, as if in mock of the blockade, our vessels and their prizes have come in and run out as at pleasure. Their skill, seamanship and valor, will carry our fame upon the wings of the wind, and the waves of the waters, teach all nations to respect us, and acknowledge that though patient, and long suffering, we will neither be injured nor insulted with impunity.

The latest advices induce a belief in some minds that peace may possibly result out of our mission to Europe, and that the thousands and tens of thousands of armed men, who overspread its continent may again unsheath their swords and again struggle for victory and dominion. Let the result of the negotiations at Ghent or at Vienna be what it may, it is the part of wisdom and of patriotism to calculate upon, and prepare for, war rather than peace. If honorable peace comes, come when it will, it will be welcome, and we shall always be prepared to receive it; but if we mistakenly repose in the prospect of peace, we may unpreparedly be awakened by the thunder of the enemy's cannon. In energy, decision and preparation, there is safety and honor, but any other course will inevitably lead to suffering and disgrace. To you, the representatives of the people, the people have a right to look, and do look for the performance of all those extraordinary duties which the times impose on you. The last summer has read to us such a lesson as I trust we shall profit by, and that, if these ruthless invaders come again, they will find us every where prepared and resolute.

The conflagration of Washington and the continued menacing language and attitude of the enemy having excited general anxiety and solicitude for the safety of Philadelphia, I repaired to that city, accompanied by the secretary of the commonwealth and state treasurer, whose presence and advice very much facilitated the objects of my journey, which were to get into the field, arm and equip a force adequate to the defence of that city, and the shores of the Delaware: by an unremitted attention, and acting in concert with the general commanding for the United States in this district, such a force was obtained, notwithstanding considerable embarrassment caused by the almost exhausted condition of the United States' arsenal. From an order by the war department directing the generals of military districts to supply with equipments the militia called into service, I had inferred that camp equipments, arms and munitions of war were in store ready for delivery. I was mistaken: in consequence of large requisitions having been previously made from the south. These difficulties, however, and many others were surmounted, and so respectable a force encamped as has probably contributed to deter the enemy from any attempt against the capital of the state.

Whilst on this subject, I may be permitted to remark that the various and important duties incumbent on the executive, which can only be discharged at the seat of government, where the records and state seals are kept, will not allow of his absence for long periods, without great public inconvenience; it is therefore to be avoided. The exposure to invasion of the eastern and western sections of Pennsylvania requires, for their defence, that the earliest and most correct information of the situation of those parts of the state should be conveyed to the executive by persons in whose talents, integrity and devotion to the support of the government of the state and United States, in all their lawful and constitutional measures, he can fully confide. I suggest the utility of authorizing a commission of such persons as well for the above specified purpose as for that of confidentially communicating and co operating with the United States' commanding general of the district. The sanction of legislative authority would give respectability to such a body, and their being appointed by, and responsible to, the government, would insure more confidence, and be less liable to distrust or suspicion, than an irregular or unauthorized association.

The militia of this state, now and lately in the field, under requisitions from the president of the United States, turned out at their country's call, with a promptitude which reflects upon them signal honor. It was particularly gratifying to observe that when danger was impending, many volunteer companies were formed, uniformed and officered, in compliance with an invitation contained in general orders of the 27th of August last. These corps, composed of the most respectable citizens, repaired with a laudable zeal to Philadelphia, then considered in imminent danger. They were then organized into battalions and regiments, and officered agreeably to the provisions of our militia law. It is much to be regretted that any portion of such companies, animated by honorable motives and intentions, and received into the United States service, under a special guarantee of the rights and privileges secured to them by the laws of Pennsylvania, should have had their ardor damped, their harmony destroyed, and their officers treated with disrespect arrested and arraigned. It would be in vain to seek for any honorable or public spirited incentive to a proceeding, which, while it wounds the just pride of men of worth and courage, it essentially injures the public service.

I would be culpable, while thus doing justice to the merits of the militia of one section of the state, were I to omit stating to the legislature the high sense I entertain of the patriotism and courage of those generous militia who, without order or invasion, flew to arms, and of their own good will marched to Baltimore and had the honor to aid in repulsing the enemy. Such devotion to the public weal, if universal, would soon compel the enemy to abandon the system of marauding and depredating, upon which he has so uniformly acted. While we acknowledge the high deserts of those who marched to the defence of the seaboard, let us not be unmindful of the brave Pennsylvania militia, who, at the battles of Chippewa and Bridgewater, gloriously redeemed the honor which had been compromised on the shores of the Niagara. This regiment, having faithfully performed its tour of duty, was honored by the thanks of the commanding general. They deserve well of the state and of their country.

Although the laudable enterprise and emulation of our fellow-citizens has hitherto in a great measure, supplied the many defects of our militia law, yet so numerous and obvious are its imperfections, that to apportion equally upon all the burthens caused by the war, an entire revision of the system is indispensable. One of its sections, commanding militia officers of certain grades to communicate to the legislature the defects they may discover, and a persuasion that much information has been collected in the summer by the gentlemen of the legislature, I shall not attempt to detail the errors and contradictions of the law. I will, however, take occasion to remark that there is in Pennsylvania an over proportion of cavalry. It is ascertained that for service they are not in demand; except as videttes none have been required by the general government. It follows that a horseman and an exempt are, in our militia law, almost synonymous. I recommend, that rifle and artillery corps be promoted and cherished; they are believed to be the best defence of our country, and it is presumed that experience has demonstrated that our sharp shooters and gunners are equal to any in the world.

Uniform certainly produces a most valuable effect in our militia, as it never fails to excite a portion of soldierly pride. When well appointed volunteer corps and not uniformed militia companies are encamped together, or meet on parade, the one is apt to feel envy, and the other to show contempt; these and other considerations induce me to suggest the uniforming the militia at the public expense; when called into actual service. The expense of a cheap uniform and a provision for the family of the poor man, who endangers health and life without any other stake in the public cause than his personal, political and religious liberty, would be a tax which should be willingly paid by the opulent. If this scheme be deemed ineligible, I suggest that the promise of the state to repay the price of the uniform to every man who performs faithfully a full tour of duty, would probably be inducements sufficiently strong for the militia to uniform themselves.

That a well organized and well disciplined militia is the truest safeguard of the republic, I am firmly convinced. Yet when we are at war with a vigilant and veteran enemy, who with his numerous fleets commands our bays and rivers, by facility of transportation, excites constant alarms, and makes necessary the stationing of forces at all exposed places; when we take into consideration the great sacrifices made by individuals, and the injury to the state by the interruption of the labor of farmers, mechanics and manufacturers, that is occasioned by frequent calls upon the militia. When the enormous expense caused thereby, and the time lost in marching them from distant places, and training them for service, are also considered, I cannot but deem it my duty to recommend the raising immediately a few regiments to serve during the war for the defence of the state. Such a permanent, well disciplined force, supported and reinforced as occasion might require by drafted or volunteer militia would prove economical, preserve many valuable lives, prevent individual distress and public loss, and add much to the security of the country. I would call your attention to the establishment of a medical department, as essential to the health of the troops, and will take occasion also to remark, that the duties imposed on the adjutant general are so important, various and diffuse, that it is impossible, particularly in a state of war, for any individual to perform them.

Amongst the munitions of war provided for our militia, of which a detailed account will be furnished in the adjutant general's report, will be found, tents sufficient to cover more than 17,000 men, and a large quantity of other camp equipments: 1000 rifles have been received out of the United States' arsenal, and repaired at the expense of the state, and 360 new ones have been purchased. These arms, with nearly 8000 muskets received from the United States, as part of the quota of Pennsylvania, under an act of congress for arming the whole militia, added to the state arms repaired and repairing, and a respectable park of artillery will furnish a force sufficient, under providence, to repel any army the enemy may land. There is now in the state arsenal in the city of Philadelphia, much valuable property. The discharge of the militia now and lately in the service of the United States, will considerably increase it. The care of the arsenal ought to be confided to some persons of known integrity, who might also superintend the safe keeping and repairing of the public arms.

Some disbursements may have been made not in the contemplation of the last legislature, such as the purchase of blankets and warm clothing for those of our volunteers and militia who left home in the summer, and were to continue in the field in very severe weather, and had not the means nor the opportunity to provide for themselves; these articles were tendered for so much as they cost, and so accepted by the receiver on account of his pay. The health and comfort of the men could only by such a measure be secured. I trust, therefore, that this act, and an advance of money to contractors to purchase provisions for our troops hastily collected for the defence of Philadelphia and the shores of the Delaware, will meet the approbation of an enlightened legislature.—As many, if not all of the men furnished with blankets and clothing are poor, and have families to maintain by their daily labor, it would be an act of kindness, if not of justice, to relieve them from the condition on which those articles were furnished—the sum expended amounts not to more than 11,624 dollars 63 cents.

Under a law passed the 25th February last, a loan was obtained from the Philadelphia Bank of $100,000, before the rising of the last legislature, to replenish the treasury, which had been exhausted by extraordinary expenses at Erie, and by the purchase of munitions of war there and elsewhere. The receipts of the commonwealth, however, proving adequate in the month of August last to a repayment, and deeming the anticipated receipts as sufficient to meet any probable demands on the treasury, I ordered a repayment of the loan, connecting with the act the expression of a wish that the bank, if required, would again aid the government. In the autumn an application was made, and that institution very honorably, at the rate of interest prescribed in its charter, relented to the state $100,000. The hostile attitude maintained by our enemy on our seaboard, and the peculiar situation of the general government required the application of the resources of the commonwealth to provide the necessary means of defence; heavy expenses were necessarily incurred, which, together with large demands lately made under the act entitled "An act for the improvement of the state," made additional loans necessary; a general account of which, and of other matters relative to the financial concerns of the state reported to me, accompanies this communication. This and a more detailed account hereafter to be exhibited, embracing also the accounts of the adjutant general and his deputies, and of payments made to Pennsylvania militia in the service of the United States, will be such an exhibition of our finances as will satisfactorily show the necessity of the loans, and the faithful and economical appropriation of the public means, and induce the legislature to adopt measures for replenishing the public treasury, and providing against the want of future loans. It is gratifying to know that our resources are abundant and untouched.

Heretofore to express my opinion against an increase of the banking institutions has been a painful duty. That bank paper has been too much multiplied is now generally admitted; but inasmuch as it exists under the guarantee of legislative acts, and as much of the property of the state, as well as of individuals, is involved, it is incumbent to protect the banks, as far as justice and the constitution will permit. By the purchase of British government bills and British goods smuggled into our country, and through other means adopted by enemy partisans, such immense sums of gold and silver have been drawn from the banks of the middle and southern states to the eastward, and thence into the coffers of the enemy, as has made it necessary for most of our banks to stop specie payments. This precautionary measure, I have learned, has produced a threat of a suit at law being commenced against one of the banks. Should this be realized, and judgment and execution follow, the presumption is that a similar fate would await the other banks. Thus the whole system would become shaken, and the state and individuals be seriously embarrassed. Fully aware of the delicacy of this subject, yet satisfied that it demands legislative interference, I submit it to your judgments to make such provision as the interest of the commonwealth and the welfare of the community require.

Although numerous and interesting subjects, arising out of the peculiar situation of our country, will occupy much of your attention, it is hoped the importance of education and diffusion of knowledge, the encouragement and fostering of manufactures, as the principal mean to perpetuate the real and practical independence of our country will have a share of your deliberations, as will also the report of the attorney general on the subject of criminal jurisprudence—the suppression of that baleful and immoralizing practice, horse-racing, and its concomitant vices, gambling—the regulation and equalization of tavern licenses—certain suggestions relative as well to the sale of unseated lands, for taxes, as to the arbitration system—to the frequent sitting aside verdicts of juries—to larcenies committed without the state—to the inefficiency of the writ of habeas corpus—to the frequent petitions for pardon, urging the want of employment for convicts as the ground for the application—to the want of a court of revision in capital cases—are subjects, some of them, if not all, of much interest, which in a communication dated the 10th of December, 1813, I had submitted to the consideration of the last legislature, but from the great press of more important business, it is presumed, were passed over, I beg leave to submit them again, and for motive and object to refer the legislature to that communication.

At a period so eventful as the present it cannot be too often inculcated that the integrity, freedom and happiness of our country eminently depends on the energy and wisdom of those who administer the national government, and the confidence which the people shall manifest in them, as well as in the support which that government receives from the states composing the union; in proportion as these truths are felt and acknowledged will be the regret you will feel, as citizens and legislators, at the undisguised hostility which is manifested in the eastern section of the union, against the measures adopted or proposed for the preservation of our rights, national and individual. Rights which the God of nature has bountifully bestowed upon us, and the enjoyment of which is inseparable from our existence as an independent nation. This conduct is the more justly offensive, inasmuch as the ground taken for hostility is produced by those opponents who withhold as much as in them lies, men, money, credit, confidence and affection, in a word, all means vigorously to conduct the war and honorably attain peace. These men no longer in private whisper their schemes, but in public legislative debate and acts avow their intention to sever the union. These are events deeply to be deplored by every friend of freedom and humanity, as preludes to a civil war, the most unprofitable, disastrous, and sanguinary of all conflicts; however we may regret or disapprove of such unnatural and unjustifiable dispositions and deportment, we are not now called upon to legislate or act upon them; if we were I am sure the constituted authorities and people of Pennsylvania, would unitedly, rally round the standard of the union, and put down the machinations of all disorganizers, and execute the laws upon all traitors who should dare to take up arms against our happy union, and set at naught the constitution which is hallowed by the name of the immortal Washington.

The situation of our country is perilous, but by no means desperate. Our cause is just, our resources great, our fellow-citizens brave, intelligent and patriotic; it is only necessary that competent authority should bring them into action, and our country will, by the blessing of Heaven, ride triumphantly through the storm. It will be my pride and pleasure to co-operate with you in every measure which shall promise to promote the happiness of our constituents and country.

SIMON SNYDER.

Harrisburg, December, 10th, 1814.

LEGISLATURE OF MARYLAND.

GOVERNOR'S MESSAGE.

Council chamber, Dec. 10, 1814.

GENTLEMEN—On addressing you at the opening of the present session, it is to be regretted that the aspect of our public affairs affords little cause for congratulation.

The appearance of the enemy on our coast early in the summer as was predicted by the legislature at their last session, rendered it necessary to make the best preparations for defence of which the state was capable. Accordingly the militia of counties most liable to invasion were called into actual service; and as the situation of the country became more alarming, such a portion of the troops as could with prudence be spared from the third division (two thousand of them having marched, agreeably to the president's requisition of April, for the defence of Baltimore) were also directed to hold themselves in readiness to repair at a moment's notice to the scene of danger.

These armaments together with the incidental purchase and transportation of military stores and provisions, have necessarily required very considerable disbursements: yet if we advert to the desultory kind of warfare which the enemy is pursuing, and consider the harassing service to which our men must consequently be exposed, it is presumed that the expenditures will not be found incompatible with the most judicious economy.

In compliance with the requisition of the president on the executive, dated the 4th of July, for the state to furnish six thousand troops for the general defence, orders were issued to the different brigadiers to organize, and cause to proceed to the designated rendezvous, their respective quotas of men. These orders were obeyed with as much promptitude as our present militia system is capable of enforcing. On the 19th of August last, we received a letter (of which No. 1 is a copy) from the general commanding the tenth military district, stating that he had "been authorised by the president to accept on behalf of the United States, all the militia then in service, under the authority of the state of Maryland, as well elsewhere as at Annapolis." Giving to this communication the construction which the liberality of its proposition appeared to justify, and which seemed so congenial with the spirit of the constitution, which provides for the general defence, the executive of Maryland, on the 17th of October, wrote the letter marked No. 2, to the secretary of war, requesting explicit information as to the time when the acceptance of our militia took effect; they also referred him to an act of congress passed on the 18th of April last, which provides, that the expences incurred in cases of calls on the militia made by the authority of a state or territory, which may be approved by the president, shall be adjusted and paid by the United States. Conscious that our calls upon the militia had been made exclusively for the purpose of repelling invasion, which might reasonably be considered one of the cases contemplated by the above recited act, it could not be presumed that the president would hesitate to sanction them. In this just expectation we have, however, been disappointed. No notice having been taken of our first application to the secretary, it was repeated on the 11th ultimo, but an answer from him has not yet been received.

Of the loans authorized by the resolution of May, 1813, for four hundred and fifty thousand dollars, and of the last session for one hundred and fifty thousand; four hundred and thirty-six thousand have been obtained. Of this sum one hundred and twenty-seven thousand two hundred and ten dollars and twenty three cents, have been expended under the appropriation of one hundred and eighty thousand dollars for the purchase of arms; and one hundred and seventy-four thousand eight hundred and one dollars and twenty-three cents, in defraying the expences of the militia; a balance therefore remains of one hundred and thirty-three thousand nine hundred and eighty-eight dollars and fifty-four cents, from which, if the balance of the appropriations for arms, viz: fifty-two thousand seven hundred and eighty-nine dollars and seventy-seven cents be deducted, there will remain but eighty-one thousand one hundred and ninety eight dollars and seventy-seven cents; a sum, we believe, inadequate to satisfy the claims already incurred for militia services.

To raise funds for this object, and for our defence for the ensuing year, whether by loan at an additional interest, or by a sale of public stock, (for taxation seems to have been extended to its utmost bounds) rests with the wisdom of the legislature.

We beg leave to observe, that as the general government has given so many equivocal proofs of a defect either of ability or inclination to afford us protection, nothing remains but that we call forth those means of defence which are still in our possession. We would, therefore, suggest the propriety of considering whether it would not be advisable to raise, by enlistment, a certain number of troops expressly for the defence of the state; their service to continue during the war, and they to receive the same pay and to enjoy the same privileges as soldiers of the United States. It appears to us that eight or ten regiments might be advantageously organized in this manner, and employed according to circumstances, either in conjunction with or separately from the militia. This corps would speedily communicate to the latter an emulative spirit and habits of subordination, and thus the state of Maryland might soon boast of an efficient force, without having recourse to an unconstitutional and slavish conscription. Should the plan now proposed not meet the approbation of the legislature, a revision of our militia laws will become indispensable.

In the third year of a war, which we ever deprecated as unnecessary in its origin, and ruinous in its consequences, we behold our national treasury exhausted, our councils confused and vacillating, and the people bowed down with difficulties, while the administration are as far from obtaining the ostensible object of contention as when they issued the first Canadian proclamation; nay, they have even abandoned it as a forlorn hope; for in the late instructions to our envoys, it is no longer insisted on, as a sine qua non of a treaty, that Great Britain shall relinquish the right of impressment. Amidst this general suffering we have, however, the consolation to perceive a spirit of liberty and love of country, animating the breasts of our citizens. Though we are baffled in all our attempts at foreign conquests, success attended our gallant navy, and (with one disgraceful exception) victory has crowned us in every conflict.

undertaken in defence of our homes. Here we fight the cause of virtue, and may therefore rely on the protection of Heaven.

We have the honor to be, with great respect, your obedient servants,

WILLIAM B. MARTIN.

President of the council.

The hon. the General Assembly.

(No. 1.)

Washington, August 18, 1814.

Sir—I have been authorised by the president to accept on behalf of the United States all the militia now in the service under the authority of the state of Maryland, as well elsewhere, as at Annapolis. This includes the cavalry here, as also general Stuart's command below. As I have no doubt that it will be acceptable to you, I have been making provisional arrangements with colonel Tilghman and general Stuart. You will please, therefore, send your order to general Stuart to that effect, and direct colonel Hood to take my order, and to send without delay a return of his strength.

(Signed)

WM. H. WINDER.

Clerk of the council.

(No. 2.)

Council Chamber, Oct. 17, 1814.

Sir—We sometime ago received a letter from brig. gen. Winder, informing us, that he had "been authorised by the president to accept on behalf of the United States all the militia then in service under the authority of the state of Maryland, including cavalry as well as infantry," but as we do not know the exact period whence to date this acceptance, we must request the favor of you to give us the necessary information, that we may give directions to have the pay rolls and militia accounts arranged in conformity thereto, preparatory to their being presented for a final adjustment.

As connected with this subject, we beg leave to call your attention to the 10th section of an act of congress, passed on the 18th of April last, entitled "an act in addition to the act to provide for calling forth the militia to execute the laws of the union, &c." by this clause it is provided "that the expenses incurred, or to be incurred, by marching the militia of any state or territory of the United States to their places of rendezvous, in pursuance of a requisition of the president of the United States, or which shall have been or may be incurred in cases of calls made by the authority of any state or territory which shall have been or may be approved by him, shall be adjusted and paid in like manner as the expenses incurred after their arrival at such place of rendezvous on the requisition of the president of the United States, &c."

It appears evidently to us that this law intended to embrace all expenses of the militia necessarily incurred in the defence of any state or part thereof; we therefore deem it expedient to inform you, that a considerable portion of the militia of Maryland were called into service for the express purpose of aiding commodore Barney's flotilla in the Patuxent; an entire brigade was also engaged in defending the shores of St. Mary's and Charles counties, when the enemy entered the Potomac; a number of troops were employed also in repelling marauding parties from some of the counties on the eastern shore, and others were ordered out for the defence of Baltimore, prior to the president's first requisition. As all these calls were made for the safety of the state, and such only as her exposed situation imperiously demanded, we trust that the president will have no hesitation to sanction them, and order an adjustment in the mode contemplated by the act of congress. We respectfully solicit your early attention to this subject, and are, sir, with due consideration,

Your obedient servants,

LEVIN WINDER.

The hon. the secretary of war.

LEGISLATURE OF VIRGINIA.

COUNCIL CHAMBER, OCT. 10, 1814.

Fellow citizens of the senate and house of delegates.

Weighty considerations, arising from the peculiar state of our affairs, induced the executive to convoke the legislature.

The war continues to rage with unabated malignity on the part of the enemy, who, profiting by the course of events in Europe, has greatly enlarged the scale, while he has materially changed the theatre of his operations. The war is no longer waged at a distance—it has been brought into the bosom of our country, conducted in a spirit of Vandalism, and with a view to ulterior purposes, which cannot fail to arouse whatever of patriotism, of courage, of pride, and of indignation, exists among men who duly appreciate their liberty and honor, and who are resolved to defend them. To repel these audacious pretensions, it is necessary to call forth the energies of the nation. The representatives of the people, the depository of the public will, can alone effect this desirable object; and hence you have been thus early convened in general assembly.

It is not to be disguised that the present is a day of trial to our country—a consequence of the extraordinary revolution which has occurred in Europe, and which will form an epoch in its history. For the war, which had so long desolated that portion of the earth, terminated against all human calculation in the downfall of France. The overwhelming confederacy which had been leagued against her, entered her capital in triumph, and from thence dictated the terms of her submission. She was compelled to relinquish those conquests which had extended her empire to distant lands, and, retiring within her ancient limits, exhausted and spiritless, she reposes again under the sceptre of a Bourbon.

In this wonderful revolution some among us believed they saw the sure pledges of universal peace. The pretexts to which Great Britain resorted as a justification of her continued outrage and injury to us no longer existed.—The spectre of universal conquest which had so long haunted her own imagination, and the fear of which she had but too successfully imparted to others, was suddenly laid by the humiliating deposition and exile of the extraordinary character who had so long filled the world with the renown of his exploits, while he disturbed its repose by the restlessness of his ambition.

Had the counsels of Great Britain been directed by moderation, a sense of justice, or a regard of the happiness of mankind, the world, once more, would have been at peace. The result, however, shews that these are considerations, which have no influence with her. For at a moment so favorable to her interest, when the course of events had left her nothing to ask for, and when in some degree she was lulling our vigilance to sleep by holding out prospects of peace, as likely to result from a negotiation solicited by herself, and met by us in the sincerest spirit of conciliation, she determined to execute against us a fell and malignant purpose. Suddenly relieved from fear by the downfall of her once formidable rival, and availing herself of the great means of annoyance prepared for European operations, she dispatched formidable armaments to the United States, to lay waste and desolate every assailable point, if not annihilate our very existence as a nation. It is a source of joy and pride, mingled with devout gratitude to the Great Disposer of events, that these hostile designs have been uniformly resisted with firmness and success, with the exception of an intrusion by surprise into the capital of the union, and the humiliating capitulation of a neighboring town. We have seen inferior numbers, directed by experienced generals, achieving prodigies of valor. We have seen raw and undisciplined militia driving the conquerors of Portugal, of Spain, and of France, and whilst binding around their own brows unfading laurels, throwing an everlasting shade on the military character of the enemy. Champlain, Plattsburg, Niagara and Erie, have been the theatres of our glory, and will be cherished by every genuine American with the fondest recollections; while the names of heroes by whose valorous spirit these splendid achievements have been effected, are by the common consent of mankind, consecrated to imperishable fame. Upon these propitious events, I beg leave to congratulate you.

In the interesting period which I have been describing, Virginia has been called to act an important part. The enemy has continually carried on a war against our Atlantic frontier, marked with circumstances of atrocity, which, while ruinous to individuals, has been infamous to himself. Wheresoever he has landed, his footsteps are to be traced by scenes of rapine and conflagration. His invasions were sudden and by surprise, while his retreats were precipitate and cowardly. He was every where met by the local militia.

So soon as the great events before alluded to had occurred in Europe, the executive of this commonwealth, expecting nothing from the forbearance of England, was apprehensive that Virginia, for various reasons, would become the theatre of her hostile operations. Studiously avoiding, however, on the one hand either the unnecessary harrassment of our militia or the premature expenditure of the small fund appropriated to military purposes, we avoided for some time actually employing a force for the defence of the interior; but on the other hand, feeling the necessity of being prepared as well as our limited means would permit, we directed twenty-four regiments of the neighbouring militia to be held in readiness, completely armed and equipped to take the field at a moment's warning. At length appearances became so menacing, that it was deemed advisable to aid the local militia by a respectable detachment from a distance, a measure which received the sanction of the general government. Upon the entering of our waters of the last formidable armament of the enemy, the number of the troops assembled in the neighborhood was doubled, and after the successful attack on Washington, with the destruction of property which attended it, large masses of militia were directed to take the field. To this course we were invited by a determination to cause our measures to be equal to a successful defence, and to supply the defect of discipline by superiority of numbers.—In addition to which, I appealed to the patriotism of my fellow citizens, and called upon them to rally around the unfurled banners of their country. This appeal was not made in vain. For the moment, party distinctions were forgotten—every description of citizens, the high and the low, from the east and the west, and from the north and the south, animated by one sentiment came rushing on; they surrounded their capitol, the monument of their independence, and swore they would defend it or die—a spectacle was exhibited most grateful to the friends of republican government. It presented the proudest day which Virginia has seen since the foundation of the commonwealth. A few days only elapsed before it became necessary to arrest by another proclamation the influx of our martial citizens—and, indeed, upon ascertaining the numbers already arrived, multitudes were disbanded. Nor were the exertions of our fellow citizens confined within the limits of Virginia. Washington and Baltimore also witnessed their patriotism and ardor; and in the defence of the latter, they acquitted themselves so honorably as to attract the attention and receive the approbation of their commanding general.

As the assemblage of so large a force for the defence of the state had not been anticipated, many of these brave men for weeks together were deprived of every accommodation. With no other shelter than the canopy of heaven, they stretched themselves on the naked earth, encountering every privation without a murmur. And were the records of time to be explored, I know not the nation of any age which would bear the palm from Virginia, for devotion to the laws, subordination to discipline, acquiescence under privations, and distinguished proofs of zeal and patriotism, and courage.

Whilst candor requires we should admit, that the conflict in which we are engaged is of the last importance to the interest and happiness of our country, and calls for great sacrifices, both of personal services and money, yet we may look with confidence to the issue, when we reflect on the character of the American people, who hold all things worthless, when compared with their honor, their rights, and their independence—that, however humiliating to us the conflict may be in opposing high minded and honorable freemen, to the outcasts of every nation which compose the legions of the enemy, yet we are in some degree consoled by the reflection, that in this very circumstance we see the most satisfactory assurances of success. That if to this be added union of council and of effort (which happily begins to prevail) through this widely extended country, we may hope, without the charge of presumption, that we have, under Providence, the direction of our own destinies.

Although the state of things which brought together the force assembled at this place has somewhat changed, by a portion of the enemy's fleet having left our waters, yet the greater part of the militia are still in service. This course has been dictated by various considerations—viz. the enemy may be practising a finesse; satisfactory intelligence having been received that large reinforcements are daily expected on our coast; a belief that whether he returns or not, it is important to avail ourselves of the opportunity which the occasion presents of imparting some portion of discipline to the troops, who, upon their return to their respective counties would communicate it to others, and because, as the legislature was about to convene, an opportunity would be presented to the representatives of the people to adopt such a course as the exigency of the crisis might call for.

Whilst I am disposed to believe that the general government feels the strongest disposition to acquit itself of every obligation it owes to Virginia, yet this is not the time to be guided by a circulating policy, which is contented with drawing an abstract line, marking with scrupulous nicety the limits where the duty of the one government terminates, and the other begins. On the contrary, it belongs as well to the extraordinary times in which we are called to act, as to the generosity of our character, to look in part to our own resources. To what extent they shall be employed, is a subject properly confided to you. Under such auspices, no doubt can be entertained but the result of your deliberations will be stamped with energy. With such sentiments towards the legislature, I may be permitted to suggest, without the imputation of an arrogant intrusion of my opinion, that the system to be adopted should correspond with the extent of our means, the power of the enemy with whom we have to contend, and a conviction that nothing is to be expected but a protracted duration of the war; for the pursuit of the ignis fatuus of a speedy return of peace, if further indulged, will lead to our undoing. Independently of the rumors that our commissioners are returning without having effected their object, and that large reinforcements are daily looked for in our waters; a reference to the continued series of aggressions practised on us by Great Britain, which produced the war, the barbarous spirit which has marked its progress, the very great force she has now at her disposal, the known inveterate hostility she entertains towards us and our republican institutions—and, above all, the character of her government, watching with the sleepless eye of disquieting jealousy, the growing prosperity of every commercial country—all irrevocably lead to the conclusion, that no rational ground remains on which to rest the expectation of peace.

Under these impressions, it is submitted to the wisdom of the legislature to consider whether a substitution of a permanent military force, combined with fortifications around the places meant to be defended, furnished with adequate trains of artillery, would not be preferable to calling out and continuing in service large masses of militia; a system as burdensome to our citizens, as expensive to the commonwealth. Although it is readily admitted, that some difficulties present themselves in opposition to such a course, it cannot be doubted that, by proper representations on the subject to the general government, such arrangements might be made as would render the measure satisfactory to both governments.

Arsenals should also be erected in some inaccessible parts of the commonwealth, supplied with the whole apparatus of war, and particularly a large number of rifles, the value of which, from the face of our country, is daily manifesting itself.

I must press upon the legislature the necessity of an early attention to our fiscal affairs. The border war which the enemy has kept up has induced many commandants of regiments to keep in service through the year portions (and sometimes the whole) of their regiments. The expenses thereby accruing had nearly exhausted the fund appropriated by the legislature at their last session to military purposes—when the last efforts we were compelled to make far exceeded it. Although we were duly sensible of the high responsibility of adopting measures producing expenditures far beyond those which had been provided for by law, we, nevertheless, weighed the safety of the commonwealth against every other consideration, either public or private, and fearlessly encountered the consequences; confiding in the known liberality of our constituents, of which their representatives delight to give continued proofs. It is but an act of justice to the banks, to make known, that they have advanced, when the treasury was entirely exhausted, considerable sums, by which, together with the forbearance of individual claimants, we have been enabled to keep up the present expensive military establishment. To provide for these claims, as well as the pay of our fellow citizens in arms, needs only to be mentioned to receive the prompt attention of the general assembly. The President of the United States having strongly recommended to the attention of congress a general revisal of our militia laws, I forbear to call your attention to that subject, till the pleasure of congress is made known, which I hope will occur during the present session. I cannot, however, forbear to suggest, that the last law relating to the collection of fines still admits of doubts, by which difficulties have interposed most injurious to the service, particularly as to the question, what officer is to collect those fines, or to enforce the judgment by imprisonment in the event of insolvency. From the experience of several years, I am induced to suggest also the necessity of the repeal of so much of the militia law as prevents the executive from granting commissions to volunteer corps. Numerous are the instances of tenders of service from such associations, the acceptance of which has been prevented from our incapacity to commission those under whom they are willing serve,

I would recommend to the legislature to new-model the divisions of the militia, so as to cause the number of major-generals to conform to the organization of the United States; which prescribes one major-general to two brigadiers. Of the latter, since your last session, four have resigned, viz. generals Blackwell, Biggs, Tate and Cohoon.

The office of register has become vacant by the death of the former incumbent, Charles Blagrove, Esq. which we forbore to supply in consequence of your approaching session. An early attention to this subject would be a convenience to the public. I have also to communicate the death of Samuel Pleasants, Esq. printer to the commonwealth, which vacancy was not supplied for the like reason.

As a few weeks will place me in the condition of a private citizen, this, of course, is the last time I shall have the honor of thus addressing you. I deem an apology unnecessary for embracing it to render to you and our constituents an unfeigned expression of profound gratitude, at the recollection of the numerous proofs of kindness, indulgence and confidence I have received at the hands of my country, in the various situations in which I have been called to act. While in devotion to the faithful discharge of my duties I should dread a comparison with no man, I am well aware of the very limited capacity which I have carried into the service of my country. While, therefore, I am constrained to tax anew that indulgence I have so often experienced for those errors into which I have been unintentionally betrayed, I repose with full confidence in the belief that all will do justice to my motives, and award to me the meed that the whole scope of my conduct, as far as intention was concerned, has been invariably directed to the best interests of my country. I shall carry with me into retirement an indelible impression of the favors I have experienced; and unceasingly pray that a good Providence may perpetually have in his holy keeping, those to whom the destinies of my country may be confided, and that the legislature of Virginia may continue to be the sleepless guardians of the liberty and honor of their country. JAS. BARBOUR.

LEGISLATURE OF NORTH CAROLINA.

House of Commons, November 21, 1814.

Mr. Porter, of Rutherford, introduced the following resolution by some observations.—He said that at the present moment he hoped there would be but one voice in the nation. Whatever may have been the opinions as to the commencement of the war—whether it was wise or foolish, good or bad policy—all would agree in the necessity of prosecuting it with vigor and determination. It was proper that we should shew to the enemy, that however we may differ on small matters, there is no difference of sentiment as to this point. The general government also, should know that we are ready to support their measures. "United we stand, divided we fall." It appeared that a majority could declare war, but that a majority could not make peace. He therefore, wished to shew the enemy that we were not tired of the war, but felt willing to continue it forever rather than give up. The resolution was as follow :

Resolved, That the most efficient measures be adopted by this general assembly to aid the general government in a vigorous prosecution of the war against Great Britain and her allies.

This resolution was unanimously adopted.

GOVERNOR'S MESSAGE.

To the honorable the general assembly of the state of North Carolina.

Gentlemen—At no former period have the representatives of the free people of this state convened when the situation of the country more imperiously demanded the adoption of bold and energetic measures for the preservation and promotion of its character and general welfare. While, therefore, gentlemen, the opening of your present session cannot fail to excite a degree of interest and solicitude not heretofore experienced, an assurance is to be found in your wisdom and patriotism, that the result of your deliberations will be the adoption of a system of measures, corresponding with the feelings and high expectations of our fellow citizens, and commensurate with the pressure and urgency of the circumstances in which we are placed.

The communications from the plenipotentiaries of the United States charged with negotiating peace with Great Britain, afford evidence not to be controverted that it is neither the wish nor the intention of the British government to conclude a peace upon terms honorable to both nations. The professions and acts of that government are so completely at variance with each other, that in reviewing them, we are insensibly led to doubt the correctness of our own perception and the existence of facts demonstrated before our eyes.—When we view the declaration of the prince regent in his speech to parliament relative to the war with the United States, that he is "sincerely desirous of the restoration of peace between the two nations upon conditions honorable to both," we think we have grounds to suppose that the same spirit of justice and conciliation, and the same desire to terminate the war, existed in the British cabinet that prevailed in our government, and that peace would be the result of the pending negotiation. But when we turn from this delusion, when we reverse the picture and view realities, we find the perfidy of the prince portrayed in the most glaring colors, and the prospect of peace placed at a distance from us. The world is told by the British ruler that he is sincerely desirous of terminating the war upon terms honorable to both parties:—His commissioners disclaim all pretensions to an acquisition of territory; and as a proof of the sincerity of their professions, and as an illustration of the truth of the declarations of their prince they demand as the conditions of peace, that we surrender one of our territories, a large portion of two of our states, and an immense tract of country between lake Superior and the Mississippi river; that we define the boundary of the indian possessions within our territories, guarantee to the indians the right of sovereignty of those possessions, and stipulate not to acquire by purchase or otherwise any territory within the specified limits; that we stipulate that Great Britain shall possess, and have the military occupation of both shores of the lakes, and that we relinquish our right to maintain and construct fortifications on them, or within a limited distance of their shores, or to maintain or to construct any vessel of war upon the same, or in the rivers which empty into them. Demands inadmissible under any circumstances. In the prosecution of the war the enemy have evinced a total disregard of the law of nations. They have not only perpetrated on our borders a series of acts whose parallels, in point of atrocity, are not to be found in the annals of civilized warfare, but in a hasty invasion of our capital they have burnt and destroyed our public buildings, edifices of taste and elegance and not contributing to our power in warlike operations. And to complete the catalogue we are officially notified by their commanding admiral that orders have been given for the destruction of every town and district of the seacoast that can be assailed. When we view the effect which those outrages and the arrogant and insulting demands of the British government, as the conditions of peace, has produced upon the great contending parties in our country, we find real cause of exultation. The eyes of all are opened. The character and designs of the enemy stand exposed. Party prejudices and distinctions are done away. The love of country preponderates. The determined spirit which animated and nerved the arms of our revolutionary fathers in achieving the independence which we now enjoy, pervades this extensive continent. The resolution is now formed to bring into action the united energies of the nation, to chastise our perfidious and insolent foe, and to compel him to abandon his iniquitous pretensions, and give us peace upon honorable terms. In this happy union our destinies are portrayed. The preservation of our invaluable institutions is now guaranteed. Peace will be conquered, and a splendor given to our character which will secure to us that respect which a powerful, just, and enlightened people ought at all times to command.

When we take a retrospective view of the situation of our country, since the commencement of the war, of the disadvantages under which it has been carried on, our surprise is not a little excited; that under every paralyzing circumstance an army should finally arise competent, as our recent splendid victories have shown, to cope with equal, and in some instances, superior numbers of the best disciplined troops belonging to the British nation. The achievements of our naval heroes surpass in brilliancy those of any other nation recorded in the annals of history. They have inflicted wounds upon British pride deeper and more mortifying than any other causes could have produced. They have stabbed it in its vital part. If while the energies of the nation were paralyzed, an army and a navy so respectable, and so brilliant, capable of achievements which reflect lustre upon our national character, could be raised, now when the shackles are thrown off, when the attention of all is directed to the promotion of every measure calculated to bring into action the strength and resources of the nation, we have grounds for the agreeable anticipation, that an efficient army, an increased navy and ample means to prosecute the war, will be the certain result.

Notwithstanding it is the duty of the general government to provide for the general welfare and common defence, yet every state in the union, as members of the great body, and particularly those most exposed to danger, should place themselves in an attitude to furnish, whenever necessity may require it, prompt and efficient aid. In order that this state may be placed in that situation, I would recommend in the first place, that an opportunity be afforded the whole body of the militia adjacent to our sea coast and most vulnerable points to acquire a better knowledge of discipline, by compelling them to muster in their respective companies two successive days in every two weeks, and in their respective battalions or regiments two successive days in every three weeks. That arms and ammunition for the use of those militia when called into service be deposited at the several places of battalion or regimental musters, in depots established for that purpose, at each of which a guard should be stationed in constant service, and whose duty it should be to keep the guns freed from rust and in good order, and that on the days of training at those places, the men be permitted to exercise with them. In the second place, that an auxiliary force, consisting of five thousand militia men, be set apart from the main body of the militia for discipline and actual service, (which no doubt might in a very short time be made up of volunteer corps) to be armed and equipt at the expense of the state, and organized in the same manner as the army of the United States, to serve two years, and held in requisition during the war, unless sooner discharged by having actually served the term specified. That all the officers of corps wear the uniform of the United States army, and to be encamped and disciplined at or near the seat of government in the spring for fifteen successive days, and in the fall a like number, at the expense of the state. That after the officers have been thus disciplined, they return to their respective limits, and that the whole of the several regiments be called out by the commandants thereof, to meet at their respective places of regimental musters, there to be drilled for six successive days, and that depots be established at each of those places of regimental musters for the arms, &c. designed for the regiment, which should be kept in order at the expense of the state, and which should be placed in the hands of the men only on days of training, or when they are called into actual service. And in the third place, that funds be created and appropriated to carry into effect the above plan; and commensurate with the probable expenses that would be incurred by the militia when called out in the defence of the state, which no doubt will ultimately be reimbursed by the general government. If the above system was adopted, those two descriptions of force would not only be rendered far more efficient by their improvement in discipline than they otherwise would be, but, in the event of an attempt by an invading army to penetrate into our country, the first might with the utmost promptness be placed in a state of preparation, and marched to co-operate with the troops in the service of the United States stationed on our sea coast. In the mean time, the second description, as well as the requisition of the general government, might be laid out. A junction of those several detachments formed, a front would be presented not easily to be withstood. As the situation of the country requires energetic measures should be pursued, permit me, gentlemen, to invite your attention to the propriety of adopting the system above recommended, of some one more efficient.

We have been for some time past progressively advancing in defensive preparations; a portion of the funds appropriated by the legislature at their last session for the purpose of purchasing munitions of war has been disbursed for those articles, which have been deposited at convenient and proper points on and near the seaboard, in the care of quartermasters and other trusty persons, and liable to be placed in the hands of the militia only in the event of an actual or threatened invasion. The attention of the general government seems now also to be directed to the protection of our seaports with more effect than formerly.—Lieutenant colonel Armistead, an accomplished officer of the United States corps of engineers, is now engaged with a considerable force of regulars and militia in constructing a fortification at a point where the best protection may be afforded to the eastern section of this state. It is true that this work at its commencement was apportioned to a very limited appropriation to effect it, and of course promised no sort of security; but from a recent communication from major general Pinkney, I feel assured that it will be extended in such manner as to approach much nearer the object for which it is intended. Works are also progressing at other points; we have more troops stationed on our coast, and have the promise of a further supply of arms. Much, however, yet remains to be done to render us efficient on land, while the defence of our rivers and sounds is far from being adequate, the promised barges (which might long since have been built in this state) have not yet arrived, and our flotilla of gun boats have received no increase.

Since the adjournment of the last assembly the enemy, in small plundering parties, have made a few hasty incursions on the sea coast, but none of a character to render it necessary or even to allow time to call out the local militia. One company, however, was ordered on duty for a short time, to relieve a detachment of militia drafts which had garrisoned Fort Hampton, and whose term of service was about to expire. This company was subsequently recognized as being in the service of the United States by colonel Long, of the United States' army, commanding in this state, who received their returns, and informed me they would be paid. Several detachments of the requisition of the general government have, however, been called into service. In the early part of the year a regiment under the command of colonel Jesse A. Pearson, marched to the Creek nation to aid in suppressing the hostile part of those Indians. I had the gratification to learn from the commanding general, and it gives me pleasure to communicate it to the legislature, that this regiment, in point of discipline, soldier like demeanor, and promptness in the execution of every command that was given them, could not have been surpassed by any troops who had been no longer in service. After their term of service had expired, they were marched to this state, received their pay, and were honorably discharged. Another regiment is now in service in this state, a third at Norfolk, Virginia, and a fourth is ordered to rendezvous on the 28th inst. to reinforce the garrison of that place.

In pursuance of the resolution of the last assembly, I have transmitted to the secretary of war, a roll furnished to the auditors, exhibiting the amount as passed upon them of pay and rations of the local militia, and other expenses incurred by them in the months of July and August of the last year, when the state was invaded, as also an account of monies advanced by this state to purchase munitions of war, and supplies for the detached militia called out on that occasion. Those demands have been accompanied with a request that the proper department of the general government be directed to reimburse to this state the amount thus ascertained and allowed, and the monies thus advanced. I expect daily to have it in my power to lay before you the result of this application. Nearly the whole of the local militia, as well as the claims of individuals for supplies furnished them, have been paid off. The detached militia ordered out on that occasion, who had it not in their power to comply with the rules of the war department before they were disbanded, (as the United States had not appointed an officer in this state to inspect them) have not as yet been paid, nor have the claims of individuals who furnished them supplies. We have not as yet been able to ascertain whether the general government will refuse to pay the expenses incurred by those troops. As soon as all the returns and claims were received, I instructed the adjutant general to transmit a roll of them to the secretary of war, and to ask him to say whether it was the intention of government to pay them. Several communications have passed upon the subject, but no decision has yet been had. It is now, however, daily looked for in the answer which will be given to the last communication made by the adjutant. It will be necessary, in the event of those claims being finally rejected by the general government, to renew such part of the resolutions of the last assembly as provided for their payment. It may be proper here to state that the then secretary of war refused to pay the United States' contractor, who furnished rations to the company of local militia ordered to garrison Fort Hampton, as mentioned above; that as soon as I was apprised of that fact, and furnished with the secretary's letter by the contractor, I gave a draft upon the treasury for the amount due, to be paid out of the fund appropriated by the last assembly to defray the expenses of local militia who might be called into service during the present year, and that this sum also forms an item in my application for reimbursement.

Permit me to invite your attention to the encouragement of manufactures, as an important mean of national independence. While the war is productive of many evils and inconveniences, it is not without its beneficial results. The establishment of manufactories owe their origin exclusively to that event.

Had not the necessity of providing for our own wants been created, we should have remained ignorant of our ability and resources to do so. The best interests of the country require that every attention should be bestowed on establishments of this kind. They should not be left entirely to individual exertions. It therefore may properly be considered as the duty of the legislature, not only to make every provision which may seem calculated to aid the attempts of individuals, but to establish manufactories at the expense and for the benefit of the state, upon a liberal and extended scale, and to place them under the direction of qualified manufacturers, in order that they may be brought in the shortest time possible to the highest perfection, and thereby placed upon a permanent basis. Then upon the return of peace, our manufactories would maintain their ground, our manufactures become objects claiming the protecting provisions of government, and the enemy would feel the full force of having driven us into a practical knowledge of our resources and best interests. Our climate and soil are admirably adapted to the production of all kinds of raw materials, the acquisition of a large portion of which does not require the interposition of legislative provisions, but some of them do. The article of wool is important, nay, indispensably necessary in our manufactories of clothing. It is a well known fact, that the difficulty of procuring this valuable article is much enhanced by the destruction among the animals which produce it. I therefore invite your attention also to the propriety of adopting some efficient measures for the protection of sheep.

Whilst the last assembly was in session, and in pursuance of their request, I transmitted to his excellency the governor of South Carolina, an authenticated copy of an act passed by that honorable body, ratifying the provisional article entered into on the 4th September, 1813, between the commissioners appointed by the states of North and South Carolina, to establish the boundary line between them, and as a substitute for the 3d article of the conventional agreement of the 11th of July, 1818, upon that subject. In the month of February I received a communication from his excellency informing me that a similar act had been passed by the legislature of South Carolina, a copy of which was shortly after received from the secretary of that state. It is a source of gratification that the long disputed question of boundary between the two states is at length nearly settled. It now remains only to run and mark the line from the termination of the line of 1772, according to the courses laid down in the above mentioned provisional article to the East bank of Chatoga river, where the 35th degree of north latitude has been found to strike it, and where a rock has been set up and marked by the commissioners of the two states.

In the course of the present year I have received communications from the governors of Tennessee and Pennsylvania, enclosing authenticated copies of resolutions, adopted by the legislatures of those states, proposing an amendment to the constitution of the United States, to reduce the term of service of senators in congress from six to four years. Those resolutions are herewith laid before you, as also two communications not long since received from New-Hampshire and Massachusetts, declaring their disapprobation of the proposed amendment.

Not long since I received a communication from John Stevens, esq. of New-York, endorsing a memorial to the legislature, praying an extension of the limitation specified in their grant to him of an exclusive right of navigating, by means of steam, the waters of this state. This memorial is herewith submitted.

In the month of February last, the honorable Francis Locke transmitted to me his resignation of the office of one of the judges of the supreme court of law and equity for this state. I convened the council of state, who unanimously advised that the vacancy should be filled by granting a temporary commission to general Duncan Cameron, of Orange.

You will receive herewith such resignations of militia officers and justices of the peace as have been received at my office since the adjournment of the last assembly.

The letters and documents accompanying this communication are marked and numbered in the order in which the subjects to which they relate have been mentioned.

My private secretary will lay before you my letter book, to which you are referred for any information touching my official transactions.

The period having now arrived, when, according to the provisions of the constitution, I can no longer hold the office of chief magistrate of the state, permit me, gentlemen, to express to you the sentiments of gratitude which I entertain for the frequent manifestations of confidence with which I have been honored. In taking leave of your honorable body, I cannot forbear expressing my ardent desire, that in your deliberations may be cherished that harmony and unanimity so essential to the promotion of the honor, welfare, and security of the state.

I have the honor to be,

Very respectfully, gentlemen,

Your obedient servant,

WILLIAM HAWKINS.

Raleigh, Nov. 23, 1814.

LEGISLATURE OF S. CAROLINA.

GOVERNOR'S MESSAGE, DELIVERED NOVEMBER 29TH, 1814.

Fellow-citizens—We assemble at the close of a year so extraordinary and eventful, that the history of the world furnishes no parallel. The tide of war suddenly rolled back upon an empire accustomed to dictate to the most powerful nations around her, and peace prescribed in her capital; a dynasty, to which the military prowess and gigantic genius of its illustrious founder seemed to have imparted a strength more than that derived from the opinions and prejudices of centuries, annihilated without the slightest civil commotion, and almost without an effort to maintain it: Europe, as if that quarter of the globe had been arrayed against a single man, satisfied with his dethronement, and terminating the dissensions which had so long agitated and convulsed her by a general pacification; are occurrences, which had they not been realized, would hardly have been admitted within the range of political speculation.

How far the revolutions we have recently witnessed are calculated to ameliorate the condition of those more directly concerned: whether the renovated devotion to the ancient order of things, on the one hand, may not in the excess of its zeal, lead to the restoration of many ancient abuses; and whether, on the other, the dread of innovation may not blindly cause the rejection of modern institutions, truly valuable and worthy to be preserved, are questions, which, however interesting to the philosopher, are not for our enquiry. The influence of the pacification in Europe upon the political relations of our own country is more certain, and cannot fail to command attention. While, by enabling our enemy to concentrate against us her whole disposable force, it has greatly increased her capacity for carrying on the war; by restoring her accustomed intercourse with other nations, it has considerably lessened her inducements to a renewal of friendly intercourse with this. The advantages thus unexpectedly acquired by Great Britain, considerable as they certainly are, have evidently been estimated by her greatly beyond their actual importance. Intoxicated with the result of the late coalition against France; forgetting that her allies, who constituted the real strength of that coalition, can have no disposition to embark in her present crusade; and, above all, forgetting that the overthrow of a particular dynasty is one thing, the subjugation of a free and powerful people, another; she seems to have vainly imagined that the direction against us of her undivided force, was all that was necessary to coerce submission to her most insolent demands. Hence, preliminaries of peace had scarcely been signed at Paris, when, availing herself of her immense naval superiority, her veteran legions from the Peninsula were transported to the banks of the St. Lawrence and Niagara; powerful expeditions fitted out against our sea ports; and the strongest indications exhibited, that though the peace in Europe had removed almost every ground of collision between us, a restoration of harmony, upon terms mutually just and honorable, no longer constituted any part of her policy.

This disposition of the British government has not been left to inference, however manifest: the result of the conference at Ghent, places it beyond question—If peace be desired, it must now be evident to all, that it is to be obtained only by an active and vigorous prosecution of the war. Great Britain must be made to feel how much the power of the United States has increased since she was compelled to acknowledge them sovereign and independent. Upon the novel and extravagant pretensions announced as the sine qua non of accommodation, there can exist but one opinion. While the moderation and conciliatory temper manifested by our own government to wrest from faction itself every ground of civil or opposition, the arrogance and injustice of the enemy have roused even the most lukewarm to indignation and determined resistance. The unanimity of sentiment was all that was wanting to give to the national effort, in vindication of our rights, its proper character. With union among ourselves, and a just degree of energy in our councils, the resources of our country are too ample not to be adequate to a far more trying crisis. Of the capacity of our fellow citizens for military operations, the late campaign furnishes prodigious proof: it has demonstrated that to sustain the high reputation of our ancestors, it was only necessary to shake off the habits of peace. While the capture of a second fleet, and repeated triumphs in our naval conflicts, have evinced our accustomed superiority on that element of which Great Britain proudly boasts herself the mistress; the exploits of our armies have shed a correspondent lustre upon our exertions on land. In the north, and in the south, whether combating the vainly styled invincibles of our enemy, or her savage allies, to engage has been to conquer.—The campaign may truly be said to have been, on our part, a series of bold and brilliant achievements. The unprofitable seizure of Washington by the enemy, can scarcely be considered an exception. However calculated to effect the sensibility of the nation, the substantial advantages which have resulted to us from that event render it an object hardly to be regretted. It has not only united all ranks, all parties, in one common and just resentment towards the enemy, whose momentary possession of our capital was marked by barbarian disregard alike of science, of taste, of the arts, and of civilized war.

fare; but by impressing upon the inhabitants of our cities, in a manner more forcible than all the arguments which could have been urged, both the practicability and the probability, of their being attacked in turn, it has every where induced the most salutary measures of precaution and preparation. In every city along our extensive sea coast, the work of fortification has either been completed, or is in a state of rapid advancement. In Charleston, our fellow-citizens have manifested a patriotism, a zeal, and a manly spirit, honorable not only to themselves, but to South Carolina. That city, heretofore defended only at the entrance into its harbor, will soon be so strongly fortified on every side, as to be placed beyond the reach of insult. The means of constructing these works have been furnished partly by voluntary contributions of labor and money from patriotic individuals, and partly by the corporation of the city. The monies thus advanced, there can be no doubt will, eventually, be repaid by the general government: but as the time of re-payment will probably be distant, I submit to you the expediency of relieving the city from the burden of this debt, and including it in the demands which, on a settlement of our war accounts, the state may have against the general government. The preservation of Charleston is an object of too much interest, not merely to those who inhabit it, but to the state generally, to bear any doubts as to the justice of this measure.

To meet the increased means of annoyance, with which the present state of Europe will enable Great Britain to commence the next campaign, by a correspondent increase of means on our part, will be the province of the general government, and a just confidence is felt that it will be respected. While your fullest co-operation in every measure, which may be adopted for this desirable purpose, will doubtless be given; there are several measures connected with the immediate defence of the state, which a due regard to our own safety strongly presses upon your attention. Among the most prominent of those is the better organization of our militia. A complete change of system is demanded, not only that it may be more in conformity with that of the United States army, an object of itself of great importance, but by the radical defects of the existing system. With our ranks filled with men equal to any in the world, more than half their efficiency is lost from not being properly directed. In your deliberations on this subject, the expediency of increasing the number of our brigades and divisions, adapting the rank of our officers to those of the United States, and conforming the organization of companies, battalions and regiments, to that of the regular army, will not be overlooked. As the first step, however, towards the work of reformation, I strongly recommend to you a general vacation of all existing commissions, and the adoption of some mode in the future appointment of officers, which may promise a happier result from those heretofore tried. In recommending a vacation of commissions, I am not unmindful of the merits of many officers among us, of all grades, who would do honor to any service; but while the proposed measure will remove these without merit, it will interpose no obstacle to our availing ourselves of the talents of those better qualified. With regard to future appointments, a variety of modes will no doubt suggest themselves; the simplest, and perhaps the most eligible, will be to give the nomination of officers of every grade to the executive, and the appointment to the senate. If this plan be successfully pursued by the general government, its good effects, in a less extended sphere, it is obvious must be still more certain. While in such a sphere, the responsibility will be the same, the judgment of the officer who will nominate, and of those who will appoint, will be directed in many cases by personal knowledge, and in all may be aided by correct and easily obtained information.

With a sea coast, however, which, though assailable at scarcely at any point by the larger vessels of the enemy, is vulnerable at almost every point by her lighter squadron; and with the great body of our population so remote from the scene of danger, as to render their assistance, in the event of sudden emergency, utterly impracticable; the improvements of our militia system, desirable as it certainly is, will not be sufficient. It is essential to our security that a force adequate, with the local militia on the coast, to repel such attacks as may be expected, be constantly kept on foot. I submit to you, therefore, the expediency of immediately organizing for this purpose, at least one brigade, to serve during the war. Whether the proposed force shall be raised by enlistment, by draft, or by accepting the services of volunteers, will be questions for your consideration. Whatever be the plan, however, for its organization, I recommend to you that when organized, it be offered to the general government as part of our quota, stipulating on our behalf, that it be constantly kept on duty within the state, or that, if its services should be required elsewhere, an equal number of the residue of our quota be maintained by the general government within the state, during its absence. But the maintenance of the proposed force is of too much importance to us to be made dependent upon its being received into the service of the general government: it ought to be maintained at all events. The appropriations which will be necessary, if this expence be devolved upon the state, considered in the abstract, may appear large; but considered in comparison with the immense amount of property to which it will afford protection, it becomes insignificant.

In devising measures for the security of our maritime frontier, the protection of our inland coasting trade is of too much consequence, and too intimately involved with it, to be neglected. While our ports are blockaded, and the outward navigation of the smallest vessels interrupted, the importance of preserving the inland communication open and safe, is obvious. To effect this interesting purpose, it will be necessary either to establish a chain of strong military posts between Georgetown and Savannah, or to provide such a number of suitable barges, as in addition to those appropriated to our defence by the United States, will be competent to guarding effectually the several bays and inlets between those places. The latter is recommended as the more economical, and at the same time better adapted to the object, particularly the protection of our islands.

Connected with the service of the militia is a subject of minor importance, indeed, but of too much interest to permit me to pass it over without inviting to it your attention. While it has been provided that the militia called into the service of the United States, shall be furnished with arms by the state government, and with pay, rations, and camp equipage by the general government, no provision has been made for their being furnished by either, with blankets or clothing. When it is recollected how much the spirit and patriotism of the militia men usually exceed his means of providing for his comforts; and that, in consequence, there are, at this moment on duty many meritorious citizens, who, destitute of suitable covering, have volunteered, at the call of their country, to encounter not merely the perils of battle, but the still more formidable severities of the season, the expediency of making some provision on this subject will not require to be pressed upon you—I recommend to you that the commissary general of purchases be instructed to supply for every musket put into the hands of a militia man, one watch coat and blanket, to be delivered as early as shall be practicable.

Among the important measures which will unavoidably occupy your attention during the present session, a very interesting one will be the means of providing for the increased expenses of the ensuing year. In the present utter stagnation of commerce, when the produce of the farmer remains upon his hands without value, it may perhaps be justly questioned, whether the system of taxation has not already been carried as far as it can, be without becoming oppressive; and whether, instead of increasing our taxes, it be not more eligible to adopt some mode of raising the supplies required, which, by throwing the burden of the present period of difficulty upon future years of prosperity and peace, may lighten the inconveniences to which our fellow citizens might otherwise be subjected. The loans which might readily be obtained from our own banks, and others, would no doubt be more than equal to this purpose. As a mean, however, of providing not only for the present, but for any future emergency, I recommend to you the consolidation, upon such terms as shall be mutually agreed upon by the parties interested, of all the banks heretofore established, with the bank of the state of South Carolina; reserving to the state the right of increasing her shares, by extending the capital to such an amount as shall be deemed expedient; and pledging the faith and revenue of the state for the payment of all issues by the institution. This consolidation would constitute a capital fully adequate, it is confidentially believed, not only to all the purposes of the state, but to the purposes of every citizen of good credit who might find it necessary, in consequence of the present interruption of our commercial relations, to resort to loans. To the state, it would prove highly beneficial, not only by affording an ample source of accommodation, whenever accommodation might be desirable, but it would obtain for the public funds vested in bank stock, that security which is best derived from the care and vigilance of interested individuals; to the banks it would be equally beneficial, inasmuch as it would be a virtual renewal in perpetuity, of charters which will shortly terminate, and which, it is beyond question, would otherwise never be extended on any terms. To both the state and the stockholders the proposed consolidation promises other and very important advantages upon which I forbear to remark, but which will not fail to suggest themselves.

As the period for which I was elected, will shortly terminate, I shall lose no time in laying before you such other communications as it will be necessary to make.

I supplicate for you the guidance of that Being from whom all wisdom cometh, and devoutly pray that your patriotic labors may promote the welfare and happiness of our beloved country.

JOS. ALSTON,

Columbia, Nov. 29, 1814.

LEGISLATURE OF GEORGIA.

Monday, October 17.

Both houses having convened agreeably to proclamation, and a quorum of each being formed, after the usual formalities, they regularly proceeded to the election of their officers, and made choice of the following gentlemen:

In Senate.—William Rabun, esq. President; William Robertson, esq. Secretary.

House of Representatives.—Benj. Whitaker, esq. Speaker, A. S. Clayton, Clerk.

Both houses then adjourned to Tuesday, 10 o'clock.

Tuesday, Oct. 18.—The governor transmitted to both houses the following message:

Executive Department, Georgia,

Milledgeville, Oct. 18, 1814.

Fellow Citizens of the Senate, and House of Representatives,

It has been deemed advisable, in the existing posture of public affairs, to convene the legislature at a period earlier than that prescribed by law. The reasons for this measure have arisen from the new and unprecedented features given by our enemy to the war in which we are engaged, and the obligations thereby imposed on us, to make corresponding exertions for meeting and repelling his efforts.

The war has not only assumed an aspect abhorrent to the principles of civilized nations, but its object has, to us, become essentially changed. The contest is now in reality, for independence on our part, and subjugation on that of our adversary.

The legislature will feel the necessity of making, without delay, radical changes in our militia system. Recent events have more than ever demonstrated that our militia must be better organized and better disciplined.—Our system has been calculated for a peace establishment. It is high time that one should be substituted fitted for a state of war.

The law passed at the last session of the legislature for organizing detachments which might be required for the public service, has been found impracticable of execution in some of its provisions, and tedious and difficult in most of its arrangements. It prescribes that the officers shall be elected by the men, after their arrival at a place of rendezvous, thus having no means by which troops are to be marched there. It prescribes that the officers thus elected shall be brevetted by the commanding officer of the detachment, when in detachments, requiring a commander under the rank of a general officer, that commander must himself be elected at the same time.

When, in the course of the present year, events rendered it necessary to organize and hold in readiness for service one third of the militia of this state, these and other difficulties presented themselves in their full force. To obviate them as far as possible, I ordered the elections to be held in their respective counties, and have issued special commissions—thus preserving the leading principle of the law, the election of officers by those who were to serve under them; but departing from the law in its forms, which were found impracticable of execution.

To the principle, however, of election for detachments, there are serious and weighty objections. It is tedious; it tends to produce insubordination, and is injurious to officers already in commission. And I earnestly recommend to the legislature its abolition.

Whilst the attention of the legislature shall be engaged on this subject, there is also another provision highly deserving their attention. The organization of our local militia varies materially from that prescribed for the army of the United States. And in order to have militia received into the service of the latter, they must be organized according to their plan. There ought to be an authority given by law to the executive for this purpose, whenever detachments are required to be placed in a state of preparation. And there ought especially to be an efficient method prescribed for enforcing obedience, in attending at any appointed rendezvous.

The condition of the volunteer corps also calls imperiously for revision. This species of force is always valuable when it can be brought into service; but under existing circumstances, the public is deprived almost entirely of its aid. Very few volunteer companies contain the number of privates necessary for their reception into the service of the United States; and whilst they appear desirous to take their share of duty, they will not consent to be consolidated. A power to consolidate where they are not full, and a mode for determining the selection of officers amongst them is highly necessary.

The situation of the cavalry, in particular, merits the consideration of the legislature. The mode in which the war has been conducted, and appears likely to be continued, affords but little use for this species of troops. In truth, they, as well as the volunteer infantry corps, although composed of the best materials which the country affords, are for the most part exempted from the public service.

The war department, on the fourth of July last, issued a requisition to most of the states in the union, for detaching, organizing and holding in readiness a quota of the militia. The proportion required from Georgia was three thousand five hundred. This requisition was the more easily complied with here, in consequence of the steps which had been previously taken, to have the militia arranged into classes, and to cause one third to be in constant readiness. The organization of the first class made them ready to fill up the quota. And one complete brigade has, by the directions of the major general commanding the United States troops in the sixth military district, been ordered to the neighborhood of Savannah. Besides these it is entirely probable, that a force of considerable strength will be speedily marched to the south west. The movements of the enemy in that quarter have for some time indicated a plan, which it is seriously interesting to the general government, and to us in particular, should be frustrated. I have accordingly been required by the war department to hold in readiness, two thousand five hundred men for the purpose of co-operating with reinforcements ordered from other sections of the union. This number will be supplied from the balance of the first class, together with some volunteer companies. They are in a state of readiness.

The exposed and defenceless situation of our principal sea-port town, became a source of anxiety, so soon as the mode of warfare intended to be pursued by the enemy, became known. The fund appropriated at the last session for military disbursements was nearly exhausted, and without money I could not order troops to the field on state account. It was important too, that suitable fortifications should be erected on the land side, to repel the approach of the enemy. The corporation of Savannah, pursuing the example set them at other places, and stimulated by the recommendation of the major general having charge of this military district, as well as by that of the state executive, adopted the idea of fortifying that city by voluntary contributions in money and labor, on the part of the inhabitants, confiding in the belief that the general government would ultimately reimburse the expenditure.

But the citizens of that place, not being very numerous, and the place itself requiring extensive works, an appeal was made to me for aid. The appeal was felt to be reasonable. The state government appeared bound to defray the expenditure for the present; especially when it was considered that large and liberal disbursements had heretofore been made for the defence of our interior frontier; and that the duties of protection extended alike to all. But here again my means were limited by existing appropriations. Under these circumstances I have applied for and obtained from the Planter's Bank of Savannah, a loan without interest, for an amount calculated to meet the present emergencies. This, together with a small advance from the treasury, have been deposited with the corporation of Savannah, to be expended in works of defence. For the reimbursement of the loan, I have pledged the faith of the executive. This pledge I rely with confidence on the legislature to enable me to make good: And I recommend to them to make such further appropriations as may defray the expence of completing the necessary fortifications; thereby taking the burthen of present advances from the shoulders of the citizens, and trusting to the justice of the general government for reimbursement in better times.

I also submit to the consideration of the legislature the propriety of ordering into the field a party of cavalry in aid of the force now in the service of the United States. Such a corps may be highly useful on the maritime frontier; and should be placed under the immediate command of the lieutenant colonel commanding the cavalry in that quarter.

The provision made by law at the last session, for paying into the treasury of the United States, the amount of direct tax due from Georgia, was carried into effect without difficulty. The payment was effected by discounting with the United States, an equal amount of the monies due from them to us under the articles of cession and agreement, in relation to the Mississippi territory, entered into on the 24th day of April, 1802.

The act of congress imposing a direct tax being temporary, it is not now known whether any provision need be made for meeting the payment of another year. But inasmuch as the power of the enemy to annoy, has by the peace in Europe, been increased in proportion to the desolating spirit with which he is disposed to prosecute the war, there can be no doubt that an increase of the means of resistance has become also necessary. We ought therefore to calculate on meeting a direct tax greater than that of the present year.

The report of the treasurer, at the close of the political year will inform you of the state of our finances; as there appears evidently to be a necessity for an increase of expenditure, it will at once occur to you that there must be a proportionate increase of receipts. I therefore recommend to the legislature to augment the ordinary taxes in a degree commensurate with the public wants. A free people, estimating at their proper value, the rights which belong to them with cheerfulness contribute whatever may be necessary for their defence and protection.

The mode now in use in this state, of adjusting and liquidating accounts against the public appears to require revision. The settlements are all made at the executive office, thereby burthening that department with matters which in the nature of things do not appertain there. The affairs ought to be adjusted by the comptroller of the state.

A treaty has been negotiated with the friendly Creek Indians, by which their title is extinguished to a considerable extent of territory within the limits of this state. The acquisition is, however, of little value, either for the purposes of cultivation, or of strengthening our interior frontier. I am not yet informed whether the treaty has been sanctioned by the proper authority.

A list of appointments made by the executive during the recess of the legislature is herewith submitted.

Some subjects of minor importance to those now brought before the view of the legislature, will form the contents of a separate communication.

Fellow-citizens.—The era in which it is our lot to live, is pregnant with prominent events beyond that of any past times. The great hand is withered, which almost at will, put down and raised up empires in Europe, and himself has become a pensioner. The power, who prostrated him appear all desirous for repose to the world, except our inveterate foe. He is implacable towards us because we were growing in commerce, and have acquired so much naval character. These are at war with the policy and pride of our adversary. Long ago we committed an unpardonable sin, by asserting and achieving our national independence. The blaze of glory which our gallant sons of the ocean have shed around the American name is a source of mortification too deadly for forgiveness. Our armies too have recently inflicted some lions of deep humiliation to a foe, acting on the belief, that with the means now at his command, our subjugation was within his reach. All the usages of war are dispensed with in relation to us, and we are already treated as if our rank in the scale of nations was nothing.

But the enemy mistakes his means, and mistakes us. The spirit of party is rapidly vanishing, and union and resistance are becoming the watchwords of the day.

This is one effect likely to be produced by the struggle, which humanity must deplore. The bitter animosities engendered by the war of the revolution, were fast wearing away. Commercial intercourse; reciprocal advantage; the reflection that England had some palliation in the belief that we were then in a state of rebellion against parental authority; these circumstances were effacing the feelings that had arisen from the atrocities practised by her armies during our former struggle. But the case is now reversed. The present war was commenced between nations confessedly independent; connected by language, ties of relationship, manners, religion. All that could create tenderness and respect for each other. Yet under all these circumstances, her commanders are pursuing towards us an unrelenting system of conflagration, devastation and plunder. They make war on the female and the babe; they pillage the temples of the Most High; they consume to ashes defenceless houses and villages. Such a contest so conducted, will create animosities which ages cannot efface. The American child will learn in his cradle to abhor the British name, and the lesson will be handed down from generation to generation.

Copy of a letter from captain SINCLAIR, commanding on lake Erie, to the secretary of the navy, dated United States sloop of war Niagara, off St. Joseph, 22d July, 1814.

Sir—The wind became favorable on the evening of the 3d inst—the troops were embarked, and I sailed from Detroit that night; but such were the difficulties I had to encounter on the flats of lake St. Clair, where, instead of ten feet, as I had been led to believe there was, I only found eight, and the rapid current of that river, that I did not reach lake Huron till the 12th. From thence I shaped my course, as directed, for Matchadash bay, and used every possible effort to gain it, but not being able to procure a pilot for that unfrequented part of the lake, and finding it filled with islands and sunken rocks, which must inevitably prove the destruction of the fleet, as it was impossible to avoid them, on account of the impenetrable fog with which this lake is almost continually covered; and finding the army were growing short of provisions from the time already elapsed, it was agreed between col. Croghan and myself to push for this place, where we should procure such information as would govern our future operations. We were favored in winds and arrived here on the 20th—The enemy had abandoned his work, consisting of a fort, and large block house, &c. those we destroyed, but left untouched the town and N. W. company's store houses.

Very respectfully, I have the honor to remain, sir, your obedient servant,

A. SINCLAIR.

Copy of a letter from capt. SINCLAIR, commanding on lake Erie, to the secretary of the navy, dated,

U. S. sloop of war Niagara off Michilimackinac, July 30th, 1814.

Sir—Whilst wind-bound at St. Joseph's I captured the N. W. company's schooner Mink, from Michilimackinac of St. Mary's with a cargo of flour—receiving intelligence through this source, that the schooner Perseverance was laying above the Falls, at the lower end of lake Superior, in waiting to transport the Mink's cargo to Fort Williams; I despatched the ship's launches under lieutenant Turner of the Scorpion, an active and enterprising officer, to capture her, and if possible to get her down the Falls. Colonel Croghan attached major Holmes with a party of regulars to co operate in the expedition, in which the capture of St. Mary's was included. The official report of the result, made by lieutenant Turner, I herewith enclose you. The capture of the Perseverance gave us the complete command of lake Superior—and had it not been for the strong force at Michilimackinac, forbidding a separation of our means of attacking that place, and feeling myself bound by my instructions to do so, before I was at liberty to enter into any extensive enterprize of my own planning, I should have availed myself of this unlooked for advantage, and have broken up all their important establishments on lake Superior. The capture of Fort William alone would have nearly destroyed the enemy's fur trade, as that is his grand depot and general rendezvous, from which his extensive trade branches in all directions, and at which place there is never less than a million in value of property, and at this season of the year, it is said, there is twice that amount—I fear such another opportunity may never occur. The capture of those two vessels and the provisions, will, however, prove of very serious inconvenience to the enemy in that remote quarter, where the loss cannot possibly be retrieved. Flour was, before this loss, worth 60 dollars per barrel with them, and salt provisions 50 cents per pound, &c.

I have the honor to remain, sir, with great respect, your obedient servant,

A. SINCLAIR.

Copy of a letter from lieutenant TURNER, to captain A. SINCLAIR commanding on lake Erie, dated

U. S. schooner Scorpion, off Michilimackinac, July 26, 1814.

Sir—I have the honor to inform you, that agreeable to your orders of the 22d inst. I proceeded on the expedition to lake Superior with launches, I rowed night and day, but having a distance of 60 miles against a strong current, information had reached the enemy at St. Mary's of our approach about two hours before I arrived at that place, carried by indians in their light canoes; several of whom I chased, and by firing on them and killing some, prevented their purposes; some I captured and kept prisoners until my arrival, others escaped. The force under major Holmes prevented any thing like resistance at the fort, the enemy with their indians carrying with them all the light valuable articles, peltry, clothes, &c. I proceeded across the strait of lake Superior without a moment's delay; and on my appearance, the enemy finding they could not get off with the vessel I was in quest of, set fire to her in several places, scuttled and left her. I succeeded in boarding her, and by considerable exertions extinguished the flames, and secured her from sinking. I then stripped her and prepared for getting her down the falls. Adverse winds prevented my attempting the falls until the 26th, when every possible effort was used, but I am sorry to say without success, to get her over in safety. The fall is 34 of a mile in 45 feet, and the channel very rocky; the current runs from 20 to 30 knots, and in one place there is a perpendicular leap of 10 feet, between three rocks; here she bilged, but was brought down so rapidly that we succeeded in running her on shore below the rapids before she filled, and burned her. She was a fine new schooner, upwards of 100 tons, called the Perseverance, and will be a severe loss to the N. W. company. Had I succeeded in getting her safe, I could have loaded her to advantage from the enemy's store-houses. I have, however, brought down four captured boats loaded with indian goods to a considerable amount, the balance contained in four large and two small store houses were destroyed, amounting in value to from 50 to 100,000 dollars. All private property was according to your orders respected. The officers and men under my command behaved with great activity and zeal, particularly midshipman Swartwout.

I have the honor to be sir, with great respect, your obedient servant,

DANIEL TURNER.

Copy of a letter from captain A. Sinclair to the secretary of the navy, dated

U. S. sloop of war Ningara, off Thunder Bay, August 9, 1814.

Sir—I arrived off Michilimackinack on the 26th July; but owing to a tedious spell of bad weather, which prevented our reconnoitering, or being able to procure a prisoner who could give us information of the enemy's indian force, which from several little skirmishes we had on an adjacent island, appeared to be very great, we did not attempt a landing until the 4th inst. and it was then made more with a view to ascertain positively the enemy's strength, than with any possible hope of success; knowing at the same time, that I could effectually cover their landing and retreat to the ships, from the position I had taken within 300 yards of the beach. Col. Croghan would never have landed, even with this protection, being positive, as he was, that the indian force alone on the island, with the advantages they had, were superior to him, could he have justified himself to his government, without having stronger proof than appearances, that he could not effect the object in view.

Mackinack is, by nature, a perfect Gibraltar, being a high inaccessible rock on every side, except the west, from which to the heights, you have near two miles to pass through a wood, so thick that our men were shot in every direction, and within a few yards of them, without being able to see the indians who did it; and a height was scarcely gained before there was another within 50 or 100 yards commanding it, where breast works were erected and cannon opened on them. Several of those were charged and the enemy driven from them; but it was soon found the further our troops advanced the stronger the enemy became, and the weaker and more bewildered our force were; several of the commanding officers were picked out and killed or wounded by the savages, without seeing any of them. The men were getting lost and falling into confusion, natural under such circumstances, which demanded an immediate retreat, or a total defeat and general massacre must have ensued. This was conducted in a masterly manner by col Croghan, who had lost the aid of that valuable and ever to be lamented officer major Holmes who with captain Vanhorn, was killed by the indians. The enemy were driven from many of their strong holds; but such was the impenetrable thickness of the woods, that no advantage gained could be profited by. Our attack would have been made immediately under the lower fort, that the enemy might not have been able to use his indian force to such advantage as in the woods, having discovered by drawing a fire from him in several instances, that I had greatly the superiority of metal of him; but its scite being about 130 feet above the water, I could not, when near enough to do him an injury, elevate sufficiently to batter it. Above this, nearly as high again, he has another strong fort, commanding every point on the island, and almost perpendicular on all sides. Col. Croghan not deeming it prudent to make a second attempt upon this place, and having ascertained to a certainty that the only naval force the enemy have upon the lakes consists of one schooner of 4 guns, I have determined to despatch the Lawrence and Caledonia to lake Erie immediately, believing their services in transporting our armies there will be wanting; and it being important that the sick and wounded, amounting to about 100, and that part of the detachment not necessary to further our future operations here, should reach Detroit without delay. By an intelligent prisoner captured in the Mink, I ascertained this, and that the mechanics and others sent across from York during the winter, were for the purpose of building a flotilla to transport reinforcements and supplies to Mackinack. An attempt was made to transport them by the way of Matchadash, but it was found impracticable, from all the portages being a morass; that they then resorted to a small river called Nautawasaga, situated to the south of Matchadash, from which there is a portage of three leagues over a good road to lake Simcoe. This place was never known until pointed out to them last summer by an indian. This river is very narrow, and has six or eight feet water in it about three miles up, and is then a muddy rapid shallow for 45 miles up to the portage, where their armada was built, and their store houses are now situated. The navigation is dangerous and dif-scult, and so obscured by rocks and bushes, that no stranger could ever find it. I have however, availed myself of the means of discovering it. I shall also blockade the mouth of French river until the fall; and those being the only two channels of communication by which Mackinack can possibly be supplied; and their provisions at this time being extremely short, I think they will be starved into a surrender. This will also cut off all supplies to the N. W. company, who are now nearly starving, and their furs on hand can only find transportation by the way of Hudson bay. At this place I calculate on falling in with their schooner, which, it is said, has gone there for a load of provisions, and a message sent to her not to venture up while we are on the lake.

Very respectfully, I have the honor to remain, sir, your obedient servant,

ARTHUR SINCLAIR.

HON. WM. JONES,
secretary of the navy.

Extract of a letter from capt. A. Sinclair, to the hon. Wm. Jones, secretary of the navy, dated

On board U. S. sloop Niagara, Erie, Sept. 3, 1815.

SIR—Immediately after the attack on Michilimackinack, I despatched the Lawrence and Caledonia with orders to Lieutenant commandant Dexter, to make all possible despatch to lake Erie, and there co-operate with our army, &c. while I shaped my course in pursuit of the enemy's force, supposed to be about Nautauwasaga; and I cannot but express my surprise at having passed those vessels and arrived at Erie before them. By that opportunity I apprised you of my movements up to the 9th ult. since which time I have been fortunate enough to find his B. M. schooner Nancy, loaded with provisions, clothing, &c. for the troops at Mackinack.

She was two miles up the Nautauwasaga river, moored under a block-house, strongly situated on the S. E. side of the river, which, running nearly parallel with the bay shore for that distance, forms a narrow peninsula;—this and the wind being off shore, afforded me an opportunity of anchoring opposite to him, and within good battering distance; but finding the sand hills and trees frequently interrupting my shot, I borrowed an eight inch howitzer from colonel Croghan, mounted it on one of my carriages, and sent it on the peninsula, under command of lieutenant Holdup; a situation was chosen by captain Gratiot of the engineers, from which it did great execution. The enemy defended himself very handsomely, until one of those shells burst in his block house, and in a few minutes blew up his magazine. This set fire to a train which had been laid for the destruction of the vessel, and in an instant she was in flames. I had made the necessary preparation with boats for getting on board of her; but frequent and heavy explosions below deck made the risk of lives too great to attempt saving her. She was, therefore, with her valuable cargo, entirely consumed. I cannot say whether those who defended her, were blown up in the block-house, or whether they retreated in the rear of their work, which they might have done unseen by us, as it afforded a descent into a thick wood. I hope the latter. A number of articles were picked up at a considerable distance off; among them was the commander's desk, containing copies of letters, &c. several of which I herewith enclose you for your information. They serve to show the vessel to have been commanded by lieutenant Wersley of the royal navy; of what infinite importance her cargo was to the garrison at Mackinack, and that they have nothing ahead now on that lake. The Nancy appeared to be a very fine vessel, between the size of the Queen Charlotte and Lady Prevost. There were three guns on the block-house, two 24 pounders; and one 6 pounder. I cannot say what was on the vessel, as all her ports were closed. I also got a new boat, called by them a gun-boat, but unworthy the name, being calculated to mount only a 24 pound carronade.

The Nautauwasaga is too narrow, and overhung with bushes, for a vessel to get up, except by warping, which prevented my sending gun-boats in, or col. Croghan from attempting to turn his rear; as we saw a number of indians skulking, and occasionally firing across from the banks; it was in this way the only man we had touched, was wounded.

You will see, by the enclosed letters, the short state they are in for provisions at Michilimackinack; and I am assured, from the best authority, that this is the only line of communication by which they can be supplied, that of the Grand river being rendered impassable for any thing heavier than a man to carry on his back, by sixty portages; I have therefore left the Scorpion and Tigress to blockade it closely, until the season becomes too boisterous for boat transportation. Col. Croghan thought it not advisable to fortify and garrison Nautauwasaga, as the enemy's communication from York is so short and convenient, that any force he could leave there would be cut off in the winter.

I was unfortunate in getting embayed, in a gale of wind, on a rocky, iron bound shore, which occasioned the loss of all the boats I had in tow, amongst which was the captured gun-boat and my launch: I felt fortunate, however, in saving my vessel, lumbered as she was with 450 souls on board, and shipping such immense quantities of water as to give me very serious alarm for some hours. I was compelled to strike some of my guns below, and nothing saved her, at last, but a sudden shift of wind, as there is nothing like anchorage in lake Huron, except in the mouths of rivers, the whole coast being a steep perpendicular rock. I have been several times in great danger of total loss, in this extremely dangerous navigation, entirely unknown to our pilots, except direct to Mackinack, by sailing suddenly from no soundings into 3 fathoms, and twice into 1-4 less twain, all a craggy rock. Those dangers might be avoided, from the transparency of the water, but for the continued thick fogs which prevail almost as constantly as on the Grand Bank.

By the arrival of the mail a few hours after I anchored at Detroit, I learned the critical state of our army on the peninsula, and that the Somers and Ohio had been captured.—The draft from the flats, with part of my guns and shot, had not yet arrived—but being certain my presence would be necessary at the earliest possible moment, I availed myself of a fair wind, and sailed for this place, where I am happy to learn that our army feel themselves perfectly secure where they are. I have, however, sent the Lawrence, Lady Prevost and Porcupine, to Buffalo there to render any assistance which may be required, and shall follow myself, in the course of 24 hours.—There is such an imminent risk of the loss of the fleet, at this season of the year, lying to an anchor near Buffalo, where the bottom is composed entirely of sharp rock, a strong current setting down, and exposed to the open lake; from whence the heaviest gales are experienced, that I shall not, unless ordered positively to do so from the department, continue there a moment longer than I can ascertain the commanding general's views, and in what way the fleet can co-operate with him. Daily and dearbought experience teaches us we ought not to risk our fleet in a situation where they are so liable to be lost. Lieut. Kennedy has, no doubt, informed you of the total loss of the Ariel, after being on float and ready to move from there.

I have the honor to remain, with great respect, sir, your obedient servant,

A. SINCLAIR.

N. B. A company of riflemen from Sandusky, has just arrived here, and have been forwarded on to fort Erie without delay.

THE INTERCEPTED LETTERS.

Michilimackinack, 20th July, 1814.

SIR—The American expedition, destined for the attack of this island, having at length made its appearance, under the command of commodore Elliot and lieut. col. Croghan, consisting of the Niagara, 20 guns, Lawrence, 20, Hunter brig, 8 guns, and a large schooner of — guns, the Mary of — guns, five gunboats, and the Mink, their prizes. I hasten to apprise you of this circumstance, lest the Nancy and her valuable cargo fall into their hands, and that you may be enabled to take such steps for their preservation as will appear to you most expedient under the present circumstances. I have taken such precautions as were in my power, to make you acquainted with this event, in case you should be on your passage. If so, I would recommend you to return to the Nothawasaga river, and to take the Nancy up as high as possibly, place her in a judicious position, and hastily run up a strong log house (such as were made when the boats were built, but larger) with loop holes and embrasures for your two six pounders, which will enable you to defend her should you be attacked, which is not unlikely.

The mode of obtaining her cargo, of such value to us, will depend upon the result of the attack, which we daily expect, and of the duration of the blockade. I see no other way of obtaining the provisions but by bringing them in batteaux, protected by the carronade in the bows of two of them.

I have the honor to be, sir, your most obedient servant,

RT. M'DOWELL, lieut. col.

commanding at Michilimackinack.

You will probably receive instructions from Kingston as to your conduct.

Extract from a letter to W. D. Thomas, esq. M. D. surgeon 104th regt. York or Kingston, dated Nautawasaga, 6th Aug. 1814.

"It is now nearly a month since I left York in company with lieut. Worsley of the navy, on my way to the land of promise, but things have turned out rather unfortunately, for you still behold me a sojourner in the wilderness. We had waited about a week on the banks of this river before the Nancy arrived, during which time we suffered every misery that you can imagine from bad weather and myriads of mosquitoes, &c. &c. The land here is the most barren I have seen and seems to have been formed from time to time by the washing of lake Huron, it being for upwards of two miles composed entirely of banks of sand, on which nothing grows but small brush wood. We found a number of indians encamped on the lake shore, who were extremely troublesome before the vessel arrived, and it was not possible to keep them out of our wigwams.—You may therefore judge what a pleasant sight the Nancy was for us: we found her a very fine schooner with an admirable cabin, her cargo was not completed before Sunday last, and she got under-way on Monday, with every prospect of reaching Mackinack in a short time, which is only 220 miles from hence. We had been out but a few hours, when we met an express from col. M'Dowell, to say that the American squadron from lake Erie of large force was blockading the island, and that we could not possibly reach it; we therefore had the mortification to put back into this wretched place where we are busily employed in erecting a block-house to contain and defend the stores and schooner in case of an attack, which is an event I have no doubt of; but I hope from the strength of the ground Worsley has chosen, and the goodness of his crew, that we shall be able to beat off a very strong force. The river is too narrow to sail up, we shall therefore only have gun-boats to contend with. I hope Mackinack has provisions for three months, and the enemy it is said cannot keep out so long on account of the climate, so that the Nancy can make a run late in the season, with the stores, if we succeed in defending them. I expect the man who brought the express the other day, who has gone to York, and intends going back to Mackinack in a canoe. I shall trust my person with him, as he thinks he can again give Jonathan the slip."

(End of the intercepted letters.)

Copy of a letter from lieut. Conkling to capt. Kennedy, dated

Fort George, U. Canada, Aug. 16th, 1814.

SIR—With extreme regret I have to make known to you the circumstances attending the capture of the Ohio and Somers. On the night of the 12th, between the hours of 10 and 12, the boats were seen a short distance ahead of the Somers, and were hailed from that vessel—they answered "provision boats," which deceived the officers of the deck, as our army boats had been in the habit of passing and repassing through the night, and enabled them to drift athwart his bows and cut his cables, at the same time pouring in a heavy fire before he discovered who they were. Instantaneously they were along side of me, and notwithstanding my exertions, aided by Mr. McCally, acting sailing-master, (who was soon disabled,) I was unable to repulse them but for a moment. I maintained the quarter-deck until my sword fell, in consequence of a shot in the shoulder, and all on deck either wounded or surrounded by bayonets. As their force was an overwhelming one, I thought further resistance vain, and gave up the vessel with the satisfaction of having performed my duty, and defended my vessel to the last.

List of killed and wounded.

OHIO.

Killed—John Fifehill, boatswain's mate, shot through the body.

Wounded—Reuben Wright, shot through the arm. Sailing-master McCally, shot thro' the thigh, and bayoneted through the foot.—Sergeant Eastman, of the 11th regt. of the army, wounded in the neck by a musket ball.—Granger, 11th regt. wounded in the arm.—Weath, 11th regt. wounded in the arm.—Whillers, 21st regt. wounded, cut in the arm.

SOMERS.

Wounded—Samuel Taylor, shot in the arm and cut in the head. Charles Ordena, cut in the shoulder; also one of the Ohio's marines, whose name the sergeant cannot find, now in the hospital, badly wounded,

The enemy's loss in killed and wounded is much more considerable; amongst the killed is the commanding officer of the Netley, (lying here) capt. Ratliff, he fell in attempting to come over my quarters. Notwithstanding the number of muskets and pistols which were fired, and the bustle inseparable from enterprises of this kind, neither the fort or the Porcupine attempted to fire as we drifted past them, nor did we receive a shot until past Black Rock, though they might have destroyed us with ease.

Respectfully, your obedient servant,

A M CONKLING.

P S We expect to be sent to Montreal, and perhaps to Quebec directly.

Ed. P. Kennedy, Esq. commanding U. S. naval force on Lake Erie.

Copy of a letter from com Sinclair to the secretary of the navy, dated,

U. S. sloop of war Niagara, off Erie, 10th Oct. 1814.

SIR—I have not transmitted you the inclosed correspondence between lieutenant-colonel McDowall, myself and colonel Croghan, from the circumstance of my having been referred to gentlemen in Detroit for the character of John Johnson, the subject of communication; and not having that enquiry in my power until a few days since. From the best information I have gained, from a very respectable gentleman there, I am induced to believe that major Holmes was misinformed as to the real character of that man, and was no doubt led into error by some of those wretches who are ever ready to profit by the distresses of their neighbors. Johnson, it seems, was never a naturalized citizen or magistrate under our government. He is an Irishman by birth, and at the declaration of war moved over to the Canada side, but neither bore arms or took any active part against the United States, and bears the character of an honest man; it seems also that he has a large family dependent on his exertions for support. It is therefore, my wish, and I am sure the wish of all those under my command, should the above information be found correct, upon a strict enquiry, that the government authorise such property as is known to have belonged to Johnson to be returned, as I cannot feel myself empowered to restore, under such circumstances, what the government and captors are equally interested in, nor could I reconcile it to my feelings to reduce to poverty the honest industrious man for the benefit of enriching myself.

While on this subject, I think it correct to state to you, the pitiful advantage taken of the offer made of payment for the cattle taken from St. Joseph's, which were so miserably poor, that had I seen them before they were brought on board they should not have been butchered, even to supply the necessities of the hospital department. And yet, knowing, as they did, that we could not in honor, withdraw our offer of payment, they brought in a bill of eight hundred and eighty-eight dollars and some cents, for 1800 lbs. of such beef, nearly 50 cents per pound, which was actually paid by the quarter-master of the detachment. Such, sir, is the boasted honor and generosity of our enemy.

I have the honor to remain, with high respect, sir, your obedient servant,

A. SINCLAIR.

HON. WM. JONES,

Secretary of the navy.

Copy of a note from captain Sinclair and lieutenant-colonel Croghan to lieutenant colonel M Dowall, dated

U. S. sloop of war Niagara, off Michilimackinac, 5th August, 1814.

Commodore Sinclair and lieutenant-colonel Croghan present their compliments to lieutenant-colonel M'Dowall, and request the favor of him to make known to the individuals who owned the stock on the Island of St. Joseph's, that such as they had brought off for the use of the fleet, and army, will be paid for upon application on board the fleet, or at any military post in the United States.

Copy of a letter from lieutenant-colonel M'Dowall, to commodore Sinclair and colonel Croghan, dated Michilimackinac, 6th August, 1814.

GENTLEMEN—I have learned with a degree of astonishment, which I have scarcely words to express, that part of the squadron and force under your command, while at St. Mary's, in defiance of the custom and usages of war between civilized nations, which render the private property of individuals sacred, have conducted themselves while at that place with a degree of rapacity and pillage, most disgraceful to those concerned, and utterly ruinous to the respectable inhabitants who have suffered, consigning several of them, who have large families, from a state of ease and comparative affluence, to poverty and want.

It is with a feeling of pain and disappointment that I find myself compelled to credit, in some degree, the circumstances to which I have alluded. I would hope that they are exaggerated; I would hope that such men as commodore Sinclair and lieutenant-colonel Croghan have not lent the sanction of their name to acts so repugnant to the genuine feelings of a soldier, so destructive to that honorable fame to which they aspire, and which has a tendency to revive in our minds the exploits of the buccaneers and their lawless mode of warfare.

I repeat to you, therefore, gentlemen, my conviction that this wanton robbery of unresisting individuals was unauthorised, and doubt not, from the voluntary offer of payment for the cattle taken from St. Joseph's, that full and complete compensation will be made. Should this be refused, and the acts alluded to not be disavowed, it will become my duty to represent the same to the governor general of the Canadas, and to urge the necessity of a severe retaliation for the outrages which have been committed. This, he has it constantly in his power to inflict, and if Ogdensburg and Hamilton are in consequence plundered and laid waste, their unfortunate inhabitants will not be at a loss to point out to their country the real authors of the misery thus brought upon them.

I have the honor to be, gentlemen, your most obedient servant,

RT. M'DOWALL, lieut. col.

Glengary light infantry,

Commanding at Michilimackinac.

To commodore SINCLAIR, and lieut. col. CROGHAN.

P. S. The bearer, Mr. Crawford, is my particular friend, and the proprietor of the cattle taken from St. Joseph's.

RT. M'DOWALL, lieut. col.

Copy of a letter from commodore Sinclair to lieutenant-colonel M'Dowall, dated

U. S. ship of war Niagara, off Michilimackinac, 6th Aug. 1814.

SIR—Your letter of this day's date has just been handed me by Mr. Crawford, and I am proud to have it in my power to say in reply, that my own sense of honor and justice accord with the instructions received from my government as relates to individuals and their property, both of which, I am convinced, will ever be held inviolate, however much we may be urged to the cruel system of retaliation, by the unrelenting and barbarous excesses committed by his majesty's arms on our maritime frontier.

This is a subject, however, to be discussed between our respective governments. The voluntary offer made yesterday by colonel Croghan and myself to pay for the cattle we had taken for the use of our sick, from the Island of St. Joseph's, supposing them to be private property, might have assured you the honorable course we meant to pursue; but as it appears not to have done so, I will give you further demonstration in the following extract from my orders, given the naval officer commanding the launches sent from my 'squadron to capture a vessel on lake Superior, &c.

"While executing the foregoing order, individuals and their property must be respected; no private houses or property molested in any way, or individuals maltreated."

Orders from colonel Croghan to major Holmes, who commanded the land forces on the expedition, were of a similar nature. The character of that officer, therefore, forbids a shadow of suspicion that he did not see just grounds for seizing as prize the property brought from the Sault St. Maries, and which you have claimed as the property of John Johnson. The official report of that officer to colonel Croghan says—"Much of the goods we have taken were found in the woods on the American side, and were claimed by the agent of John Johnson, an indian trader. I secured this property, because I thought it was good prize by the maritime law of nations, as recognized in the English courts (witness the case of admiral Rodney, adjudged by lord Mansfield); further, because Johnson had acted the infamous part of a traitor, having been a citizen and a magistrate of Michigan territory before the war, and at its commencement, and now discharging the functions of a magistrate under the British government; because his agents armed the indians from his store house at our approach—and, lastly, because those goods, or a considerable part of them, were designed to be taken to Mackinac: pork, salt and groceries composed the chief part, and Johnson himself passed Mackinac since the squadron arrived at St. Joseph's." Under such circumstances, sir, I cannot but feel it my duty to hold this property for adjudication, or until the pleasure of my government can be known as to the disposal of it. In the mean time, an inventory of every article brought on board my squadron has been taken, and whatever may be the issue, you may rest assured that justice shall be strictly observed, and, if restored to the claimant, a flag be granted for its transportation.

Your friend, Mr. Crawford, has been paid for his cattle.

I have the honor to remain, respectfully, sir, your most obedient servant,

A. SINCLAIR,

Commodore, commanding U. S.
naval force on the Upper Lakes.

Lieut. col. McDOWALL,

Glengary light infantry,
commanding at Michilimackinac.

BATTLE OF CHAMPLAIN.

To the editors of the National Intelligencer.

Gentlemen—Will you have the goodness to publish in the National Intelligencer the inclosed copies of a letter to the hon. the secretary of the navy, and of a report to commodore Macdonough, both of which are substantially correct, though perhaps not verbally, having been written in such haste as to deprive me of an opportunity of having a perfectly correct copy made.

Your obedient servant,

ROB. HENLY.

Copy of a letter from Lieut. Henly to the secretary of the navy, dated

U. S. brig Eagle, off Plattsburg,
September 12, 1814.

Sir—Permit me to make you acquainted with that part of the action of yesterday, which was particularly borne by the vessel which I had the honor to command, as it may not appear in the official report of captain Macdonough, whose duty it is to make a true and impartial statement of facts.

Being at anchor in the harbor of Plattsburg, in a line north and south, at the distance of about one hundred yards, the Eagle north, the Saratoga in the centre, and the Ticonderoga south, the enemy approached in a line abreast, with a favorable wind, which enabled him to choose his position; his brig taking her station on the starboard bow of the Eagle, at the distance of about a mile, his ship about one point abaft her (the Eagle's) beam, and the sloop Linnet, of eleven guns, making an effort to obtain a raking position under our stern. Perceiving the object of the sloop, I ordered her a broadside, which compelled her immediately to strike her colors.

At the moment when the enemy's ship had approached within point-blank distance, the Eagle commenced upon her a most destructive fire of her whole broadside, excepting the two long 18's forward, which were occasionally discharged at the enemy's brig, who frequently relieved her position and kept up a raking and most destructive fire upon this vessel.

I was confident that it was of the highest importance, in order to ensure success, to endeavor first to carry the enemy's ship. For a great length of time after the commencement of the action, the ship levelled her whole force upon the Eagle, dealing forth destruction.

After having sustained the severest of the action for more than one hour—having my springs shot away—many of my starboard guns disabled, and not being in a situation to bring one of them to bear upon either the enemy's ship or brig, I ordered the cable cut and cast the brig, taking an advantageous position a little south of the Saratoga, bringing my larboard broadside to bear upon the ship, which was very soon compelled to haul down her colors. Our fire was now directed at the brig, which struck in the space of eight minutes, and our contest terminated in victory. We now turned our attention toward the galleys, some of which, it is believed, sunk, and the residue made their escape. The Eagle was in too shattered a condition to pursue them.

I have the honor to enclose the surgeon's report of the killed and wounded on board the Eagle, by which you will perceive there were 13 killed and 27 wounded, most of them severely. Also a copy of the report of the meritorious conduct of my officers and men, which I made to capt. Macdonough, for your information, and which he has since informed me he had lost.

I have the honor to be, sir, with high respect, your obedient servant,

RO. HENLEY.

U. S. brig Eagle, off Plattsburgh.
September 1th, 1814.

Sir—I have the honor to enclose a report of the killed and wounded on board the United States brig Eagle under my command, in the action of yesterday. And while in the performance of this painful task, permit me sir, to profit by the occasion, to perform a more gratifying part of my duty, in representing to you, for the information of the honorable the secretary of the navy, the brave and good conduct of my officers and crew; all whom, I am proud to say, did their duty. All performed the part of real Americans; during the severest shock of the action their courage remained unshaken. Nothing could surpass the coolness and deliberate firmness with which every officer and man performed his respective part.

Early in the action I was deprived of the services of that excellent officer lieutenant Joseph Smith, who was wounded and carried below, but returned to his duty before the close of the action. He went into action in that cool and deliberate manner which marks the truly brave man.

The gallant acting lieut. William A. Spencer shortly after received a severe wound in the head, and was also carried below, but resumed his station previous to the close of the action.

Acting sailing master Daniel Record was slightly wounded, but did not leave the deck. Acting lieut. James Loomis, midshipmen Chamberlin, Mechesney and Tardy behaved with great spirit—in short, sir, every officer and man acted bravely and much to my satisfaction.

The zealous and active attention of acting surgeon Izrael Stoddart to the unfortunate officers and men who were wounded, entitles him to my warmest thanks, and I should be extremely gratified to see him rewarded by an appointment as surgeon in the navy.

Mr. Augustus Loomis, a volunteer, was very active and useful; and through you, sir, I beg leave to recommend him to the consideration of the honorable the secretary, for a lietenancy of marines; and earnestly request that acting lieuts. Spencer and Loomis may be confirmed in their appointments as lieutenants.

Mr. Record, whom I appointed at Vergennes as acting sailing master, has proved himself a good and worthy officer, if it should please the honorable secretary to confirm his appointment. I should be much gratified. Also Messrs. Edward Smith as gunner; Charles Johnson as carpenter, and John Wilson as boatswain—they behaved well and are worthy of warrants in the navy.

I have the honor to be, respectfully, sir, your obedient servant,

ROBERT HENLEY.

CRUIZE OF THE ADAMS.

Copies of letters from captain Charles Morris to the secretary of the navy, Hamden, (D. Maine), Aug. 22, 1814.

U. S. ship Adams.

Sir—After leaving Savannah we proceeded to the northward of the Matanilla Reef, where we remained waiting for the Jamaica convoy till the 22d May, when we learned from a neutral vessel they had passed us the preceding night. We then made sail to the northward, and on the 24th got sight of the convoy, from which we were chased by two ships of war; saw them again the next morning, but the weather being pleasant and the wind fair, they kept in very close order, and their convoying force being too strong for us to injure them, except in case of separation, we bore up to the eastward, intending to cruise a few days upon the banks. —On the 9th June met with islands of ice and very thick weather in lat. 41, 40—the fog continuing for several days and the thermometer indicating the vicinity of ice very frequently, we stood to the southward and eastward until we were clear of it. June 24th, in lat. 46, captured and destroyed the British brig Hunter, of 10 guns, 20 men, with a cargo of fish from Newfoundland to Corunna, June 28th, in lat. 48, captured and destroyed the British brig Mary, from France to Newfoundland with salt. On the 3d July, made the Blasquit Islands on the west coast of Ireland; on the 4th chased two vessels into the mouth of the Shannon, but the wind being strong from the westward and a heavy sea, we were obliged to haul out of the bay; stood to the northward and cruised off Broadhaven till the 9th, but the weather was so thick that we saw not a single vessel; we then returned to the southward and eastward. In lat. 49, long. 10, while in chase of a large merchant ship discovered a frigate under our lee bow from which we were obliged to tack, she continued in chase of us through the day and by her superior sailing had closed nearly within gunshot by sunset; at 8 P. M. cut away our anchors and hove two boat guns overboard, it falling calm during the night, got our boats ahead to tow, by day light had left the frigate five miles astern; the chase was however continued till 10 o'clock the next night, when by altering our course we lost sight of her. Returning again to the southward on the morning of the 19th in lat. 49, 20, discovered a frigate under our lee bow tacked, and made sail from him; two hours after discovered another ship of war on our weather beam in chase of us, by noon we had lost sight of the first in the haze, the other continued the chase at about four miles distance, till the evening of the 20th, when in lat. 56 we lost sight of him by changing our course. Although every possible precaution had been taken to guard against the scurvy, we had nothing sufficiently powerful to counteract the effect of continued wet, foggy and cold weather which had prevailed for fifty days, so many of the men were now afflicted with it, and their number so rapidly increasing as to render our immediate return to port indispensable; every diligence was accordingly used in getting to the westward, keeping in the track of the Newfoundland trade. July 26th, captured and destroyed English schooner Favorite with salt for Newfoundland. Aug. 7th, captured the British ship Paris, from Quebec to London, with a cargo of lumber and a few skins, took out a part of the skins and destroyed her. On the 16th August, captured and destroyed the English schooner Maria, with a cargo of lumber from St Andrews, N. B. bound to Newfoundland. At 4 A. M. on the 17th August the weather being very thick and foggy, the ship ran on shore upon the isle of Haute, but after landing the sick, prisoners, and a few stores we succeeded in getting her off and bringing her to this place. The extent of the injury she has received cannot yet be ascertained, but it is feared she will require considerable repairs, as she makes about 9 feet water an hour. Our sick have not yet joined us, but are comfortably situated at Camden under charge of the purser and surgeon's mate.

Very respectfully, your obdt. serv't.

C. MORRIS.

Hon. Secretary of the Navy, Washington.

SKIRMISH AT ROCK RIVER.

Copy of a letter from major Taylor to gen. Howard, dated Fort Madison, Sept. 6th 1814.

Sir—In obedience to your orders, I left Fort Independence on the 2d ult. and reached Rock river, our place of destination, on the evening of the 4th inst. without meeting a single indian or any occurrence worthy of relation.

On my arrival at the mouth of Rock river, the indians began to make their appearance in considerable numbers; running up the Mississippi to the upper village and crossing the river below us. After passing Rock river, which is very small at the mouth, from an attentive and careful examination as I proceeded up the Mississippi, I was confident it was impossible for us to enter its mouth with our large boats. Immediately opposite its mouth, a large island commences, which, together with the western shore of the Mississippi, was covered with a considerable number of horses; which were doubtless placed in those situations, in order to draw small detachments on shore. But in this they were disappointed, and I determined to alter the plan which you have suggested; which was to pass the different villages as if the object of the expedition was Prairie du Chien, for several reasons—first that I might have an opportunity of viewing the situation of the ground to enable me to select such a landing as would bring our artillery to bear on the villages with the greatest advantage. I was likewise in hopes a party would approach us with a flag, from which I expected to learn the situation of affairs at the Prairie, and ascertain in some measure their numbers and perhaps bring them to a council, when I should have been able to have retaliated on them for their repeated acts of treachery; or if they were determined to attack us, I was in hopes to draw them some distance from their towns towards the rapids, run down in the night and destroy them before they could return to their defence. But in this I was disappointed—the wind which had been in our favor, began to shift about at the time we passed the mouth of Rock river; and by the time we reached the head of the island, which is about a mile and a half long, it blew a perfect hurricane, quarterly down the river, and it was with difficulty we made land at a small island containing six or eight acres covered with willows, near the middle of the river and about sixty yards from the upper end of the island. In this situation I determined to remain during the night if the storm continued—as I knew the anchors of several of the boats in that event would not hold them and there was a great probability of their being drifted on sand bars, of which the river is full in this place, which would have exposed the men very much in getting them off, even if they could have prevented their filling with water.

It was about 4 o'clock in the evening when we were compelled to land; and large parties of Indians were on each side of the river as well as crossing in different directions in canoes—but not a gun was fired from either side. The wind continued to blow the whole night with violence accompanied with severe rain; which induced me to order the canoes to be brought in and placed in the bow of each boat—about day light capt. Whitesides' boat was fired on at the distance of about 16 paces, and a corporal who was on the outside of the boat was mortally wounded—my orders were, if a boat was fired on to return it; but not a man to leave the boat without positive orders from myself—so soon as it got perfectly light, as the enemy continued about the boat, I determined to drum them from the island, let their numbers be what they might: provided we were able to do so. I then assigned to each boat a proper guard, formed the troops for action and pushed through the willows to the opposite shore, but those fellows who had the boldness to fire on the boats, cleared themselves as soon as the troops were formed, by wading from the island we were encamped on, to the one just below us. Capt. Whitesides who was on the left, was able to give them a warm fire as they reached the island they had retreated to. They returned the fire for a few moments, when they retreated. In this affair we had two men badly wounded. When capt. Whitesides commenced the fire I ordered captain Rector to drop down with his boat to ground and to take the island below with artillery, and to fire on every canoe he should discover passing from one shore to the other which should come within reach. In this situation he remained about one hour, and no indians making their appearance, he determined to drop down the island about sixty yards and destroy several canoes that were laying to shore. This he effected, and just on setting his men on board, the British commenced a fire on our boats with a six, a four, and two swivels from behind a Nell, that completely covered them. The boats were entirely exposed to the artillery, which was distant about three hundred and fifty paces from us. So soon as the first gun fired, I ordered a six pounder to be brought out and placed, but, on recollecting a moment, I found the boat would be sunk before any impression could be made on them by our cannon, as they were completely under cover, and had already brought their guns to bear on our boats—for the round shot from their six passed through lieut. Hempstead's boat, and shattered her considerably, I then ordered the boats to drop down, which was done in order and conducted with the greatest coolness by every officer, although exposed to a constant fire from their artillery for more than half a mile. No soon as they commenced firing from their artillery, the indians raised the yell and commenced firing on us in every direction, whether they were able to do us any damage or not, from each side of the river. Capt. Rector, who was laying to the shore of the island, was attacked the instant the first gun was fired, by a very large party, and in a close and well contested contest, of about fifteen minutes, they drove them, after giving three rounds of grape from his three pounder. Capt. Whitesides, who was nearest to capt. Rector dropped down and anchored nigh him, and gave the enemy several fires with his swivel; but the wind was so hard down stream as to drift his anchor. Capt. Rector at that moment got his boat off, and we were then exposed to the fire of the indians for two miles, which we returned with interest from our small arms, and a null pieces of artillery, whenever we could get them to bear. I was compelled to drop down about three miles, before a proper place presented itself for landing, as but few of the boats had anchors sufficient to stop them in the river. Here I halted for the purpose of having the wounded attended, and some of the boats repaired, as some of them had been injured by the enemy's artillery. They followed us in their boats until we halted on a small prairie, and prepared for action, when they returned in as great a hurry as they followed us.

I then collected the officers together, and put the following question to them. Are we able, 334 effective men, officers, non commissioned officers and privates, to fight the enemy, with any prospect of success and effect, which is to destroy their villages and canoes? They were of opinion the enemy was at least three men to one, and that it was not practicable to effect either object. I then determined to drop down the river to the Lemoine without delay, as some of the ranging officers informed me their men were short of provisions, and execute the principal object of the expedition in erecting a fort to command the river. This shall be effected as soon as practicable, with the means in my power, and should the enemy attempt to descend the river in force before the fort can be completed, every foot of the way from the fort to the settlements shall be contested.

In the affair at Rock river, I had eleven men badly wounded, three mortally, of whom one has since died.

I am much indebted to the officers for their prompt obedience to orders, nor do I believe a braver set of men could have been collected than those who compose this detachment.—But, sir, I conceive it would have been madness in me, as well as a direct violation of my orders to have risked the detachment without a prospect of success.

I believe I should have been fully able to have accomplished your views if the enemy had not been supplied with artillery, and so advantageously posted as to render it impossible for us to have dislodged him without imminent danger of the loss of the whole detachment.

I am sir, yours, &c.

ZA. TAYLOR, brev. maj.
Com. detachment.

GENERAL RIPLEY'S REPORT,

Of the battle of the 15th Aug. near fort Eric, not having yet appeared in the REGISTER, and the conduct of some brave officers on the occasion thus passing unnoticed and unrewarded by that tribute of public applause and historic fame enjoyed by others in similar cases; we think the following copy of an official letter to general Gaines, the senior officer at that post, entitled to insertion.

Brigadier-General Gaines.

Sir—I take the liberty of reporting to you the course of operations on the left flank of the camp, during the action of the 15th inst.

From indications satisfactory to me, I was persuaded very early of the enemy's design of attacking us in our position. Before my alarm, I caused my brigade to occupy their alarm posts. On the first fire of the picket, captain Towson opened his artillery upon them from Fort Williams, in a style which does him infinite credit; it was continued with very great effect upon the enemy during the whole action.

The enemy advanced with fixed bayonets, and attempted to enter our works between the fort and water. They brought ladders for the purpose of scaling, and in order to prevent their troops from resorting to any other course excepting the bayonet, had caused all the flints to be taken from their muskets. The column that approached in this direction consisted of _____ and amounting in number to at least 1500 men—and according to the representation of prisoners they were 2,000 strong. The companies posted at the point of the works which they attempted to escalate, were capt. Ross's, capt. Marston's, lieut. Bowman's, and lieut. Larned's of the 21st regiment, not exceeding 70 men, under command of maj. Wood, of the engineer corps.

On the enemy's approach they opened their musketry upon them in a manner the most powerful, Fort Williams and this little band, emitted one broad uninterrupted sheet of light—the enemy were repulsed. They rallied, came on a second time to the charge, and a party waded round our line by the lake, and came in on the flank—but a reserve of two companies, posted in the commencement of the action to support this point, marched up and fired upon the party—they were all killed or taken. Five times in this manner did the enemy advance to the charge—five times were their columns beaten back in the utmost confusion by a force one sixth of their numbers; till at length, finding the contest unavailing, they retired. At this point we made 147 prisoners.

During the contest in this quarter, the lines of the whole left wing were perfectly lined, in addition to the reserves; and I found myself able to detach three companies of the 23d regiment from the left, to reinforce the troops at fort Eric, viz: captain Wattle's, lieut. Cantine's, and lieut. Brown's companies—and one of the 17th, under capt. Chunn. They were in the fort during the time of the explosion, and their conduct is highly spoken of by maj. Brooke, their commanding officer. Indeed, from the high state to which that regiment has been brought by maj. Brooke, I am convinced that no troops will behave better.

In submitting to your view the conduct of the troops under my command on this occasion, I find every thing to applaud, and nothing to reprehend. The utmost coolness and subordination was manifested, both by the 21st and 23d regiments. To maj. Wood I feel particularly indebted. This officer's merits are so well known, that approbation can scarcely add to his reputation. He has the merit with his Spartan band, in connection with captain Towson's artillery, of defeating a vaunting foe of six times his force. Major Brooke did every thing in his power; and it affords me pleasure at all times to call the attention of the general commanding to this amiable and accomplished officer.

The officers commanding companies immediately engaged, have my highest commendations—their conduct was most judicious and gallant. I cannot refrain from adverting to the manner in which captain Towson's artillery was served—I have never seen it equalled. This officer has so often distinguished himself, that to say simply that he is in action, is a volume of eulogium—the army, only to be informed he is there, by a spontaneous assent, are at once satisfied that he has performed well his part. I have no idea that there is an artillery officer in any service superior to him in the knowledge and performance of his duty.

The officers I have mentioned as commanding companies of the 21st and 23d regiments, are particularly commended by their commanding officers. Captain Marston, a most valuable officer, commanded a first line of three companies opposed to the enemy's column. Captain Ropes commanded the companies of reserve. Major Wood reports in the highest terms of the good conduct of the subalterns. Lieut. Riddle of the 15th, attached to the 21st, and Hall, and ensign Bean, Jones, Cumming, and Thomas of the 19th: as being extremely active, and performing their duties with alacrity.

The manner in which Lieutenant Belknap, of the 23d, retired with his picket of guard from before the enemy's column, excites my particular commendation. He gave orders to fire three times as he was retreating to camp, himself bringing up the rear. In this gallant manner, he kept the light advance of the enemy in check, for a distance of two or three hundred yards. I have to regret, that when entering our lines after his troops, the enemy pushed so close upon him that he received a severe wound from a bayonet.

Lieutenants Bushnel and Cissney, of the 19th, whilst gallantly engaged with the enemy at fort Eric, were both severely, if not mortally wounded. Their conduct merits the warmest approbation.

Permit me to recommend to your notice, the good conduct of my staff, lieut. Kirby, of the corps of artillery, my aid-de-camp, and lieut. Holding, acting brigade major; their activity and zeal was entirely to my satisfaction.

I close this long report, with stating to you in the highest terms of approbation, the skillfulness exhibited by doctor Fuller, surgeon of the 23d, and Drs. Trowbridge, surgeon of the 21st infantry, with their mates, Dr. Gale, of the 23d, and Dr. Everett and Allen, of the 21st, their active, humane, and judicious treatment of the wounded, both of the enemy and of our own, together with their steady and constant attention to the duties of their station, must have attracted your personal observation, and I am confident, will receive your approbation.

I have the honor to be, most respectfully,
your obedient servant,

(Signed) EL. W. RIPLEY,
Brig. gen. com. 2d brigade.

SURRENDER OF ALEXANDRIA.

IN COUNCIL, Sept. 7, 1814.

Present—Thos. Herbert, president, John Gird, And. Fleming, Henry Nicholson, J. B. Patton, John Cohagen, James Millan, John Hunter, Reuben Johnston, R. I. Taylor, Wm. Veitch, Anthony Rhodes.

The following narrative of the occupation of this town by the enemy and of the circumstances connected with that unfortunate transaction, having been submitted to council and duly considered and examined, the council do unanimously concur therein, and it is thereupon ordered, that it be published in both of the papers printed in this town.

THOS. HERBERT, president.

At a meeting of the committee of vigilance, this 7th of September, 1814, Present—Charles Simms, mayor; Joseph Dean, Matthew Robinson, Jonah Thomson, Wm. Herbert, Thos. Vowell Edmund I. Lee.

The following narrative of the occupation of the town of Alexandria by the British squadron, was submitted to the committee, who, upon examining the same, unanimously concur in it.

CHARLES SIMMS, Chairman.

THOS. VOWELL, Sec.

A respect for the opinions of others, and a due regard for the character of the citizens of Alexandria, have induced the municipal authorities of the town, to exhibit to the public a faithful narrative of the occupation of Alexandria by the British squadron under the command of captain Gordon, together with the causes which led to that distressing event.

To those who are unacquainted with the situation and condition of Alexandria in regard to its means of defence, it will be proper to state, that it is situate in the District of Columbia, upon the west bank of the river Potomac, about six miles below the city of Washington; the depth of water admitting large frigates to come to the very wharves of the town.

It is totally destitute of fortifications of any kind, and its protection against invasion by water, depended entirely upon a fort about six miles below the town, commonly known by the name of Fort Warburton, which was exclusively under the control of the government of the United States.

About the month of July last, it was announced that gen. Winder was appointed to the command of the tenth military district of the United States, comprehending the district of Columbia and a portion of the adjoining states of Virginia and Maryland, including the city of Baltimore.

In consequence of reports that the enemy contemplated an attack upon the city of Washington, the municipal authority of Alexandria thought it advisable to appoint a committee of vigilance for the purpose of procuring information of the approaches of the enemy, and obtaining assistance and advice as to the measures which it might be proper to pursue for protection and defence. As soon as this committee was appointed, they caused representations to be made to general Winder of the defenceless condition of the town, and earnestly entreated that some measures should be taken for its protection. Gen. Winder was called on, because it had been distinctly understood that the secretary of war would receive our communications through this channel only. From general Winder every assurance was made that could have been wished, that every thing in his power should be done for the protection of the town. His means however were very inconsiderable—he had no money to expend in fortifications or even in the erection of batteries; and unless some defence of this sort could be obtained, the town would be exposed to the mercy of the enemy, if he should approach by water and should succeed in passing the fort. The committee of vigilance was duly impressed with the necessity of providing some adequate defence against an attack by water, and some of its members, under the authority of the committee, had repeated interviews with gen. Winder on this subject; in one of them, the president of the United States was present, and he was distinctly given to understand, that unless there was provided an adequate defence for the town, it would be at the mercy of the enemy and would be compelled to make the best terms in its power. These representations and requests produced no other effect than the repetition of the assurance of an earnest desire on the part of general Winder to afford every assistance in his power.

On the 19th of August, a levy en masse, was made of the militia of the town and county of Alexandria, and on the 20th and 21st they were ordered to cross the Potomac, and stationed between Piscataway and fort Warburton. They took with them all the artillery which had been mounted at the expense of the corporation, except two 12 pounders, which were left without ammunition, and nearly all the arms belonging to the town. They left no men but the exempts from age, and other causes, and a few who had not reported themselves or had found substitutes; and it is not believed that, after their departure, one hundred effective armed men could have been mustered in the town. The two iron twelve pounders remained until the 25th, when, Alexandria being open to the enemy, then in full possession of Washington, they were removed at some distance from the town, by orders received from gen. Young.

On the night of the 24th, the Alexandria militia were ordered to re-cross the Potomac: they did so, and were marched through town without halting, to the country, and without giving information to the authorities or inhabitants of the place of their destination, and on the evening of the 27th, when the fleet approached, the municipal authorities of the town knew not where they were. It has since appeared that they were then stationed about nineteen miles from town by the orders of gen. Winder. It is here proper to state that gen. Winder on the morning of the 24th informed the committee of vigilance, who waited on him, that he could send no part of the forces with him to Alexandria; but that he had ordered gen. Young to cross over to Alexandria, if practicable, if not to fall down the river. The committee of vigilance, on receiving this information, sent boats over to the Maryland shore sufficient in number to bring over the whole of gen. Young's force at once; but when the boats reached him, he had received orders from the secretary of war to retain his position, as gen. Young in a communication to the mayor stated.

The committee of vigilance, despairing of obtaining any assistance from the general government, and having information of the rapid approach of the enemy towards the capital by land, and that their squadron was approaching Alexandria by water, deemed it their duty to recommend to the common council a resolution to the following effect:

"That in case the British vessels should pass the fort, or their forces approach the town by land, and there should be no sufficient force on our part to oppose them, with any reasonable prospect of success, they should appoint a committee to carry a flag to the officer commanding the enemy's force about to attack the town, and to procure the best terms for the safety of persons, houses, and property, in their power."

This recommendation was made on the day of the battle at Bladensburg, and on the same day was unanimously adopted by the common council.

The battle of Bladensburg having terminated in the defeat of our troops, and gen. Winder having been obliged to retreat from the capital towards Montgomery court-house, about fifteen miles to the west of it, the city of Washington was left in the entire possession of the enemy. The citizens of Alexandria saw nothing to impede the march of the British to their town—saw nothing to restrain them from committing the most brutal outrages upon the female portion of society, having neither arms nor men to make defence with; the president of the United States and the heads of the departments were absent, and it was not known where they were to be found; no military commander or officer of the general government was present to direct or advise.

In this state of things it was considered by the common council as their duty to send a flag to the British commander at Washington to know what treatment might be expected from him in case his troops should approach Alexandria, and should succeed in obtaining possession of the town. Admiral Cockburn, to whom the communication was made, assured the very respectable gentlemen who bore that flag, that private property of all descriptions should be respected; that it was probable that fresh provisions and some flour might be wanted, but that whatever they did take should be paid for.

While these things were going on in the city of Washington, the British squadron had been gradually ascending the Potomac, and on the 27th of August, three days after the battle at Bladensburg, it reached fort Warburton. No change had taken place in relation to the means of the defence of the town of Alexandria. Upon the fort did the safety of Alexandria now entirely depend. The citizens looked with great anxiety to this point for protection. But, to their great surprise and mortification, and without the concurrence or wish of the municipal authority of the town or of any member of it, the fort was abandoned and the magazine blown up by the United States' garrison on the evening of the 27th, without firing a single gun.

This relinquishment of the fort decided the fate of Alexandria. Nothing was left to oppose the progress of the squadron, and on the morning of the 28th it passed the ruins of the fort on its way to the town; their barges had sounded a considerable distance above. About ten o'clock of the morning of the 28th, after the squadron was above the fort, the committee appointed by the council to bear the flag to the enemy, in case they should pass the fort, set out upon their mission, and proceeded to the ship commanded by capt. Gordon. They requested to know what his intentions were in regard to the town of Alexandria.—

They were informed by capt. Gordon that he would communicate his terms when he came opposite the town. But he assured them, that, in the mean time, if the squadron was not molested by the inhabitants, the persons, houses and furniture of the citizens should not be injured. One of the gentlemen who attended the flag was the mayor. Upon his return from the squadron, he was informed that a small detachment of cavalry from the army of gen. Hungerford had been in town, probably for the purpose of reconnoitering the enemy; that it had remained but a short time. Upon enquiry it was understood that the army of general Hungerford was at that time about sixteen miles from Alexandria, on its march to that place, having followed the British squadron along the shores of Potomac a great part of its way up. The force of gen. Hungerford was composed of infantry and cavalry, with two or three small pieces of artillery, not calculated to afford any protection to the town.

The municipal authority of the town had received no advices of the approach of this army; and after the return of the flag, it was too late to enter into any arrangements with general Hungerford for defence—he was too distant to afford relief.

The squadron having suspended its approach to the town, did not reach it until the evening of this day. On the morning of the next day, to wit, the 29th of August, it arranged itself along the town, so as to command it from one extremity to the other. The force consisted of two frigates, to wit, the Sea-Horse, rating 38 guns, and Euryalus, rating 36 guns, two rocket ships, of 18 guns each, two bomb ships, of 8 guns each, and a schooner of 2 guns, which were but a few hundred yards from the wharves, and the houses so situated that they might have been laid in ashes in a few minutes. About ten o'clock in the morning of the 29th, capt. Gordon sent to the mayor the following terms:

His majesty's ship Sea-Horse, off Alexandria, the 29th day of August, 1814.

GENTLEMEN—In consequence of a deputation yesterday received from the city of Alexandria, requesting favorable terms for the safety of their city, the undermentioned are the only conditions in my power to offer.

The town of Alexandria (with the exception of public works) shall not be destroyed, unless hostilities are commenced on the part of the Americans; nor shall the inhabitants be molested in any manner whatever, or their dwelling houses entered, if the following articles are complied with.

1st article. All naval and ordnance stores, (public and private) must be immediately delivered up.

2nd article. Possession will be immediately taken of all the shipping, and their furniture must be sent on board by the owners without delay.

3d article. The vessels that have been sunk must be delivered up in the state they were in on the 19th of August, the day of the squadron passing the Kettle Bottoms.

4th article. Merchandize of every description must be instantly delivered up; and, to prevent any irregularities that might be committed in its embarkation, the merchants have it in their option, to load the vessels generally employed for that purpose, when they will be towed off by us.

5th article. All merchandize that has been removed from Alexandria since the 19th inst. is to be included in the above articles.

6th article. Refreshments of every description to be supplied the ships and paid for at the market price by bills on the British government.

7th article. Officers will be appointed to see that the articles Nos. 2, 3, 4 and 5, are strictly complied with, and any deviation or non-compliance on the part of the inhabitants of Alexandria will render this treaty null and void.

I have the honor to be, gentlemen, your most obedient humble servant,

JAMES A. GORDON,

Captain of his majesty's ship Sea-Horse, and senior officer of H. M. ships before Alexandria.
To the Council of the town of Alexandria.

Upon the mayor's receiving them he sent for the members of the committee of vigilance. These terms were borne by one of the officers of captain Gordon's frigate, who stated but one hour was allowed him to wait for a reply to them. Upon their being read by the mayor and the committee, it was observed to the officer by the mayor and one of the committee, that it would be impossible that the common council could accede to several of them—that the municipal authority of the town had no power to recal the merchandize that had been sent out subsequent to the 19th of August. The reply of the officer was, in that case it could not be expected.

He was further informed that it would not be in the power of the common council to compel the citizens to assist in getting up the sunken vessels. The officer answered that their sailors would then do it. He was required to explain what was intended by the term merchandize, as used in the 4th article. He answered that it was intended to embrace that species of merchandize only which was intended for exportation, such as tobacco, flour, cotton, bale goods, &c.

The mayor and one of the committee requested to know whether the commodore intended to require a delivery of any more of the merchandize than he could take away with him. He answered it would not be required. This explanation was afterwards recognized by captain Gordon. With these verbal explanations the preceding terms were submitted to the common council. It will be here proper to remark, that when these terms were proposed and submitted to the common council, general Hungerford had not arrived with his army, nor did it reach the suburbs of the town until the night of that day.—The town was still without any means of defence, and it was evident that no defence could avail, but that species of force which would be calculated to drive the ships from their mooring. No communication had been received from the officers of the general government, and the town appeared to be abandoned to its fate. Under these circumstances the common council could have no hesitation as to the course to be pursued. The citizens of the town of all descriptions, with an immense value of property were entirely in the power of the enemy, whose naval commander, according to the proclamation of the president of the United States, dated on the first of September, has declared his "purpose to be, to employ the force under his direction in destroying and laying waste such towns and districts upon the coast as may be found assailable." A similar declaration had been made by captain Gordon to the committee who bore the flag. Against the attack of such an enemy was the town of Alexandria without any means of defence whatever. The people of the town were at his mercy, and compelled to yield to such terms as the "victor" might prescribe. If the members of the municipal authority and citizens of the town had given loose to the feelings of indignation which the occasion had excited, and had sacrificed the town and had exposed their wives and daughters to the wanton insults of an unrestrained enemy, they would have betrayed their trusts and have deplored the consequences.

The common council therefore were obliged to yield submission to the terms as explained, and did thereupon pass and publish the following resolution:

Resolved, That the common council of Alexandria, in assenting to the conditions offered by the commander of the British squadron now off the town, has acted from the impulse of irresistible necessity, and solely from a regard to the welfare of the town. That it considers the assent by it given as only formal, inasmuch as the enemy already had it in their power to enforce a compliance with the demand by a seizure of the property required from us; and believing the safety of the persons of the inhabitants, of their dwellings, and of such property as is not comprehended within the requisition, to depend entirely upon the observance of the terms of it, the common council recommends to the inhabitants an acquiescence: at the same time it does expressly disclaim the power of doing any act on its part to enforce compliance; its authority in this particular being limited to recommendation only."

In the execution of the terms imposed by the enemy it is proper to state that the verbal explanations made by the officer to the mayor were generally adhered to. No merchandise was required to be brought back to the town; no assistance was required of or offered by the citizens in getting up the sunken vessels. The depredations of the enemy, with a few exceptions, were confined to flour, cotton and tobacco, which they carried off in some of the vessels then at the town; only one vessel was burnt; no private dwelling was visited or entered in a rude or hostile manner, nor were citizens personally exposed to insult.

The loss sustained from the enemy it is believed will not exceed the following:—three ships, three brigs, several bay and river craft, the number of which has not been ascertained; all of which were carried away, and one ship burnt. The quantity of flour carried away it is believed will not exceed sixteen thousand barrels—about one thousand hogsheads tobacco, one hundred and fifty bales of cotton, and of wine, sugar and other articles not more than five thousand dollars worth.

The editors of newspapers throughout the United States, are respectfully requested to re-publish the above.

The following is the official letter of J. A. Gordon to vice admiral Cochrane, giving the details of the capture of this place by the squadron under his command, dated Sea-horse, Chesapeake, September 9, 1814.

Sir—In obedience to your orders I proceeded to the river Potomac, with the ships named in the margin* on the 17th of last month, but from being without pilots to assist us through the most difficult parts of the river called the Kettle Bottoms, and from contrary winds, we were unable to reach fort Washington until the evening of the 27th—nor was this effected but by the severest labor. I believe that each of the ships was no less than twenty different times aground, and each time was obliged to haul off by main strength, and we were employed warping for five whole successive days, with the exception a few hours, a distance of more than 50 miles.

The bomb-ships were placed on the evening of the 27th, and immediately began the bombardment of the fort, it being my intention to attack it with the frigates at day-light the following morning. On the bursting of the first shell, the garrison were observed to retreat; but supposing some concealed design, I directed the fire to be continued. At 8 o'clock, however, my doubts were removed, by the explosion of the powder magazine, which destroyed the inner buildings, and at day-light the 28th we took possession. Besides the principal fort, which contained two 52, two 32 and eight 24 pounders, there was a battery on the beach of five 18 pounders, a martello tower with two 12 pounders and loop holes for musketry, and a battery in the rear of two 12 and six pound field pieces. The whole of these guns were already spiked by the enemy, and their complete destruction, with their carriages also, was effected by the seamen and marines, sent on that service in less than two hours. The populous city of Alexandria thus lost its only defence; and, having buoyed the channel, I deemed it better to postpone giving any answer to a proposal made to me for its capitulation until the following morning, when I was enabled to place the shipping in such a position as would ensure assent to the terms I had decided to enforce.

To this measure, I attribute their ready acquiescence, as it removed that doubt of my determination to proceed, which had been raised in the minds of the inhabitants by our army having retired from Washington; this part of our proceedings will be further explained by the accompanying documents.

The hon. lieut. Gordon of this ship, was sent on the evening of the 28th to prevent the escape of any of the vessels comprized in the capitulation, and the whole of those which were sea-worthy, amounting to 71 in number, were fitted and loaded by the 31st.

Capt. Baker, of the Fairy, bringing your orders of the 26th, having fought his way up the river, past a battery of five guns, and a large military force, confirmed the rumors which had already reached me of strong measures having been taken to oppose our return; and I therefore quitted Alexandria without waiting to destroy those remaining stores which we had not the means of bringing away.

Contrary winds again occasioned us the laborious task of warping the ships down the river, in which a day's delay took place, owing to the Devastation grounding. The enemy took advantage of this circumstance to attempt her destruction by three fire vessels attempted by fire row boats; but their object was defeated by the promptitude and gallantry of captain Alexander, who, with his own boats, and being followed by those of the other ships, chased the boats of the enemy up to the town of Alexandria. The cool and steady conduct of Mr. Moore, midshipman of the Seahorse, in towing the nearest fire vessel on shore, whilst the others were removed from the power of doing mischief by the smaller boats of the Devastation, entitles him to my highest recommendation.

The Meteor and the Fairy, assisted by the Ann Maria dispatch boat, a prize gun boat, and a boat belonging to the Euryalus, with a howitzer, had greatly impeded the progress of the enemy in their works, notwithstanding which, they were enabled to increase their battery to 11 guns, with a furnace for heating shot. On the third, the wind coming to the N. W. the Ætna and the Erebus succeeded in getting down to their assistance, and the whole of us, with the prizes, were assembled there on the 4th, except the Devastation, which in spite of our utmost exertion in warping her, still remained five miles higher up the river. This was the moment when the enemy made his greatest efforts to effect our destruction,

The Erebus being judiciously placed by captain Bartholomew in an admirable position for harrassing the workmen employed in the trenches, was attacked by three field pieces, which did her considerable damage before they were beaten off. And another attempt being made to destroy the Devastation with fire vessels, I sent the boats, under captain Baker, to her assistance; nothing could exceed the alacrity with which captain Baker went on this service, to which I attributed the immediate retreat of the boats and fire vessels. His loss, however, was considerable, owing to their having sought refuge under some guns in a narrow creek, thickly wooded, from which it was impossible for him to dislodge them.

On the 5th, at noon, the wind coming fair, and all my arrangements being made, the Sea Horse and Euryalus, anchored within musket shot of the batteries, while the whole of the prizes passed betwixt us and the shore—the bombs, the Fairy and Erebus, fringed as they passed, and afterwards anchored in a favorable position for facilitating by means of their force, the further removal of the frigates. At 3 P. M. having completely silenced the enemy's fire, the Seahorse and Euryalus cut their cables and the whole of us proceeded to the next position taken up by the troops, where they had two batteries mounting from 14 to 18 guns, on a range of cliffs of about a mile in extent, under which we were obliged to pass very close. I did not intend to make the attack that evening, but the Erebus grounded within range, we were necessarily called into action. On this occasion the fire of the Fairy had the most decisive effect, as well as that of the Erebus, whilst the bombs threw their shells with excellent precision, and the guns of the batteries thereby completely silenced by about three o'clock.

At day-light on the 6th, I made signal to weigh, and so satisfied were the whole of the parties opposed to us of their opposition being ineffectual, that they allowed us to pass without further molestation. I cannot close this detail of operations, comprising a period of twenty three days, without begging leave to call your attention to the singular exertion of those whom we have the honor to command, by which our success was effected. Our hammocks were down only two nights during the whole time; the many laborious duties which we had to perform were executed with a cheerfulness which I shall ever remember with pride, and which will ensure, I hope, your favorable estimation of their extraordinary zeal and abilities.

To captain Napier, I owe more obligations than I have words to express. The Euryalus lost her bowsprit, the head of her foremast, and the heads of all her topmasts, in a tornado, which she encountered on the 25th, just as her sails were clued up, whilst we were passing the flats of Maryland Point: and yet, after 12 hours work on her refitall, she was again under weigh, and advancing up the river.—Capt Napier speaks highly of the conduct of lieutenant Thomas Herbert on this as well as on every other of the many trying occasions which have called his abilities into action. His exertions were also particularly conspicuous in the prizes, many of which, already sunk by the enemy, were weighed, masted, hove down, caulked, rigged and loaded by our little squadron, during the three days which we remained at Alexandria.

It is difficult to distinguish amongst officers who had a greater share of duty than often falls to the lot of any, and which each performed with the greatest credit for his professional character. I cannot omit to recommend to your notice the meritorious conduct of captains Alexander, Bartholomew, Baker and Kenah, the latter of whom led us through many of the difficulties of the navigation; and particularly to captain Roberts, of the Meteor, who, besides undergoing the fatigues of the day, employed the night in coming the distance of ten miles to communicate and consult with me upon our further operations, preparatory to our passing the batteries.

So universally good was the conduct of all the officers; seamen and marines of the detachment, that I cannot particularize with justice to the rest. But I owe it to the long tried experience I have had of Mr. Henry King, 1st Lt. of the Seahorse, to point out to you, that such was his eagerness to take the part to which his abilities would have directed him on this occasion, that he even came out of a sick bed, to command at his quarters, whilst the ship was passing the batteries; nor can I ever forget how materially the service is indebted to Mr. Alexander Loutham, the master, for both finding and buoying the channel of a navigation which no ship of similar draft of water had ever before passed with their guns and stores on board, and which, according to the report of a seaman now in this ship, was not accomplished by the President, American frigate; even after taking her guns out; under a period of 42 days.

Enclosed is a list of killed and wounded; and also of the vessels captured.

I have the honor to be, &c.

[Here follows the capitulation of Alexandria, as heretofore published.]

Admiralty Office, Sept. 27, 1814.

Capt. Wainwright, of his majesty's ship Tonnant, arrived this morning at this office, with despatches from vice-admiral sir Alexander Cochrane, K. B. to John Wilson Croker, Esq. of which the following are copies:

Tonnant, in the Patuxent, Sept. 2, 1814.

SIR—I have the honor to acquaint you, for the information of my lords commissioners of the admiralty, of the proceedings of his majesty's combined forces since my arrival within the capes of Virginia; and I beg leave to offer my congratulations to their lordships upon the successful termination of an expedition, in which the whole of the enemy's flotilla under commodore Barney has been captured or destroyed; his army, though greatly superior in number, and strongly posted with cannon, defeated at Bladensburg—the city of Washington taken; the capital, with all the public buildings, military arsenals, dock-yard, and the rest of their naval establishment, together with a vast quantity of naval and military stores, a frigate of the largest class ready to launch, and a sloop of war afloat, either blown up or reduced to ashes.

Such a series of successes in the centre of an enemy's country, surrounded by a numerous population, could not be acquired without loss; and we have to lament the fall of some valuable officers and men; but considering the difficulties the forces had to contend with, the heat of the climate, and their coming into action at the end of a long march, our casualties are astonishingly few.

My letter of the 11th Aug. will have acquainted their lordships of my waiting in the Chesapeake for the arrival of rear-admiral Malcolm, with the expedition from Bermuda.

The rear admiral joined me on the 17th, and as I had information from rear admiral Cockburn, whom I found in the Potomac, that commodore Barney, with the Baltimore flotilla, had taken shelter at the head of the Patuxent, this afforded a pretext for ascending that river to attack him near its source, above Pig Point, while the ultimate destination of the combined force was Washington, should it be found that the attempt might be made with any prospect of success. To give their lordships a more correct idea of the place of attack, I send a sketch of the country upon which the movements of the army and navy are portrayed; by it their lordships will observe, that the best approach to Washington is by Port Tobacco upon the Potomac, and Benedict upon the Patuxent; from both of which are direct and good roads to that city, and their distances nearly alike: the roads from Benedict divide about five miles inland; the one by Piscataway and Bladensburg, the other following the course of the river, although at some distance from it, owing to the creeks that run up the country; this last passes through the towns of Nottingham and Marlborough to Bladensburg, at which town the river called the Eastern Branch, that bounds Washington to the eastward, is fordable, and the distance is about five miles. There are two bridges over this river at the city; but it was not to be expected that the enemy would leave them accessible to an invading army.

Previously to my entering the Patuxent, I detached captain Gordon, of his Majesty's ship Seahorse, with the ships and bombs named in the margin, in the Potomac, to bombard fort Washington (which is situated on the left bank of that river, about ten or twelve miles below the city), with a view of destroying that fort, and opening a free communication above, as well as to cover the retreat of the army, should its return by the Bladensburg road be found too hazardous from the accession of strength the enemy might obtain from Baltimore; it was also reasonable to expect, that the militia from the country to the northward and westward would flock in, so soon as it should be known that the capital was threatened.

Captain sir Peter Parker, in the Menelaus, with some small vessels, was sent up the Chesapeake above Baltimore, to divert the attention of the enemy in that quarter, and I proceeded with the remainder of the naval force and the troops, up this river, and landed the army upon the 19th and 20th, at Benedict.

So soon as the necessary provisions and stores could be assembled and arranged, major-general Ross, with his army, moved towards Nottingham, while our flotilla, consisting of the armed launches, pinnaces, barges, and other boats of the fleet, under the command of rear-admiral Cockburn, passed up the river, being instructed to keep upon the right flank of the army, for the double purpose of supplying it with provisions, and, if necessary, to pass it over to the left bank of the river into Calvert county, which secured a safe retreat to the ships, should it be judged necessary.

The army reached Nottingham upon the 21st, and on the following day arrived at Marlborough; the flotilla continued advancing towards the station of commodore Barney, about three miles above Pig Point, who although much superior in force to that sent against him, did not wait an attack, but, at the appearance of our boats, set fire to his flotilla, and the whole of his vessels excepting one, were blown up.

For the particulars of this well executed service, I must refer their lordships to rear-admiral Cockburn's report. No. 1, who, on the same evening, conveyed to me an account of his success, and intimation from major-general Ross, of his intention to proceed to the city of Washington, considering, from the information he had received, that it might be assailed, if done with alacrity, and in consequence had determined to march that evening upon Bladensburg. The remaining boats of the fleet were immediately employed in conveying up the river supplies of provisions for the forces, upon their return to Nottingham, agreeably to an arrangement made by the rear-admiral, who proceeded on in company with the army.

The report No. 2, of rear-admiral Cockburn's, will inform their lordships of the brilliant success of the forces, after their departure from Marlborough, when they returned upon the 26th, and having reached Benedict upon the 29th, the expedition was embarked in good order.

On combined services, such as we have been engaged in, it gives me the greatest pleasure to find myself united with so able and experienced an officer as major-general Ross, in whom are blended those qualities so essential to promote success, where co-operation between the two services becomes necessary; and I have much satisfaction in noticing the unanimity that prevailed between the army and navy, as I have also in stating to their lordships that major-general Ross has expressed his full approbation of the conduct of the officers, seamen and marines acting with the army.

I have before had occasion to speak of the unremitting zeal and exertions of rear-admiral Cockburn during the time he commanded in the Chesapeake under my orders:—the interest and ability which he has manifested throughout this late arduous service—justly entitle him to my best thanks, and to the acknowledgments of my lords commissioners of the admiralty.

Rear-admiral Malcolm, upon every occasion, and particularly in his arrangement for the speedy re-embarkation of the troops, rendered me essential assistance, and to him, as well as to rear-admiral Codrington, captain of the fleet, I am indebted for the alacrity and order with which the laborious duties in the conveying of supplies to the army were conducted.

For the conduct of the captains and officers of the squadron employed in the flotilla, and with the army, I must beg leave to refer their lordships to the reports of rear-admiral Cockburn, and to call their favorable consideration to those whom the rear-admiral has had occasion particularly to notice. While employed immediately under my eye, I had every reason to be perfectly satisfied with their zealous emulation, as well as that of every seaman and marine, to promote the service in which they were engaged.

Captain Wainwright, of his majesty's ship Tonnant, will have the honor to deliver this despatch to you, and as he was actually employed both with the flotilla and with the army in the whole of their proceedings, I beg leave to refer their lordships to him for any farther particulars.

I have not yet received any returns from the ships employed in the Potonac, the winds having been unfavorable to their coming down; but, by the information I gain from the country people, they have completely succeeded in the capture and destruction of fort Washington, which has been blown up.

I have the honor to be, &c.

(Signed) ALEX COCHRANE.

Vice-admiral and commander in chief

John Wilson Croker. Esq

On board the Resolution tender, off Mount Calvert, Monday night, 2.d Aug. 1814.

SIR—I have the honor to inform you that after parting from you at Benedict on the evening of the 20th instant, I proceeded up the Patuxent with the boats and tenders, the marines of the ships being embarked in them, under the command of captain Robyns (the senior officer of that corps in the fleet) and the marine artillery, under captain Harrison, in their two tenders; the Severn and Hebrus frigates, and the Manly sloop, being directed to follow us up the river as far as might prove practicable.

The boats and tenders I placed in three divisions; the first under the immediate command of captains Sullivan (the senior commander employed on the occasion) and Badcock; the second, under captains Money and Somerville; the third, under captain Ramsay:—the whole under the superintendence and immediate management of captain Wainwright of the Tonnant, lieutenant James Scott (1st of the Albion) attending as my aid-de-camp.

I endeavored to keep with the boats and tenders as nearly as possible abreast of the army under major general Ross, that I might communicate with him as occasion offered, according to the plan previously arranged; and about mid-day yesterday I accordingly anchored at the ferry-house opposite Lower Marlborough, where I met the general; and where the army halted for some hours, after which he marched for Nottingham, and I proceeded on for the same place with the boats. On our approaching that town a few shot were exchanged between the leading boats and some of the enemy's cavalry; but the appearance of our army advancing caused them to retire with precipitation. Captains Nourse and Palmer, of the Severn and Hebrus, joined me this day with their boats, having found it impracticable to get their ships higher than Benedict.

The major-general remained with the army at Nottingham, and the boats and tenders continued anchored off it during the night; and soon after day-light this morning, the whole moved again forward, but the wind blowing during the morning down the river, and the channel being excessively narrow, and the advance of our tenders consequently slow, I judged it advisable to push on with the boats, only leaving the tenders to follow as they could.

On approaching Pig Point (where the enemy's flotilla was said to be,) I landed the marines under captain Robyns on the left bank of the river, and directed him to march round and attack, on the land side, the town situated on the point, to draw from us the attention of such troops as might be there for its defence, and the defence of the flotilla; I then proceeded on with the boats, and, as we opened the reach above Pig Point, I plainly discovered commodore Barney's broad pendant in the head most vessel, a large sloop, and the remainder of the flotilla extending in a long line astern of her. Our boats now advanced towards them as rapidly as possible; but, on nearing them, we observed the sloop bearing the broad pendant to be on fire, and she very soon afterwards blew up. I now saw clearly that they were all abandoned, and on fire with trains to their magazines; and out of the seventeen vessels which composed this formidable and so much vaunted flotilla, sixteen were in quick succession blown to atoms, and the seventeenth (in which the fire had not taken) we captured. The commodore's sloop was a large armed vessel; the others were gunboats, all having a long gun in the bow, and a carronade in the stern; the calibre of the guns and number of the crew of each differed in proportion to the size of the boat, varying from 32 pounders and sixty men to 18 pounders and forty men. I found here lying above the flotilla, under its protection, thirteen merchant schooners, some of which not being worth bringing away, I caused to be burnt; such as were in good condition I directed to be moved to Pig Point. Whilst employed in taking these vessels, a few shot were fired at us by some of the men of the flotilla from the bushes on the shore near us; but lieutenant Scott, whom I had landed for that purpose, soon got hold of them and made them prisoners. Some horsemen likewise showed themselves on the neighboring heights, but a rocket or two dispersed them; and capt. Robyns, who had got possession of Pig Point without resistance, now spreading his men through the country, the enemy retreated to a distance, and left us in quiet possession of the town, the neighborhood, and the prizes.

A large quantity of tobacco having been found in the town at Pig Point, I have left captain Robyns, with the marines, and capt. Nourse, with two divisions of the boats, to hold the place and ship the tobacco into the prizes, and I have moved back with the third division to this point, to enable me to confer on our future operations with the major-general, who has been good enough to send his aid-de-camp to inform me of his safe arrival, with the army under his command, at Upper Marlborough.

In congratulating you, sir, which I do most sincerely, on the complete destruction of this flotilla of the enemy, which has lately occupied so much of our attention, I must beg to be permitted to assure you, that the cheerful and indefatigable exertions on this occasion, of captains Wainwright, Nourse and Palmer, and of captain Sullivan, the commanders, officers, and men, in the boats you have placed under my orders, most justly entitle them to my warmest acknowledgments and my earnest recommendation to your favorable notice.

I have the honor to be, &c.

(Signed) G. COCKBURN, rear-adm.

The hon. sir A. Cochrane, K. B.

H. M. ship Manly, off Nottingham, Feb 28, Aug. 27.

Sir—I have the honor to inform you, that, agreeably to the intentions I notified to you in my letter of the 22d inst. I proceeded by land on the morning of the 23d to Upper Marlborough, to meet and confer with maj. gen. Ross as to our further operations against the enemy, and were not long in agreeing on the propriety of making an immediate attempt on the city of Washington.

In conformity therefore with the wishes of the general, I instantly sent orders for our marine and naval forces at Pig-Point, to be forthwith moved over to Mount Calvert, and for the marines, marine artillery, and a portion of the seamen to be there landed, and with the utmost possible expedition to join the army, which I also most readily agreed to accompany.

The major gen. then made his dispositions, and arranged that capt. Robyns, with the marines of the ships, should retain possession of Upper Marlborough, and that the marine artillery and seamen should follow the army to the ground it was to occupy for the night. The army then moved on, and bivouacked before dark, about five miles nearer Washington.

In the night, captain Palmer of the Hebrus, and captain Money of the Trave, joined us with the seamen and with the marine artillery, under capt. Harrison; capt. Wainwright, of the Tonnant, had accompanied me the day before, as had also lieutenant James Scott (acting first lieutenant) of the Albion.

At day light in the morning of the 24th, the major-general again put the army in motion, directing his march upon Bladensburg; on reaching which place, with the advanced brigade, the enemy was discovered drawn up in force on a rising ground beyond the town; and by the fire he soon opened upon us as we entered the place, gave us to understand he was well protected with artillery. General Ross, however, did not hesitate in immediately advancing to attack him, although our troops were almost exhausted with the fatigue of the march they had just made, and but a small proportion of our little army had yet got up; this dashing measure, was, however, I am happy to add, crowned with the success it merited; for, in spite of the galling fire of the enemy, our troops advanced steadily on both his flanks, and in his front; and as soon as they arrived on even ground with him, he fled in every direction, leaving behind him ten pieces of cannon, and a considerable number of killed and wounded, amongst the latter commodore Barney and several other officers; some other prisoners were also taken, though not many, owing to the swiftness with which the enemy went off, and the fatigues our army had previously undergone.

It would, sir, be deemed presumption in me to attempt to give you particular details respecting the nature of this battle; I shall, therefore, only remark, generally, that the enemy, 8000 strong, on ground he had chosen as best adapted for him to defend, where he had time to erect his batteries, and concert all his measures, was dislodged as soon as reached, and a victory gained over him by a division of the British army, not amounting to more than 1,500 men, headed by our gallant general, whose brilliant achievement of this day it is beyond my power to do justice to, and indeed no possible comment could enhance.

The seamen, with the guns, were, to their great mortification, with the rear division during this short but decisive action; those, however, attached to the rocket brigade, were in the battle, and I remarked with much pleasure the precision with which the rockets were thrown by them, under the direction of first lieutenant Lawrence, of the marine artillery; Mr. Jeremiah M'Daniel, master's mate of the Tonnant, a very fine young man, who was attached to this party, being severely wounded, I beg permission to recommend him to your favorable consideration. The company of marines I have on so many occasions had cause to mention to you, commanded by first lieutenant Stephens, was also in the action as were the colonial marines, under the comporary command of capt. Reed, of the 6th West India regiment (these companies being attached to the light brigade,) and they respectively behaved with their accustomed zeal and bravery. None other of the naval department were fortunate enough to arrive up in time, to take their share in this battle, excepting capt. Palmer, of the Hebrus, with his aid-de-camp, Mr. Arthur Wakefield, midshipman of that ship, and lieut. James Scott, first of the Albion, who acted as my aid-de-camp, and remained with me during the whole time.

The contest being completely ended, and the enemy having retired from the field, the general gave the army about two hours rest, when he again moved forward on Washington; it was however dark before we reached that city, and on the general, myself, and some officers advancing a short way past the first houses of the town, without being accompanied by the troops, the enemy opened upon us a heavy fire of musquetry, from the capitol and two other houses; these were therefore almost immediately stormed by our people, taken possession of, and set on fire, after which the town submitted without further resistance.

The enemy himself, on our entering the town, set fire to the navy yard (filled with naval stores,) a frigate of the largest class, almost ready for launching, and a sloop of war laying off it, as he also did to the fort which protected the sea approach to Washington.

On taking possession of the city we also set fire to the president's palace, the treasury, and the war office; and in the morning capt. Wainwright went with a party to see that the destruction in the navy yard was complete; when he destroyed whatever stores and buildings had escaped the flames of the preceding night, a large quantity of ammunition and ordnance stores were likewise destroyed by us in the arsenal, as were about 200 pieces of artillery of different calibres, as well as a vast quantity of small arms. Two rope walks, of a very extensive nature, full of tar-rope, &c. situated at a considerable distance from the yard, were likewise set fire to and consumed; in short, sir, I do not believe a vestige of public property, or a store of any kind, which could be converted to the use of the government, escaped destruction; the bridges across the Eastern Branch and the Potomac were likewise destroyed.

This general destruction being completed during the day of the 25th, we marched again at nine that night on our return, by Bladensburg, to Upper Marlborough.

We arrived yesterday evening at the latter without molestation of any sort, indeed without a single musket having been fired, and this morning we moved on to this place, where I have found his majesty's sloop Manly, the tenders and the boats, and I have hoisted my flag pro tem in the former. The troops will probably march to-morrow, or next day at farthest, to Benedict for re-embarkation, and the flotilla will of course join you at the same time.

In closing, sir, my statement to you, of the arduous and highly important operations of this week, I have a most pleasing duty to perform, in assuring you of the good conduct of the officers and men who have been serving under me. I have been particularly indebted, whilst on this service, to capt. Wainwright of the Tonnant, for the assistance he has invariably afforded me; and to captains Palmer and Money, for their exertions during the march to and from Washington. To capt. Nourse, who has commanded the flotilla during my absence, my acknowledgments are most justly due, as well as to capt. Sullivan, Badcock, Somerville, Ramsay and Bruce, who have acted in it under him.

Lieut. James Scott, now first lieut. of the Albion, has, on this occasion rendered me essential services, and, as I have had reason so often of late to mention to you the gallant and meritorious conduct of this officer, I trust you will permit me to seize this opportunity of recommending him to your favorable notice and consideration.

Capt. Robyns (the senior officer of the marines on board the fleet,) who has had, during these operations, the marines of the ships under his orders, has executed ably and zealously the several services with which he has been entrusted, and is entitled to my best acknowledgments accordingly, as is also capt. Harrison of the marine artillery, who, with the officers and men attached to him, accompanied the army to and from Washington.

Mr. Dobie, surgeon of the Melpomene, volunteered his professional services on this occasion, and rendered much assistance to the wounded on the field of battle, as well as to many of the men taken ill on the line of march.

One colonial marine killed, one master's mate, two serjeants, and three colonial marines wounded, are the casualties sustained by the naval department; a general list of the killed and wounded of the whole army will of course, accompany the report of the major general.

I have the honor to be, &c.

From a late London paper.

A letter from an officer of his majesty's ship Regulus, dated Patuxent river, Aug. 30, communicates some particulars of the destruction of fort Washington, by the division appointed for that purpose:

"On the morning of the 25th, I was sent with three officers and 200 men, down to des-troty fort Washington, built to prevent ships coming up the river to attack the town. About 150 barrels of gunpowder, found here, were thrown into the well of the fort; when one of the artillery men most unfortunately dropped a lighted port-fire into the well, which, with a magazine about twelve yards distant, full of shells, charged and primed, blew up with the most tremendous explosion I ever heard. One house was unroofed, and the walls of two others, which had been burnt an hour before, were shook down; large pieces of earth, stones, bricks, shot, shells, &c. burst into the air, and falling amongst us (who had no where to run, being on a narrow neck of land, with the sea on three sides), killed about 12 men, and wounded above 30 more, most of them in a dreadful manner. I had the good fortune to escape with whole skin and bones but somewhat bruised. The groans of the people, almost buried in the earth, or with legs and arms broke, and the sight of pieces of bodies lying about, was a thousand times more distressing than the loss we met with in the field the day before."

From a letter of a young midshipman of his majesty's brig Espoir.

Never was bravery more conspicuous, and never did soldiers behave more gallantly. They advanced through a narrow defile under a dreadful fire from the American artillery and musketry; on coming to the foot of the hill, the Americans gave three cheers, and fired a tremendous volley, appearing, as if it was an expiring effort; they charged up the hill, some dying, whilst others fell through fatigue (the day being dreadful hot.) On arriving at the moment, the Americans fled in all directions, with Mr. Madison at their head. We took possession of all the cannon and pursued the flying enemy; took commodore Barney previously, who was mortally wounded.

On the remainder of the army coming up, we continued our march, and towards evening we entered Washington without any further opposition. We immediately went to all the public buildings and to Mr. Madison's house in the capitol, and blew up the dock yard, destroyed a 60 gun frigate and a sloop of war that were just ready for launching. When the general entered Mr. Madison's house, he found the table spread for dinner, and all the fruits and wines in cool. The officers regaled themselves with whatever they wanted, and then set fire to the house. Private houses were respected except the Josephine hotel, one of the most beautiful hotels ever built—it was burnt. We remained in possession of Washington 23 hours, when finding there was nothing more to do, we commenced our retreat on the evening of the 26th, not having been in the least molested in our retreat by the Americans. We embarked the troops that night and the following day on board our respective ships. The general, during the action, behaved most gallantly, riding through the ranks, cheering the soldiers. He had three horses shot under him. It is supposed we shall attack Portsmouth, or New London—if fortune favors us much as it has, we shall do great things.

DEATH OF SIR PETER PARKER.

ADMIRALTY OFFICE, SEPT. 27.

[Transmitted by Vice-Admiral Cochrane.]

His majesty's ship Menelaus, off Pool's island, Chesapeake, Sept. 1, 1814

Sir—With grief the deepest it becomes my duty to communicate the death of sir Peter Parker, Bart. late commander of his majesty's ship Menelaus, and the occurrences attending an attack on the enemy's troops, on the night of the 20th ult. encamped at Bellair. The previous and accompanying letters of sir Peter Parker, will, I presume, fully point out the respect the enemy on all occasions evinced at the approach of our arms, retreating at every attack, though possessing a superiority of numbers of five to one; an intelligent black man gave us information of 200 militia being encamped behind a wood, distant half a mile from the beach, and described their situation, so as to give us the strongest hopes of cutting off and securing the largest part as our prisoners, destroying the camp, field-pieces, &c. and possessing also certain information that one man out of every five had been levied as a requisition on the eastern shore, for the purpose of being sent over for the protection of Baltimore, who were only prevented crossing the bay by the activity and vigilance of the tender and ship's boats. One hundred and four bayonets, with 20 pikes, were landed at eleven o'clock at night, under the immediate direction of capt. sir Peter Parker, Bart. the first division headed by myself, and the second division by lieut. Pearce. On arriving at the ground we discovered the enemy had shifted his position, as we were then informed, to the distance of a mile farther; having taken the look-out picket immediately on our landing, we were in assurance our motions had not been discovered, and with the deepest silence followed on for the camp. After a march of between four and five miles in the country, we found the enemy posted on a plain, surrounded by woods, with the camp in their rear; they were drawn up in line, and perfectly ready to receive us; a single moment was not to be lost; by a smart fire and instant charge, we commenced the attack, forced them from their position, putting them before us in full retreat to the rear of their artillery, where they again made a stand, showing a disposition to out flank us, on the right; a movement was instantly made by lieutenant Pearce's division to force them from that quarter; and it was at this time, while animating his men in the most heroic manner that sir Peter Parker received his mortal wound which obliged him to quit the field, and he expired in a few minutes. Lieut. Pearce, with his division, soon routed the enemy, while that under my command gained and passed the camp. One of the field pieces was momentarily in our possession, but obliged to quit it from superior numbers.

The marines, under lieuts Beynon and Post, formed our centre, and never was bravery more conspicuous. Finding it impossible to close on the enemy, from the rapidity of their retreat, having pursued them upwards of a mile, I deemed it prudent to retire towards the beach, which was effected in the best possible order, taking with us from the field 25 of our wounded—the whole we could find, the enemy not even attempting to regain the ground they had lost; from three prisoners (cavalry) taken by us, we learn their force amounted to 500 militia, a troop of horse, and five pieces of artillery, and since by flags of truce, I am led to believe their number much greater.

Repelling a force of such magnitude with so small a body as we opposed to them, will I trust speak for itself; and although our loss has been severe, I hope the lustre acquired to our arms will compensate for it. Permit me, sir, to offer to your notice the conduct of Mr. James Stepford Hore, master's mate of this ship, who on this, as well as on other trying occasions, evinced the greatest zeal and gallantry. In justice to sub-lieut. Johnson, commanding the Jane tender, I must beg to notice the handsome manner in which he has at all times volunteered his services.

Herewith I beg leave to enclose you a list of the killed, wounded, and missing in this affair

I have the honor, to be, &c.

(Signed)

HEN. CREASE, act. com.

Total—14 killed; 27 wounded.

[AMERICAN ACCOUNT.]

Not having before inserted col Reed's official letter respecting the affair with capt. Parker, we take the opportunity to present it, as follows:

Copy of a letter from col. Philip Reed, of the 1st. regt. of Maryland militia, to brig. gen. Benj. Chambers.

Camp at Belle Air, 3d Sept. 1814.

Sir—I avail myself of the first moment I have been able to seize from incessant labor, to inform you that about half past 11 o'clock, on the night of the 30th ult. I received information that the barges of the enemy, then lying off Waltham's farm were moving in shore. I concluded their object was to land and burn the houses, &c. at Waltham's and made the necessary arrangements to prevent them, and to be prepared for an opportunity which I had sought for several days to strike the enemy. During our march to the point threatened, it was discovered that the blow was aimed at our camp. Orders were immediately given to the quarter master, to remove the camp and baggage, and to the troops to countermarch, pass the road by the right of our camp, and form on the rising ground about three hundred paces in the rear—the right towards Caulk's house, and the left retiring on the road, the artillery in the centre, supported by the infantry on the right and left. I directed capt. Wickes and his second lieutenant Beck, with a part of the rifle company to be formed, so as to cover the road by which the enemy marched, and with this section I determined to post myself, leaving the line to be formed under the direction of major Wickes and capt. Chambers.

The head of the enemy's column soon presented itself and received the fire of our advance party, at seventy paces distance, and, being pressed by numbers vastly superior, I repaired to my post in the line; having ordered the riflemen to return and form on the right of the line. The fire now became general along the whole line, and was sustained by our troops with the most determined valor. The enemy pressed our front; foiled in this he threw himself on our left flank, which was occupied by capt. Chambers's company. Here too his efforts were equally unavailing. His fire had nearly ceased, when I was informed that in some parts of our line the cartridges were entirely expended, nor did any of the boxes contain more than a very few rounds, although each man brought about twenty into the field.

The artillery cartridges were entirely expended. Under these circumstances I ordered the line to fall back to a convenient spot where a part of the line was fortified, when the few remaining cartridges were distributed amongst a part of the line, which was again brought into the field, where it remained for a considerable time, the night preventing a pursuit. The artillery and infantry for whom there were no cartridges were ordered to this place. The enemy having made every effort in his power, although apprized of our having fallen back, manifested no disposition to follow us up, but retreated about the time our ammunition was exhausted.

When it is recollected that very few of our officers or men had ever heard the whistling of a ball; that the force of the enemy, as the most accurate information enables us to estimate; was double ours; that it was commanded by sir Peter Parker of the Menelaus, one of the most distinguished officers in the British navy, and composed (as their officers admitted in a subsequent conversation,) of as fine men as could be selected from the British service, I feel fully justified in the assertion, that the gallantry of the officers and men engaged on this occasion, could not be excelled by any troops. The officers and men performed their duty. It is however but an act of justice to notice those officers who seemed to display more than a common degree of gallantry. Major Wickes and captain Chambers were conspicuous—captain Wickes and his lieutenant Beck of the rifle corps, lieutenant Eunick and ensign Shriven of captain Chambers' company exerted themselves, as did captain Hynson and his lieutenant Grant, capt. Ussleton of the brigade artillery and his lieutenants Reed and Brown—Lieut. Tilghman who commanded the guns of the volunteer artillery, in the absence of captain Hands who is in ill health and from home, was conspicuous for his gallantry, his ensign Thomas also manifested much firmness.

I am indebted to captain Wilson of the cavalry, who was with me, for his exertions, and also to adjutant Hynson, who displayed much zeal and firmness throughout—To Dr. Blake, Dr. Gordon and to Isaac Spencer, Esq. who were accidentally in camp, I am indebted for their assistance in reconnoitering the enemy on his advance.

You will be surprised, sir, when I inform you that in an engagement of so long continuance in an open field, when the moon shone brilliantly on the rising ground occupied by our troops, while the shade of the neighboring woods, under the protection of which the enemy fought, gave us but an indistinct view of any thing but the flash of his guns; that under the disparity of numbers against us, and the advantage of regular discipline on the side of the enemy, we had not one man killed, and only one serjeant, one corporal, and one private wounded, and those slightly. The enemy left one midshipman and eight men dead on the field, and nine wounded; six of whom died in the course of a few hours. Sir Peter Parker was amongst the slain—he was mortally wounded with a buck-shot, and died before he reached the barges, to which he was conveyed by his men. The enemy's force, consisting of marines and musqueteers, was in part armed with boarding pikes, swords, and pistols, no doubt intended for our tents, as orders had been given by sir Peter not to fire—many of these arms, with rockets, muskets, &c. have fallen into our hands, found by the picket guard under ensign Shriven, which was posted on the battle ground for the remainder of the night—nothing but the want of ammunition saved the enemy from destruction.

Attached are the names of the wounded; and, as an act of justice to those concerned, I inclose you a list of the names of every officer and soldier engaged in the affair—certain information from the enemy assures us, that his total loss in killed and wounded was forty-two or forty-three, including two wounded lieutenants.

I am, sir, your most obedient humble servant,

PHIL. REED,

Lieut. Col. commandant.

COCKBURN'S EXPEDITIONS.

In the London Gazette of October 1, we find a series of communications from admiral Cockburn, embracing an account of his operations in the CHESAPEAKE, previous to the arrival there of admiral Cochrane.

THE EXTRACTS.

June 1.—The rear-admiral incloses a letter from captain Ross, of his majesty's ship Albion, dated off Tangier Sound, the 29th of May, giving an account of his having with the boats of that ship, and the Dragon, proceeded into the river Pungoteak, in Virginia, for the purpose of destroying any batteries or capturing any vessels that he might find there. There were no vessels in the river: but a party of seamen and marines were landed to attack a battery, which they took possession of, after a smart firing, notwithstanding the militia which collected on the occasion, and re-embarked after destroying the work, barracks, and guard-houses, and bringing away a six pounder gun with its carriage.

June 22.—The rear-admiral transmits four letters from captain Barrie, of his majesty's ship Dragon, dated between the 1st and 19th of June, reporting his proceedings while dispatched by rear-admiral Cockburn, against the flotilla fitted out at Baltimore, under the orders of commodore Barney.

On the 1st of June, captain Barrie, with the St. Lawrence schooner, and the boats of the Albion and Dragon, fell in with the flotilla standing down the Chesapeake, and retreated before it towards the Dragon, then at anchor off Smith's Point. This ship having got under weigh, captain Barrie wore with the schooner and boats, but the flotilla made off and escaped into the Patuxent river. The Dragon being obliged to come again to an anchor, and the boats not being strong enough to attack the flotilla, captain Barrie endeavored to induce the enemy to separate his force by detaching two boats to cut off a schooner under Cove Point; but the Americans suffered this vessel to be burnt in the face of the flotilla, without attempting to save her.

On the 8th the flotilla retreated higher up the Patuxent, and captain Barrie being joined on the following day by the Loire and Jaseur brig, he proceeded up the river with them, the St. Lawrence schooner, and the boats of the Albion and Dragon. The enemy retreated into St. Leonard's creek, into which they could only be pursued by the boats, which were too inferior in force to allow of any attack being made by them alone; captain Barrie endeavored, however, to provoke the enemy by rockets and carronades from the boats, to come down within reach of the ship's guns. The flotilla was at one time so much galled by these attacks, that it quitted its position, and chased the boats, and after a slight skirmish with the smaller vessels it returned precipitately to its original position. With a view to force the flotilla to quit this station, detachments of seamen and marines were landed on both sides of the river, and the enemy's militia (though assembled to the number of three to five hundred) retreating before them into the woods, the marines destroyed two tobacco stores, and several houses, which formed military posts. On the 15th the Narcissus joined, and captain Barrie determined to proceed up the river with 12 boats, having in them one hundred and eighty marines, and thirty of the black colonial corps; they proceeded to Benedict whence a party of regulars fled at the approach, leaving behind several muskets, and part of their camp equipage, with a six pounder, which was spiked; a store of tobacco was also found there—captain Barrie advanced from thence towards Marlborough, and although only eighteen miles from Washington, took possession of the place, the militia and inhabitants flying in the woods.—A schooner was loaded with tobacco, and the boats plentifully supplied with stock, after which having burnt tobacco stores, containing two thousand five hundred hogsheads, the detachment re-embarked. The enemy collected three hundred and sixty regulars and some militia on some cliffs which the boats had to pass; but some marines being landed, traversed the skirts of the heights, and re-embarked without molestation; and the enemy did not show himself till the boats were out of gun shot. Captain Barrie commends in high terms, the conduct of all the officers and men, seamen and marines, under his orders as well as that of the colonial corps, composed of armed blacks, and rear-admiral Cockburn takes the opportunity of expressing his high sense of the personal exertions and able conduct displayed by captain Barrie.

June 25.—The rear-admiral transmits a report from lieutenant Urnston, first of the Albion, of a successful attack made by the boats of the squadron, under the lieutenant's direction, on a post established by the enemy at Chisene-sick, on the main land, abreast of Watt's island. The detachment landed, notwithstanding a fire of grape and musquetry, drove the enemy from the post, and destroyed the guard-houses, &c. bringing away a six pounder, the only gun of the enemy at that place. Great gallantry was displayed by all employed on this occasion.

July 6.—The rear-admiral incloses two reports addressed to him by captains Brown and Nourse, of the Loire and Severn: the former, dated the 27th of June, states that the enemy having established a battery on the banks of the Patuxent which opened on the Loire and Narcissus, he had judged it proper to move the two ships lower down the river, when the flotilla, under command of Barney moved out of St. Leonard's creek and ran higher up the Patuxent, with the exception of one row-boat, which returned to the creek apparently damaged by the fire of the frigates. The letter from captain Nourse, dated the 7th of July, reports his joining the ships in the Patuxent; and having moved them up beyond St. Leonard's creek, he sent captain Brown with the marines of the ships up the creek, by whom two of the enemy's gun boats that were found drawn up and scuttled, were with other vessels burnt, and a large tobacco store destroyed.

July 19.—The rear-admiral states that having been joined by a battalion of marines, he proceeded up the Potomac with a view to attack Leonard's town, the capital of St. Mary's county, where the 56th regiment was stationed. The marines were landed under major Lewis, whilst the boats pulled up in front of the town; but on discovering the British, the enemy's armed force quitted the place and suffered them to take quiet possession of it. A quantity of stores belonging to the thirty-sixth regiment, and a number of arms of different descriptions, were found here and destroyed; a quantity of tobacco, flour, provisions, and other articles, were brought away in the boats and in a schooner lying off the town. Not a musket being fired, nor an armed enemy seen, the town was accordingly spared.

July 21.—The rear-admiral reports, that the enemy having collected some Virginia militia at a place called Nominny ferry, in Virginia, a considerable way up Nominny river, he proceeded thither with their boats and marines (the latter commanded by captain Robyns, during the illness of major Lewis.) The enemy's position was on a very commanding eminence, projecting into the water; but some marines being landed on its flank, and soon getting up the craggy side of the mountain, while the main body landed at the ferry, the enemy fell back, and though pursued several miles till the approach of night, escaped with the loss of a few prisoners. They had withdrawn their field artillery, and hid it in the woods; fearing that if they kept it to use against the British, they would not be able to retreat with it quick enough to save it from capture.—After taking on board all the tobacco, and other stores found in the place, with a quantity of cattle, and destroying all the store-houses and buildings, the rear-admiral re-embarked; and dropping down to another point of the Nominy he observed some movements on shore upon which he again landed with marines. The enemy fired a volley at them, but on the advance of the marines, fled into the woods.—Every thing in the neighborhood was there fore also destroyed or brought off; and after visiting the country in several other directions, covering the escape of the negroes who were anxious to join him, he quitted the river, and returned to the ships with one hundred and thirty five refugee negroes, two captured schooners, a large quantity of tobacco, dry goods, and cattle, and a few prisoners.

July 24.—The rear-admiral gives an account of his having gone up St. Clement's creek, St. Mary's county, with the boats and marines, to examine the country. The militia showed themselves occasionally, but always retreated when pursued; and the boats returned to the ships without any casualty, having captured four schooners and destroyed one. The inhabitants having remained peaceably in their houses, the rear-admiral did not suffer any injury to be done to them excepting at one farm, from which two musket shots were fired at the admiral's gig, and where the property was therefore destroyed.

July 31.—The rear admiral reports, that having on the 2th proceeded to the head of the Machodick river, in Virginia, where he burnt six schooners, whilst the marines marched without opposition, over the country on the banks of that river, and there not remaining any other place on the Virginia or St. Mary's side of his last anchorage that he had not visited, he, on the 28th, caused the ships to move above Blackstone's Island, and on the 29th proceeded with the boats and marines up the Wicomico river; he landed at Hamburg and Chaptico, from which latter place he shipped a considerable quantity of tobacco and visited several houses in different parts of the country, the owners of which living quietly with their families, and seeming to consider themselves and their neighborhood at his disposal, he caused no farther inconvenience to them, than obliging them to furnish supplies of cattle and stock for the use of his forces.

Aug. 4.—The rear admiral states, that on the 2^d the squadron dropped down the Potomac, near the entrance of the Yocomoco river, which he entered the following day with the boats and marines and landed with the latter. The enemy had here collected in great force and made more resistance than usual; but the ardor and determination of the rear-admiral's gallant little band carried all before them; and after forcing the enemy to give way, they followed him 10 miles up the country, captured a field piece, and burnt several houses which had been converted into depots, for militia, arms, &c. Learning afterwards that gen. Hungerford, had rallied his men at Kinsale, the rear-admiral proceeded thither; and though the enemy's position was extremely strong, he had only time to give the British an ineffectual volley, before they gained the height, when he again retired with precipitation, and did not re-appear. The stores found at Kinsale were then shipped without molestation; and having burnt the storehouses and other places, with two old schooners, and destroyed two batteries, the rear-admiral re-embarked, bringing away five prize schooners, and a large quantity of tobacco, flour, &c. a field piece and a few prisoners. The American general, Taylor, was wounded and unhorsed, and escaped only through the thickness of the wood and bushes, into which he ran. The British had three men killed, and as many wounded. The conduct of the officers and men on this occasion calls for the rear-admiral's particular commendation; with 500 men they penetrated ten miles into the enemy's country, and skirmished back surrounded by woods, in the face of the whole collected militia of Virginia, under generals Hungerford and Taylor; and after this long march carried the heights of Kinsale in the most gallant manner.

August 8.—The rear-admiral states, that Coan river, a few miles from Yocomoco, being the only inlet on the Virginia side of the Potomac that he had not visited, he proceeded on the 7th to attack it with the boats and marines: after a tolerably quick fire on the boats, the enemy went off precipitately with the guns: the battery was destroyed, and the river ascended, in which three schooners were captured, and some tobacco brought off.

August 13.—The rear-admiral gives an account of his having, on the 12th, proceeded up St. Mary's creek and landed in various parts of the country about that extensive inlet, but without seeing a single armed person, though militia had formerly been stationed at St. Mary's factory for defence; the inhabitants of the state appearing to consider it wiser to submit than to attempt opposition.

August 15.—The rear-admiral reports his having again on that day landed within St. Mary's creek, but found on the different parts of the country, the same quiet and submissive conduct on the part of the inhabitants, as in the places visited on the 12th.—Throughout the whole of these operations, rear admiral Cockburn repeats the highest encomiums on all the officers and men of the ships and marines, under his orders. Although from the nature of the country, and the excessive heat of the climate, these services must have been more harrassing, they were carried on with greater cheerfulness and perseverance.

The captains of his majesty's ships on all occasions, volunteered to accompany the rear admiral. To lieutenant-col. Malcolm and major Lewis, of the Royal marines, he expresses his obligations, as well as to the other officers of that corps. The conduct of the men was also deserving of the greatest praise; and though the re-embarkations frequently took place in the night, yet during the whole of the operations neither a sailor nor a marine was reported missing.

In transmitting the reports of these services, which come down to the period of sir Alexander Cochrane in the Chesapeake, the vice-admiral expresses the very high sense he entertains of the arrangement, zeal and activity which have, on all occasions, been shewn by rear-admiral Cockburn during the time he has commanded in the Chesapeake, under the vice-admiral's orders.

CORRESPONDENCE BETWEEN GENERAL HUNGERFORD AND ADMIRAL COCKBURN.

From the Richmond Enquirer.

We publish the following article that the Virginians may see the contemptuous and contemptible terms in which that "accomplished gentleman," admiral Cockburn, addresses himself to an officer of the state. We are disposed to blame our officers for their condescension in submitting the imputations of such an enemy to a military enquiry. It would have been better to have passed over charges, which the enemy either fabricated, or did not believe themselves, in silent contempt:

[No. 1.]

"H. Q. Henderson's Store, Aug. 15, 1814.

SIR—I enclose for the information of the commander in chief, copies of a correspondence transmitted to this department by general Hungerford between him and admiral Cockburn, together with an opinion of the court of enquiry, the proceedings of which were enclosed to the admiral.

I am yours, respectfully,

JN. TURBERVILLE, As. Ad. Gen.

To the adjutant general.

"H. Q. August 5, 1814.

"Admiral Cockburn, commanding H. B. M. forces in the Potomac.

"SIR—Being called into command of the forces in this quarter, colonel Parker reported to me the correspondence which had taken place between you and himself, and the proceedings connected with it. At the same time he claimed it as due to the command which he had held, and as due to the character of our people, that a court of enquiry should be constituted to investigate the imputation that poisoned spirit had been left in the way of your troops in their attack upon Nominy—Although well assured as I was, that no citizen could have perpetrated a deed so base, and disdaining too a charge coming from a deserted slave, I have condescended to wave, for the purpose of a fair adjudication, my confidence in the former, and my distrust in the latter, and ordered the court which colonel Parker solicited. A copy of their proceedings and decision, I have thought proper to enclose you.

I am, sir, with due consideration, yours,
J. P. HUNGERFORD,
Brig. gen. comd'g."

"H. B. M. S. Albion, in the Potomac, Aug. 11.

"SIR—I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter, bearing date the 5th August, accompanying the report of a court of enquiry, which you inform me you had "condescended" to order respecting the spirits reported to have been poisoned and left in the porch of a house at Nominy.

"As this "condescension" on your part has certainly not proceeded from any enquiries of mine, and as the tenor of your letter admits not of other reply from me, I beg to decline any further discussion with you on the subject.

"I have the honor to be, sir, your most obedient servant,
G. COCKBURN.

"Brig. gen. Hungerford, &c. &c."

H. Q. Yocomico Church, August 3.

"The court, after the most mature deliberation upon the evidence, hesitate not to declare to the commanding general, and to the world, their decided opinion, that the charge of a poisonous matter having been infused in any spirit left in the house at Nominy, on the evening of the 20th July," is utterly without foundation, and they rejoice at the opportunity which this investigation has afforded them, to declare their abhorrence at so dishonorable an act.

VINCENT BRAHAM, President.

Test, J. W. JONES, Judge Advocate.

[No. 2.]

Camp, August 8, 1814.

SIR—Since my last of the 5th, I have learnt that the following prisoners are now in the squadron under your command, taken near Monday's Point, on the 3d instant, viz. Elisha Williams, aged about 66 years; Luke Dameton, aged about 53 do; Thomas Beuchum, aged about 45 do; Christopher Dawson, John King and Thomas Nutt. It is my duty to represent to you that the three first are over the military age prescribed by law, and that none were taken in arms, but were, as I understand, peaceably remaining at their own homes; from which they were forcibly taken and the houses of several burnt; under these circumstances, their detention would be manifestly contrary to the laws and usages of civilized nations, and to the declarations of British commanders in similar cases—and I request their discharge.

I have the honor to be your very obedient servant,

JOHN P. HUNGERFORD,

Brig. gen. comd'g.

P. S. Since writing the foregoing, I have understood from the lieutenant colonel, to whose regiment Thomas Beuchum was formerly attached, that he once held a commission in the militia as captain, but that about nine months since, his company was dissolved and that he holds no command; also that Thomas Nutt is a supernumerary officer in the militia.

J. P. H.

H. B. M. ship Albion, in the Potomac, the 11th Aug. 1814.

SIR—I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter, bearing date the 8th instant, respecting six prisoners in the squadron under my command; and representing to me that three of them are above what you are pleased to term the military age prescribed by law, and that none of them were taken in arms; and therefore that their detention is manifestly contrary to the laws and usages of civilized nations, and to the declarations of British commanders in similar cases, in consequence of which you request their discharge. As, sir, I beg permission to judge for myself how far the people in question can be considered to have conformed to the declarations and usages you have quoted, I am sorry that it is under my power to agree with, or meet your ideas herein.

I have the honor to be your most obedient humble servant, G. COCKBURN.

Brig. general Hungerford, &c.

COM. RODGERS AT BALTIMORE.

Copy of a letter from com. Rodgers to the secretary of the navy, dated

NEW CASTLE, Sept. 23, 1814.

SIR—From the time of my arrival at Baltimore until my departure, the various duties I had to perform, and the different situations in which I was placed, must plead my apology for not furnishing a report of the services of the naval force employed there under my command at an earlier period, and more particularly as my situation, a large portion of the time, was such as to deny me the use of pen, ink or paper.

The advance and retreat of the enemy you have been made acquainted with from other sources, and it now only remains for me to make known to you the dispositions made of, and the services rendered by the force under my command, and which I feel a pleasure in doing, as the conduct of all was such as to merit my entire approbation.

In the general distribution of the forces employed in the defence of Baltimore, with the concurrence of the commanding general, I stationed lieutenant Gamble, first of the Guerriere, with about 100 seamen, in command of a seven gun battery, on the line between the roads leading from Philadelphia and Sparrow's point.

Sailing master De La Rouch of the Erie, and midshipman Field of the Guerriere, with 20 seamen, in command of a 2 gun battery, fronting the road leading from Sparrow's Point.

Sailing master Ramage, of the Guerriere, with 20 seamen, in command of a 5 gun battery, to the right of the Sparrow's Point road.

And midshipman Salter, with 12 seamen, in command of a one gun battery a little to the right of Mr. Ramage.

Lieut. Kuhn, with the detachment of marines belong to the Guerriere was posted in the entrenchment between the batteries occupied by lieutenant Gamble and sailing master Ramage.

Lieut. Newcomb, third of the Guerriere, with 80 seamen, occupied fort Covington, on the Ferry Branch, a little below Spring Gardens.

Sailing master Webster, of the flotilla, with 50 seamen of that corps, occupied a 6 gun battery, on the Ferry Branch, known by the name of Babcock.

Lieut. Frazier of the flotilla, with 45 seamen of the same corps, occupied a three gun battery near the Lazaretto.

And lieutenant Rutter, the senior officer of the flotilla in command of all the barges, which were moored at the entrance of the passage between the Lazaretto and fort M'Henry in the left wing of the water battery, at which was stationed sailing master Rodman and 54 seamen of the flotilla.

To the officers, seamen and marines of the Guerriere, considering the privations they experienced and the cheerfulness and zeal with which they encountered every obstacle, every acknowledgment is due, and it would be as impossible for me to say too much in their praise, as it would be unworthy of the station I hold, not to mention that their discipline and good conduct is owing, in a pre-eminent degree, to the indefatigable attention and exertions of that highly estimable officer lieutenant Gamble.

The enemy's repulsion from the Ferry branch on the night of the 13th inst. after he had passed fort M'Henry with his barges and some light vessels was owing to the warm reception he met from forts Covington and Babcock, commanded by lieutenant Newcomb and sailing master Webster, who with all under their command performed the duty assigned to them to admiration.

To lieutenant Frazier commanding the three gun battery at the Lazaretto, great praise is due for the constant and animated fire with which he at times assailed the enemy during the whole bombardment, although placed in a very exposed situation to rockets and shells.

Great praise is justly due lieutenant Rutter for his prompt execution of my orders, as well as the zeal and coolness with which he performed all the duties of his station, although conusually exposed for near 24 hours to the enemy's rockets and shells.

Similar praise is due to the officers and men, in the several barges of the flotilla which were immediately under his command, who without regard to the enemy's rockets and shells maintained their position with firmness in the passage between fort M'Henry and the Lazaretto.

Sailing master Rodman, stationed in the water battery of fort M'Henry with 60 seamen of the flotilla, did his duty in a manner worthy of the service, to which he belongs.

To master's mate Stockton, my aid, I am greatly indebted for the zeal and promptitude, with which he conveyed my orders from post to post, and wherever I had occasion to communicate, although in some instances he had to pass through showers of shells and rockets.

To Mr. Allen (brother of the late gallant capt. Allen of the navy) who acted as my aid, and remained near my person, I am much indebted for the essential assistance he rendered in the capacity of secretary, and conveying my orders wherever I found the same necessary.

It now becomes a duty to notice the services of that gallant and meritorious officer, captain Spence of the navy, by whose exertions, assisted by lieut. Rutter with the barges, the entrance into the Bason was so obstructed in the enemy's presence and that too in a very short time, as to bid defiance to his ships, had he attempted to force that passage. In fine, owing to the emergency of the service, although no definite command could be assigned capt. Spence, his services were nevertheless of the first order, and where danger was expected there he was to be found animating with his presence and encouraging by his conduct, all to do their duty.—On my leaving Baltimore commodore Perry being absent, the command of the naval forces devolved on this excellent officer.

That justly distinguished officer commodore Perry, I am sorry to say, was so indisposed and worn out with the fatigue he had experienced on the Potomac, and having arrived at Baltimore but a short time before the bombardment commenced, excluded his taking an active command; at the moment however, when the enemy threatened to attack our lines, I found he was with us, and ready to render every assistance in his power. In a word, every officer, seaman, and marine, belonging as well to the navy as to the flotilla, performed his duty in a manner worthy of the corps to which he belonged.

I feel a delicacy in attempting to express an opinion of the conduct of any other corps than those particularly placed under my command by the navy department, and the more so, as my object is to avoid every cause of being thought presuming. I must in justice, however, be permitted to say that the conduct of col. Stephen Stoner, commanding the first regiment of Maryland militia, which was formed in column in my rear, for the defence of the lines, and whom I considered attached to my command by order of the commanding general, conducted in a manner not only to give me satisfaction, but the most incontestible proof, that that corps would have done its duty, had the enemy attempted to force the entrenchments in its vicinity.

Much praise is also due to major Randall, commanding a battalion of Pennsylvania riflemen, who was also placed under my command, and whom I dispatched with my aid, Mr. Stockton, to dislodge a party of men in the enemy's boats, which it was supposed intended landing near the Lazaretto, to take possession of our little three gun battery. Mr. Stockton on his return reported to me in very high terms the zeal and gallantry displayed by the major and his corps on the occasion. Indeed it is but justice to say that I have the best reason to believe, that all the corps stationed in the entrenchments, so far as came under my immediate observation, would have performed their respective duties in a manner honorable to themselves and to their country.

With great respect, I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servant,

JNO. RODGERS.

The hon. Wm. Jones, sec'y. of the navy.

ROSS AND PARKER.

The following notices of the late major general Ross, and captain sir Peter Parker are extracted from late London papers—we record them to perpetuate the remembrance of these men.

A strange disposition, (arising, perhaps, from that refinement that would bury a man's bad deeds in in his grave) has prevailed to excuse the general for the conflagration of the capitol; and rather fix it upon the guilty head of the infamous Cockburn. The latter, heaven knows, has enough of such sins of his own to answer for, and he should be excused of this—for general Ross, in his official account of the capture of Washington, says—“Judging it of consequence to complete the destruction of the public buildings, with the least possible delay, so that the army might return without loss of time, the following buildings were set fire to and consumed, the Capitol,” &c. And a little further on he says, “the object of the expedition having been accomplished”—i. e. the public buildings being burnt or destroyed—he determined to withdraw, &c. see vol VII, page 277. Why then should the conflagration be charged to Cockburn? In a homely proverb, exactly suited to this occasion, “give the devil his due.” Ross made the burning a subject of boasting.

The man has paid the debt he owed to insulted humanity—and I say, in sincerity and truth, peace to his ashes. I would forgive the actor, but not the action—and on this principle, proposed about three months since, that a subscription should be opened, to build up a monument near the spot were he fell, to be composed of huge rough rocks, bolted together with great clamps of iron, on which, in letters of solid brass, should appear an inscription somewhat after the following manner:

By the just dispensation of the Almighty,

NEAR THIS SPOT WAS SLAIN,

September 12, 1814,

THE LEADER OF A HOST OF BARBARIANS, who destroyed the capitol of the United States, at Washington, Aug. 24, 1814;

and devoted

THE POPULOUS CITY OF BALTIMORE,

to rape, robbery and conflagration.

Peace to his spirit—but execration to his deeds.

Thus I would suffer the memory of the man to die, but give his crime to the latest posterity.

As a plan of a monument to the memory of Ross, somewhat like the preceding, has appeared in an eastern paper long since this was first written out, it is due to myself to state the fact, lest I might be charged with a plagiarism that I am guiltless of. It is very possible for two persons to fall upon the same ideas, as in this case has happened.

MAJOR-GENERAL ROSS.

This gallant officer, whose conduct was so conspicuous in the late attack upon Washington, was born at Rostrevor, the estate of his ancestors, where his father, after having distinguished himself at the battle of Minden, while commanding the grenadiers of the 5th regiment, had retired. This gentleman intermarried with the sister of the late earl of Charlemont, of which marriage general Ross is a younger son.

General Ross served at the Helder, where he was wounded; he served also in Egypt, and at the unfortunate expedition to Walcheren. At the battle of Maida, by a prompt manœuvre, which displayed the brightest evidence of military genius and heroism—he interposed the 20th regiment, which he commanded between the British and the enemy, effectually defeated the French cavalry in their attempt of turning the flank of our army, and thus secured a brilliant victory to sir J. Stuart. On this occasion, in addition to the honorable testimony contained in sir J. Stuart's despatches, the officers of the 20th regiment marked their sentiments of esteem and affection for him, by presenting him with a most beautiful sword. The high state of discipline of the 20th regiment, under the command of colonel Ross, induced sir J. Moore to select it as one of the regiments to which he confided the arduous duty of covering the retreat of his army to Corunna. His majesty was pleased to reward colonel Ross by the distinguished honor of nominating him one of his aids de camp; and upon his late promotion to the rank of major-general, he was so fortunate as to have in his brigade, his old companions, the 20th regiment. This regiment, during the series of battles of the Pyrennees, had 20 officers killed and wounded, and of non-commissioned officers and men upwards of 300. The general had 2 horses shot under him in the action when Soult made his last desperate attempt for the relief of Pamplona. In the last battle of the Pyrennees, general Ross was struck in the stomach; fortunately the ball only bruised him without penetrating.

SIR PETER PARKER.

Captain sir Peter Parker, Bart. who unfortunately fell in an heroic conflict up the Chesapeake, in the diversion made to distract the attention of the enemy previously to the attack on the city of Washington, [!!!] was the last of his race of maritime heroes. He was the son of rear-admiral Christopher Parker, who, by his gallant exploits in the West Indies, was made post at the age of 19, and grandson to the brave veteran admiral sir Peter Parker, who, when a captain, distinguished himself in the famous American war, by lying with his 50 gun ship before a strong fort in the Carolinas, until he and his master were the only men remaining alive upon deck.

CAPTURE OF WASHINGTON.

From the National Intelligencer.

We have occupied a large portion of this day's paper with the enemy's official accounts of his enterprize against this city in August last. It has been remarked, and we believe truly that if the official reports of British officers for the last thirty years could be collected, they would exceed, in falsehood, the fables of Munchausen and Gulliver. We must confess we never had any confidence in the correctness of their statements, particularly those respecting their conflicts in Europe during the late war—and their reports of the various actions which have occurred since hostilities commenced with us, must have removed from the mind of every man any doubt of their systematic duplicity. But the papers now published stand pre-eminent for their disregard of truth. That particularly which relates to the capture of this city, as it refers to facts of which we have a better knowledge, strikes us more forcibly with its false assertions. Those who had the misfortune to witness the scene at Bladensburg on the 24th of August, will scarcely be able to recognize a single fact truly stated by the enemy. The story about capturing 200 pieces of cannon at the navy yard, is perfectly ridiculous—such a number of pieces, it is true, lay on the ground in the yard—and any casual visitor who has looked at them might, with the same propriety, talk of having captured them.

From the Alexandria Herald.

The official account of gen. Ross is now before the public, and in introducing it to our readers we shall notice but a few particulars, as we find it to be as correct in detail as was expected, except in the exaggeration of the numbers opposed to him. It appears that a demonstration upon Washington was not intended till the 23d, and that the march to Upper Marlborough was to co-operate with Cockburn in the destruction of the flotilla under Barney, at Pig Point, only about two miles distant. While there, however, the general "ascertained our force was such as might authorise an attempt upon our capital," and he accordingly was determined to make it, for which purpose the troops were put in motion on the evening of the 22d. And it will no doubt occur to the reader what connexion this might not have had with the "fortunate residence of the agent for British prisoners at Bladensburg." But what most astonishes us, is the unblushing manner in which he announces the destruction of the public buildings including the "president's palace," and proves that what we were willing heretofore to ascribe to the ferocious character of Cockburn was his own deliberate act, and that he justly merited the subsequent fate that awaited him at Baltimore, which is a striking example of the singular chastisement inflicted by Divine Vengeance upon the principal perpetrator of an act that must be viewed by all nations with abhorrence, who cultivate civilization or the improvement of the arts and sciences, and destroys that character of a soldier which the energy of his enterprize would otherwise have entitled him to, as an honor to his profession.

§ The account of their loss is thus headed, "a list of the killed, wounded and missing." In the estimate however over which this is placed, there appear but two descriptions of loss, to wit, killed and wounded—now what has become of the missing?—Were there none, or was the number so great that they feared to let it be known? It is well known their greatest loss was in deserters.

BRITISH OFFICIAL ACCOUNT SET RIGHT.

To the editors of the National Intelligencer:

General Ross in his official despatch says, that after having landed the army at Benedict, they moved up to Nottingham; and on the 22d August, to Upper Marlborough, a few miles distant from Pig Point, where admiral Cockburn fell in with and defeated the flotilla, taking and destroying the whole. Now the fact is they neither took nor destroyed the flotilla, for on the 21st the flotilla was abandoned by the crews to join the army, leaving only six or eight men in every barge, to destroy them on the appearance of the enemy's army, and forces from the fleet; which was done by the officers and men left by me, and not by admiral Cockburn. So much for this part of the general's despatch. The general declares he landed the army to co-operate with ad. Cochrane, in the operations which were to be made in an attack upon admiral Cockburn upon the flotilla. Let us for a moment make a comparison of the forces; 47 sail of ships of the line, frigates, bombs, sloops of war, tenders and transports, having on board, an army as they said 1000 veteran troops, the crews of the ships, &c 8000 more, a total of 17,000 men, to co-operate against 14 open row boats, (not gun boats) and one tender; having crews amounting in the whole to 503 men, 400 of which had left the barges the day previous, leaving 103 men to defend it against all the forces combined, with admirals, generals, &c at their head. The general then goes on to state that on the 23d, he was opposed by a corps of 1200 men—now the fact is these 1200 men were no other than two companies of riflemen and infantry, with light artillery, 200 strong, under maj. Peter, from the District; a skirmish ensued, one man was slightly wounded. Then the general comes on to Bladensburg, where he found the enemy "strongly posted on commanding heights and a fortified house, &c. which house was shortly carried." Now the fact is, the house was not occupied by the Americans, of course easily carried. The general then goes on to state how his troops advanced, and by the irresistible attack of the bayonet, the enemy got into confusion and fled. It would have been more to the honor of the general, if he had told that his men never had it in their power to use the bayonet but once, and then declined it; for after every attempt was made by his men to advance on the main road and were driven by the artillery under my command into the field, they were rallied and again led on by col. Thornton, who advanced to within 50 yards of our position, where he was met by the marines under caps. Miller and Sevier, with the flotilla men. Col. Thornton fell dangerously wounded, capt. Hamilton and Lt. Codd were killed. Lt. Stevely of the "King's Own" also severely wounded.—The veterans of the 86th and 4th or "King's Own" gave way—So far from using the bayonet they fled before our men, who pursued them, the sailors crying out to 'board' them, nor did the enemy rally until they got into a ravine covered with woods, leaving their officers in our power. Then our men returned to their station; gen. Ross in person was obliged to take command, but dared not lead them on in front, but pushed out on our flank; our ammunition being expended we were necessitated to retire. The general says the artillery which was under com. Barney, 'ten pieces', were taken. The fact is, I never had but five pieces. But such are the accounts given by British commanders. The general then goes on to state their loss, which appears small, yet to my knowledge the 85th regiment lost ten officers killed and wounded, among them colonel Thornton, lieut. col. Wood and major Brown; these facts could not be unknown by the general as the above officers fell into our power, as did between two and three hundred other officers and privates and have been exchanged through my agency, against the officers and men taken at Bladensburg, and all those taken and paroled after being wounded, at Baltimore. Notwithstanding all these facts, colonel Brook says he carried off two hundred of the most respectable inhabitants of that city as prisoners—yet after this general exchange the enemy fell in debt to us in point of numbers upwards of one hundred men, besides having two hundred men buried on the field. Such was the real state of these boasted transactions, for the truth of which I refer to colonel Thornton, lieutenant colonel Wood, major Brown and lieutenant Stevely.

JOSHUA BARNEY.

CAPTURE OF ALEXANDRIA.

Alexandria, December 15. Captain Gordon appears to have magnified the importance of his enterprize up this river, throughout his letter, but as it forms perhaps the basis on which he expects to gain promotion for his officers, and himself, we can the more readily excuse this exaggeration. He refers to the orders brought him by captain Baker of the Fairy, and the confirmation by that officer, of the news that measures were in preparation to prevent his return, as the inducement for his leaving Alexandria, "without destroying the remaining stores he could not take away." The fact was, Gordon had resolved upon leaving town before the arrival of the Fairy—had ceased taking any more of the "stores," and dropped down below the town with a part of his vessels, and which movement is to be entirely ascribed to the appearance of commodore Porter at this place on the morning preceding the arrival of captain Baker, and is perhaps the true reason why such "singular exertions," were so "cheerfully" performed in facilitating measures for their speedy departure, as the intrepid lieutenant Herbert on this "trying" occasion took a cold bath by plunging into the river without looking for his boat to carry him off, so great was his trepidation at the announcement, and so prompt in bringing his "abilities" into "action." With regard to the dexterity in securing their plunder which is so much boasted of, we have but one observation to make, that this is no uncommon qualification in robbers, which is all their professional "character" can boast of while before this place, and which in justice to some of the officers we state, was considered by them in an abhorrent light, and utterly at variance with their private feelings. But what deserves to be particularly noticed, is the declaration of Gordon, that he had to retire without destroying the stores, &c. as he had intended, as it goes to shew the profligacy of his character and the little reliance that was to be placed upon his declaration, as it was particularly enquired of the lieutenant (dubbed the honorable) who bore the terms he was determined to enforce, by a gentleman who was with the mayor, "whether the commodore intended to require the delivery of any more of the merchandize than he could take away." They were answered that it would not be required, which explanation was afterwards recognized by captain G. Our readers have here a responsible statement of council of the pledge given to the town by the said Gordon, and his declared declaration that it was his intention to have violated it, but was prevented by the information from below, which would not permit him to use or abuse his time compatible with the safety of his squadron. It would further seem from this letter, that captain KENAH, of the bomb-ship, had not been killed, as stated in our West India extracts published some time since. We account for it in this way, that Kenah must have been amongst the wounded, who are not particularized, and that his death must have taken place subsequent to the writing of this letter which is dated on the 9th, four days since the action. The information of his death we deem satisfactory, as it was carried into Bermuda by the arrival of the rear admiral's squadron.—Herald.

From the Alexandria Gazette. Captain Gordon's official account of the capture of Alexandria, will be found in this morning's paper. It discloses a fact, highly derogatory to his character as a man of honor and veracity, viz:—That it was his intention, notwithstanding his positive assurances to the contrary, to have destroyed all the flour and other stores, which he had not the means of carrying away.

Amongst other articles, we find in the London Gazette of the 1st of October, a series of communications from admiral Cockburn giving a chronological account of his depredations in the Chesapeake. He boasts of having penetrated with a small band of choice spirits as far as Marlborough, within 18 miles of Washington, where he carried off a schooner laden with tobacco, and burnt the warehouses, containing two thousand five hundred hogsheads. At Nominy, he says, he took off two schooners and a large quantity of tobacco, dry goods and cattle, and destroyed or brought off every thing in the neighborhood. It was in this predatory incursion, that the dwelling houses of Mrs Thompson and several other widow ladies were burnt to the ground!

ATTACK UPON BALTIMORE.

His majesty's ship Severn, in the Patapsco, 15th Sept. 1814.

SIR—In furtherance of the instructions I had the honor to receive from you on the 11th inst. I landed at day light of the 12th with major general Ross and the force under his command, at a place the general and myself had previously fixed upon, near to North

Point, at the entrance of the Patapsco, and in conformity with his wishes, I determined on remaining on shore, and accompanying the army to render him every assistance within my power during the contemplated movements and operations; therefore so soon as our landing was completed, I directed captain Nourse, of this ship, to advance up the Patapsco with the frigates, sloops, and bomb-ships, to bombard the fort, and threaten the water approach to Baltimore, and I moved on with the army and seamen (under captain Edward Crofton) attached to it, on the direct road leading to the above mentioned town,

We had advanced about five miles (without other occurrence than taking prisoners a few light horsemen) when the general and myself, being with the advanced guards, observed a division of the enemy posted at a turning of the road, extending into a wood on our left; a sharp fire was almost immediately opened upon us from it, and as quickly returned with considerable effect by our advanced guard, which pressing steadily forward, soon obliged the enemy to run off with the utmost precipitation, leaving behind him several men killed and wounded; but it is with the most heartfelt sorrow I have to add, that in this short and desultory skirmish, my gallant and highly valued friend, the major-general, received a musket ball through his arm into his breast, which proved fatal to him on his way to the water-side for re-embarkation.

Our country, sir, has lost in him one of its best and bravest soldiers, and those who knew him, as I did, a friend most honored and beloved; and I trust, sir, that I may be forgiven for considering it a sacred duty I owe to him to mention here, that whilst his wounds were binding up, and we were placing him on the bearer, which was to carry him off the field, he assured me the wounds he had received in the performance of his duty to his country caused him not a pang; but he felt alone, anxiety for a wife and family dearer to him than his life, whom, in the event of the fatal termination he foresaw, he recommended to the protection and notice of his majesty's government, and the country.

Colonel Brook, on whom the command of the army now devolved, having come up, and the body of our troops having closed with the advance, the whole proceeded forward about two miles further, where we observed the enemy in force drawn up before us (apparently about six or seven thousand strong); on perceiving our army, he filed off into a large and extensive wood on his right, from which he commenced a cannonade on us from his field pieces, and drew up his men behind a thick paling, where he appeared determined to make his stand. Our field guns answered his with evident advantage, and so soon as colonel Brook had made the necessary dispositions, the attack was ordered, and executed in the highest style possible. The enemy opened his musketry on us from his whole line; immediately we approached within reach of it, and kept up his fire till we reached and entered the wood, when he gave way in every direction, and was chased by us a considerable distance with great slaughter, abandoning his post of the meeting house, situated in this wood, and leaving all his wounded and two of his field guns in our possession.

An advance of this description against superior numbers of an enemy so strongly posted, could not be effected without loss. I have the honor to enclose a return of what has been suffered by those of the naval department, acting with the army on this occasion; and it is, sir, with the greatest pride and pleasure, I report to you that the brigade of seamen with small arms, commanded by captain Edward Crofton, assisted by captains, Sullivan, Money and Ramsey (the three senior commanders with the fleet), who commanded divisions under him, behaved with a gallantry and steadiness which would have done honor to the oldest troops, and which attracted the admiration of the army. The seamen under Mr. Jackson, master's mate of the Tonnant, attached to the rocket brigade, commanded by the first lieutenant Lawrence, of the marines, behaved also with equal skill and bravery. The marines landed from the ships under the command of captain Robyns, the senior officer of that corps, belonging to the fleet, behaved with their usual gallantry.

Although, sir, in making to you my report of his action, I know it is right I should confine myself to mentioning only the conduct of those belonging to the naval department, yet I may be excused for venturing further to state to you generally the high admiration with which I viewed the conduct of the whole army, and the ability and gallantry with which it was managed and headed by its brave colonel, which insured to it the success it met with.

The night being fast approaching and the troops much fatigued, colonel Brook determined on remaining for the night on the field of battle, and on the morning of the 13th. leaving a small guard at the meeting house to collect and protect the wounded, we again moved forward towards Baltimore, on approaching which it was found to be defended by extremely strong works on every side, and immediately in front of us by an extensive hill, on which was an entrenched camp, and great quantities of artillery, and the information we collected, added to what we observed, gave us to believe there were at least within their works from 15 to 20,000 men. Col. Brook lost no time in reconnoitring these defences, after which he made his arrangement for storming, during the ensuing night, with his gallant little army, the entrenched camp in our front, notwithstanding all the difficulties which it presented. The subsequent communications which we opened with you, however, induced him to relinquish again the idea, and therefore yesterday morning the army retired leisurely to the meeting house, where it halted for some hours to make the necessary arrangements respecting the wounded and the prisoners taken on the 12th, which being completed, it made a further short movement in the evening towards the place where it had disembarked, and where it arrived this morning for re-embarkation, without suffering the slightest molestation from the enemy, who, in spite of his superiority of numbers, did not even venture to look at us during this slow and deliberate retreat.

As you, sir, were in person with the advanced frigates, sloops, and bomb vessels, and as, from the road the army took, I did not see them after quitting the beach, it would be superfluous for me to make any report to you respecting them. I have now, therefore, only to assure you of my entire satisfaction and approbation of the conduct of every officer and man employed under me, during the operations above detailed, and to express to you how particularly I consider myself indebted to captain Edward Crofton (acting captain of the Royal Oak.) for the gallantry, ability, and zeal with which he led on the brigade of seamen in the action of the 12th, and executed all the other services with which he has been intrusted since our landing; to capt. White (acting captain of the Albion) who attended me as my aid-de camp the whole time, and rendered me every possible assistance; to captains Sullivan, Money, and Ramsay, who commanded divisions of the brigade of seamen; to lieutenant James Scott of the Albion, whom I have had such frequent cause to mention to you on former occasions, and who in the battle of the 12th commanded a division of seamen, and behaved most gallantly, occasionally also acting as an extra aid-de camp to myself; capt. Robyns, who commanded the marines of the fleet, and who was severely wounded during the engagement, I also beg to recommend to your favorable notice and consideration, as well as lieutenant G. C. Urmston, of the Albion, whom I placed in command of the smaller boats, to endeavor to keep up a communication between the army and navy, which he effected with great perseverance, and thereby rendered us most essential service. In short, sir, every individual seemed animated with equal anxiety to distinguish himself by good conduct on this occasion, and I trust therefore the whole will be deemed worthy of your approbation.

Capt. Nourse, of the Severn, was good enough to receive my flag for this service, he rendered me great assistance in getting the ships to the different stations within the river, and when the storming of the fortified hill was contemplated, he hastened to my assistance, with a reinforcement of seamen and marines; and I should consider myself wanting in candor and justice did I not particularly point out, sir, to you, the high opinion I entertain of the enterprise and ability of this valuable officer, not only for his conduct on this occasion, but on the very many others, on which I have employed him, since with me in the Chesapeake.

I have the honor to be, &c.

On board H. M. S. Tonnant, Sept. 15, 1814.

DEAR SIR—I beg leave to be allowed, to state to you, how much I feel indebted to capt. Crofton, commanding the brigade of sailors from H. M. ships under your command, as also to capt. Sullivan, Money and Ramsay, for their very great exertions in performing every formation made by his majesty's troops; having seen myself those officers, expose themselves in the hottest of the enemy's fire, to keep their men in line of march with the disciplined troops. The obedient and steady conduct of the sailors, believe me, sir, excited the admiration of every individual of the army, as well as my greatest gratitude.

Believe me to be, dear sir,

RESIGNATION OF MR. STONE.

Legislature of North Carolina, Dec. 2

A message was received from the governor enclosing the following resignation of the hon. David Stone, one of our senators in congress.
Hope, near Windsor, 21st Nov. 1814.

DEAR SIR—I ask as a favor of your excellency to be the medium of communicating to the general assembly of North Carolina, now in session, this, as my resignation of the trust conferred upon me by the legislature of 1812, to represent the state in the senate of the United States.

Circumstances have occurred since my appointment, that, in my judgment, render it a duty I owe to the state, (whose agent, to the best of my ability, I have faithfully been) as well as a duty to myself, to say on this occasion, that to all those members of the legislature who thought proper, at the time of my appointment, to consult me in relation to my disposition to serve the state, if selected for the purpose, I uniformly answered, that, should I be honored by their choice, which I by no means wished, I would serve for a session or two; but that the obligation of providing for my family and my domestic concerns, would not permit me to promise for a longer term.

It is true, I hoped to be able to attend 'till I could have seen the return of peace to my country. But a short attendance at the summer session of 1813, convinced me this was a vain hope. It was not possible for me to think, that, to wage the war in which we were engaged by embargo, by militia tours of duty for distant expeditions, by short enlistments of regular troops, by a profuse and, as I verily believed unnecessary expenditure of the public money and by sending our most distinguished citizens to traverse Europe as solicitors for peace, could lead to a speedy or honorable termination of the war.

Indeed so very strange did these things appear to me, as war measures, that to my judgment it seemed, if the enemy had directed our course, he could not well have selected one that would with more certainty, and scarcely with more expedition, conduct us to division among ourselves—to bankruptcy and, as I feared, to ruin! Not being able, therefore, to approve nor to withstand the torrent by which we were urged forward, I determined neither to incur responsibility for measures adopted against my judgment, nor longer to engage myself in the disagreeable task of opposing those legislative provisions by a majority thought necessary for carrying on an arduous war, but to retire to private life, and wait with resignation for a more auspicious season, when the delirium of the moment should have passed away. On my arrival at Raleigh, during the last session of the legislature, with intentions to resign, I found a degree of excitement prevailing in that body which forbade me voluntarily to place in their hands so important a trust as that of appointing a senator. How this excitement had been produced I neither knew nor enquired; nor did I care further than this, that it was much mortification to me that the legislative council of the state should be so greatly agitated by so senseless a clamor.

Much against my wish I attended the last session of congress. When the embargo was again recommended by the president and passed again by a large majority of the house of representatives, I, as a member of the senate, voted for it, not because any opinion of the subject was in the least altered, but because the suffering it must occasion would in a short time, I hoped, recal the sober sense of the nation, and we should finally get rid of that self destroying engine.

The senate of the United States being the court established by the constitution for trying all cases of impeachment for bribery and corruption, and other high crimes and misdemeanors, that may be exhibited against the president, the vice-president, or any of the civil officers of government, cannot as it seems to me, with propriety institute enquiries into the conduct of those officers. The court which is to try must certainly be excused from the management of the prosecution and the collection of evidence to support it. If, therefore, the senate are at any time convinced that the public money is wasted by the public agents, it would, I apprehend, be difficult to point out a method more conformable to the principles of our constitution, by which that body can effect a correction of such improper disposal of the public money, than by refusing to vote supplies until the constitutional organ for the purpose shall make enquiry where the fault rests, and take measures for its correction. This refusal to sanction the supplies of the senate, imposes upon the house of representatives to whom the constitution commits the important trust of enquiring into and correcting abuses, the necessity of performing their duty in that respect.

It was upon this ground alone that I voted against the tax bills in the summer session of 1813. I was fully satisfied by information received from the highest authority, that a most unnecessary and prodigal waste of public money existed in the expenditures of the war department; and was either sanctioned or not corrected by those whose duty it was to correct it. I voted, therefore, for the loan bill to supply the present exigencies of the government, but against the tax bills which it was contemplated should not come into operation for six months, with the hope, if successful in my opposition, that the abuse would in the mean time be enquired into and corrected. The determination of the senate was against me, the tax bills passed. But in little more than twelve months after, we became bankrupt; that is, the war department has been for a considerable time without a dollar subject to its disposal; and at a time too when the public functionaries declare the resources of the country to be ample. [See the report of the late secretary of the treasury to the present session of congress—the letter of the present secretary to the chairman of the committee of ways and means, dated 17th October, 1814, and the speeches of the latter gentleman.]—This result does not certainly prove that my conviction of the waste of public money was ill founded—nor that the necessity did not exist to enquire into and correct the abuse. An individual who borrows money upon a mortgage of his estate if he lays out the money judiciously in improvements, will thereby increase his ability to obtain supplies on the same security. But if on the other hand he consumes the money thus obtained in treats, entertainments and presents to those who will support himself and friends at an election, he will obtain every fresh supply with increased difficulty, until his course is entirely stopped.

The political atmosphere of our country is so loaded with clouds, and threatening in its aspect, that I should certainly remain at the post assigned me, if I conceived that, by remaining, I could be of any service, whatever sacrifice it might cost me. But my opinions and views differ so radically from those of the persons who conduct the affairs of the nation, and who appear to be strongly supported by the public sentiment of the nation, and as I am conscious I possess a very fallible judgment, but which, such as it is, must be my guide in the performance of my public duty, entirely independent of and uncontrolled by party, I therefore conclude it is best for me to withdraw from the scene.

I have the honor to be, with the highest consideration and esteem, your humble servant,

DAVID STONE.

His excellency gov. Hawkins.

TREATY WITH THE N. W. INDIANS.

BY THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA.

A Proclamation.—Whereas, a treaty between the United States of America and the Wyandot, Delaware, Shawanoese, Seneca, and Miami nations of Indians, was concluded and signed on the twenty-second day of July, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and fourteen, by the commissioners of both nations, fully and respectively authorised for that purpose, and was duly ratified and confirmed by the president of the United States on the thirteenth day of December, in the year of our Lord, 1814, with the advice and consent of the senate, which treaty is in the following words to wit:

A treaty of peace and friendship between the United States of America and the tribes of Indians called the Wyandots, Delawares, Shawanoese, Senecas and Miamies.

The said United States of America by William Henry Harrison, late a maj. general in the army of the United States, and Lewis Cass, governor of the Michigan Territory, duly authorised and appointed commissioners for the purpose, and the said tribes, by their head men, chiefs and warriors, assembled at Greenville in the state of Ohio, have agreed to the following articles, which, when ratified by the president of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the senate thereof, shall be binding upon them and the said tribes.

ARTICLE I. The United States and the Wyandots, Delawares, Shawanoese and Senecas, give peace to the Miami nation of Indians, formerly designated as the Miami Eel river and Wea tribes; they extend this indulgence also to the bands of the Putawatimies, which adhere to the grand sachem Tobinipee, and to the chief Onoxa, to the Ottowas of Blanchard's creek, who have attached themselves to the Shawanoese tribe, and to such of the said tribes as adhere to the chief called the Wing, in the neighborhood of Detroit, and to the Kickapoos, under the direction of the chiefs who sign this treaty.

ARTICLE II. The tribes and bands above-mentioned, engage to give their aid to the United States in prosecuting the war against Great Britain, and such of the Indian tribes as still continue hostile; and to make no peace with either without the consent of the United States. The assistance herein stipulated for, is to consist of such a number of their warriors from each tribe, as the president of the United States, or any officer having his authority therefor, may require.

ARTICLE III. The Wyandot tribe, and the Senecas of Sandusky and Stoney creek, the Delaware and Shawanoese tribes, who have preserved their fidelity to the United States throughout the war, again acknowledge themselves under the protection of the said states, and of no other power whatever; and agree to aid the United States, in the manner stipulated for in the former article, and to make no peace but with the consent of the said states.

ARTICLE IV. In the event of a faithful performance of the conditions of this treaty, the U. States will confirm and establish all the boundaries between their lands and those of the Wyandots, Delaware, Shawanoese and Miamies, as they existed previously to the commencement of the war.

IN TESTIMONY WHEREOF, the said commissioners and the said head-men, chiefs and warriors of the before mentioned tribes of indians have hereunto set their hands and affixed their seals.

Done at Greenville, in the state of Ohio, this twenty second day of July, in the year of our Lord, one thousand eight hundred and fourteen, and of the independence of the United States, the thirty-ninth.

WILLIAM HENRY HARRISON.
LEWIS CASS.

PENSACOLA.

From the National Intelligencer of January 2, 1815.

We have received from an attentive friend who resides on the Mobile, the subjoined extract of the journal of Wm. Ellis, a man of veracity and good character. It is a document, at this moment of some importance. It vindicates most satisfactorily, if vindication in this case can be considered necessary, the conduct of the American government, or their general, in entering Pensacola.

This interesting paper also exhibits in a strong light the anti-neutral conduct of the Spanish governor of West Florida. We should hope, indeed, that Don Gonzales Manrique, does not faithfully represent the king whose commission he holds; but, whatever be the real temper of the Spanish monarchy towards the United States, it became necessary to the safety of our territory and people, that some check should be given to the enemy whilst finding an asylum, and countenance and protection, from pretended friends in Pensacola.

In the simple narrative of Mr. Ellis, we find that a force came from Pensacola to scour our territory, to make prisoners of unarmed citizens, and attack our forts; that they returned with their booty and prisoners to Pensacola: that the prisoners were kept, as if in a hostile country, contrary to the established principles of the law of nations: that when an American force pursued the enemy as far as the Perdido, the Spanish governor appears to have considered a resistance to them as the common concern of the British, the indians and himself, and that he made arrangements for sending a Spanish force to co-operate with the indians in resisting the Americans, whilst in fresh pursuit of their avowed enemies engaged in the very act of carrying off their property and their people. Is this neutrality? Was there any chance of security to the adjacent settlements of American citizens, if such infamous partiality, not to say hostility, had been viewed with awful reverence by the American general?

How could he plead a regard to neutral rights? Neutral duties must be observed, if neutral rights would be respected. Every man must be satisfied that there was no real neutrality on the part of the Spanish governor: and the return of gen. Jackson to our own territory, after having driven off the indians and the British, can only be regarded as a solemn sacrifice made by the American government to that love of peace and friendship with other nations, which has always marked their character and conduct.

Extracts from the journal of William Ellis, inspector of the revenue at Mobile, who was taken prisoner by the British and Indians, and carried to Pensacola, a Spanish town in West Florida.

[The journal begins with August 28th 1814, and states his employment as a custom house officer, stationed then at Bonsecour, a river on the east side of the bay of Mobile.]

September 12th.—Visited the landing in the forenoon—after dinner, commence fixing some fish-hooks, and about half past two, P. M. casting my eye up, saw two Creek indians painted, pointing their guns at me—and in the space of a moment, the yard and house were crowded with them.—Mrs. La Coast and her son (ten years old,) Miss Betsey, her two children, and sister, were screaming in the rooms. I continued my seat. Several indians came up to me, among whom was a chief, who gave me his hand. At this moment a British officer came up, and ordered me to follow him. I arose and observed, 'You are a British officer, I presume.' 'Yes,' said he 'I may consider myself a prisoner to you.' 'You may say that,' he replied, 'or I cut your head off.' 'I shall expect that humanity from you, which belongs to your nation.' 'Its more,' said he, 'than we receive from your nation a damned sight.' 'That's not the fault of individuals.'

By this time we had advanced ten poles towards the river, and the indians had taken all the canoes, and about 40 started over to the landing on the other side of the river. By this time, I suppose, they had been three minutes in the yard, 70 in number, plundering every thing they could put their hands on. I requested the officer to go into the house, and protect the women and children; which he did immediately, and made the indians give back almost every thing they had taken. But as soon as his eye was off them, they took the things again, even to the dirty cloths. By this time the indians had returned from their landing, with all James Innerarity's negroes. Mr. Miller, supercargo of a Spanish ship in Pensacola, Jacobs, a cooper, Henry, a laborer, Frank, an overseer, and Aaron, a carter. A violent gust came on, and one indian was struck in the yard with lightning, and died in a few days. Night came on—they put out spies and went to sleep.

Captain Cassals of the royal marines (for that was his name and appellation) asked me if I knew of any troops being near them—and observed my life depended on my telling the truth. None, I told him nearer than the point. "Did you hear firing there to-day?" None.—An express was sent to the point by an American called Burdue, who had been in the 2d regiment; a half breed called Sebastian, of Pensacola, and the son of Pancha, who lives at Perdido.

Sept. 13th. Removed to the landing. The indians indulged themselves in plunder all day.

Sept. 14th.—By this time the indians were out of beef; although they had killed two of La Coast's the first day. A party consisting of an American called M-Gill, who had deserted from the 2d regiment, about three years ago, when at fort Stoddert, and who now lives at Pensacola, a mulatto, called London, (whom capt. Cassals told me he had met and compelled to come back) a negro called Boston, and some indians, were sent to Fish river; who returned in the evening with a drove of cattle, a decanter, a pitcher, and some other things. They then killed a beef. Madam La Coast comes and sleeps at the landing with all her family.

Sept. 15.—The express returns this evening with the news that the marines, 75, and indians, 130, under the command of captain Henry, had landed at the point, and had fired four bombs into the fort—that the colonel's servant had his head carried off by a cannon ball, and an indian had his belt cut in two by a grape shot; that the colonel was on board the ship Armise; that the vessels were within a league of the fort.—Very heavy firing this day. About an hour after night, we heard a great explosion—suppose it to be the fort blown up.

Sept. 16. Sent an express by M-Gill and Burdue to the point.

Sept. 17. A party of indians arrived (24) from the point at 11, A. M. Told us that the ships were beat off, and one blown up—that the balance of the indians and marines were coming on, which proved to be the case. In about two hours they arrived, halted, killed several beeves, opened two hogsheads of tobacco, and several barrels of flour, refreshed themselves, and went on about six miles, put out spies, and encamped. The indians refused to obey their chief (Woodbine) and would not stand sentry.

September 18.—Arrived at Pancha's on the Perdido, at 3 P. M. all the marines and some few indians crossed the Perdido bay.

September 19.—Arrived in Pensacola at half past 12, and quartered with captain Woodbine; towards evening Woodbine takes me and old Alexander of Fish river (who had been plundered of all that was dear to him, and brought a prisoner to this place,) before the colonel, who told me he should make a prisoner of war of me. He thought, however, he would look over the cartel arrangements, and, in the mean time, I and Alexander must confine ourselves to captain Woodbine's quarters, and we should be well treated. Consequently we did so.

September 20.—The balance of the indians crossed the Perdido, and got into town.

September 21.—A party of the expedition who were left behind to drive cattle, arrived at 9 A. M. and bring news that they had got over 25 head of bullocks, and that the Americans came on them and compelled them to retire. This occasioned much bustle in the town. The indians are called into captain Woodbine's, and a great talk takes place between him and the head chief. A detachment is sent to the Perdido, where it is said the Americans are crossing.

September 22.—An express arrives this morning from the ferry, and brings news that a party of Americans had crossed over the Perdido, and taken all the boats from the east side, and retired to their encampments on the west. Their number was supposed to be about 500. The governor calls and observed that he wished captain Woodbine to send a party of indians, consisting of two hundred to the ferry, and that he would send 50 men with them to impede the crossing of the Americans; that this measure ought to be particularly attended to. Woodbine not being in, captain Henry informed his excellency, that it should be attended to with the earliest attention. The governor then went over to col. Nicholl. In the afternoon a quantity of blankets, linens, &c. are hoisted up into the loft of captain Woodbine's quarters. About 4 P. M. 65 indians received 3 days rations, and march, it is said, to the ferry on Perdido.

Friday, 23d.—Here the journal ends. For some reason or other, the British officers became jealous of Mr. Ellis, and sent him on board one of their vessels, (after searching all his papers, of which the above journal was probably the most material) they put him on board of one of their vessels in the bay; and have probably carried him to the West Indies. The journal was handed, I think, by captain Woodbine to another American citizen, who had been made a prisoner of by the British in Pensacola, but was afterwards liberated.

GEN. ARMSTRONG PRIVATEER.

Although in the REGISTER, vol. VII, pages 207, 253, 255 and 319, considerable notice has been taken of the defence of the General Armstrong privateer, the case is so remarkable that the following documents must not be lost, and are therefore inserted.

The following is captain Reid's account of his rencontre with the British at Fayal, and is communicated to the editors of the Mercantile Advertiser for publication:

Fayal, 4th October, 1814.

With infinite regret I am constrained to say it has eventually fallen to my lot to state to you the loss and total destruction of the private armed brig General Armstrong, late under my command.

We sailed from Sandy-Hook, on the evening of the 9th ult. and about midnight fell in chase—aboard of a razeed and ship of the line. They pursued till next day noon, when they thought proper to give over chase. On the 11th, after a nine hours' chase, boarded the private armed sch. Perry, John Colman, 6 days from Philadelphia, had thrown over all his guns. On the following day fell in with an enemy's gun brig; exchanged a few shots with, and left him. On the 21th, boarded a Spanish brig and schooner, and a Portuguese ship, all from the Havanna. On the 26th following came too in Fayal Roads, for the purpose of filling water; called on the American consul, who very politely ordered our water immediately sent off, it being our intention to proceed to sea early the next day. At 5 P. M. I went on board, the consul and some other gentlemen in company. I asked some questions concerning enemy's cruizers, and was told there had been none at these islands for several weeks; when about dusk, while we were conversing, the British brig Carnation suddenly hove in sight close under the N. E. head of the harbor, within gun shot when first discovered. The idea of getting under way was instantly suggested; but finding the enemy's brig had the advantage of a breeze, and but little wind with us, it was thought doubtful if we should be able to get to sea without hazarding an action. I questioned the consul to know if in his opinion the enemy would regard the neutrality of the port? He gave me to understand I might make myself perfectly easy, assuring me at the same time they would never molest us while at anchor. But no sooner did the enemy's brig understand from the pilot-boat who we were, when she immediately hauled close in and let go her anchor within pistol shot of us. At the same moment the Plantagenet, and frigate Rota, hove in sight, to whom the Carnation instantly made signal, and a constant interchange took place for some time.

The result was, the Carnation proceeded to throw out all her boats; dispatched on board the commodore, and appeared otherwise to be making unusual exertions. From these circumstances I began to suspect their real intentions. The moon was near its full, which enabled us to observe them very minutely; and I now determined to haul in nearer the shore. Accordingly, after clearing for action, we got under way, and began to sweep in.—The moment this was observed by the enemy's brig, she instantly cut her cable, made sail, and dispatched four boats in pursuit of us.—Being now about 8 P. M. as soon as we saw the boats approaching, we let go our anchor, got springs on our cable, and prepared to receive them. I hailed them repeatedly as they drew near, but they felt no inclination to reply. Sure of their game, they only pulled up with the greater speed. I observed the boats were well manned, and apparently as well armed; and as soon as they had cleverly got alongside we opened our fire, which was as soon returned; but meeting with rather a warmer reception than they had probably been aware of, they very soon cried out for quarters, and hauled off. In this skirmish I had one man killed and my first lieutenant wounded. The enemy's loss must have been upwards of twenty killed and wounded.

They had now repaired to their ships to prepare for a more formidable attack. We, in the interim, having taken the hint, prepared to haul close into the beach, where we moored head and stern within half pistol shot of the castle. This done, we again prepared in the best possible manner for their second reception. About 9 p. m. we observed the enemy's brig towing in a large fleet of boats.—They soon after left the brig and took their station in three divisions, under cover of a small reef of rocks, within about musket shot of us. Here they continued manœuvring for some time, the brig still keeping under way to act with the boats, should we at any time attempt our escape.

The shores were lined with the inhabitants, waiting the expected attack; and from the brightness of the moon, they had a most favorable view of the scene. The governor, with most of the first people of the place, stood by and saw the whole affair.

At length, about midnight, we observed the boats in motion, (our crew having laid at their quarters during the whole of this interval.) They came on in one direct line, keeping in close order, and we plainly counted twelve boats. As soon as they came within proper distance we opened our fire, which was warmly returned from the enemy's caronades and small arms. The discharge from our Long Tom rather staggered them; but soon reconnoitering, they gave three cheers and came on most spiritedly. In a moment they succeeded in gaining our bow and starboard quarter, and the word was board. Our great guns now becoming useless we attacked them sword in hand, together with our pikes, pistols and musketry, from which our lads poured on them a most destructive fire. The enemy made frequent and repeated attempts to gain our decks, but were repulsed at all times, and at all points, with the greatest slaughter. About the middle of the action I received intelligence of the death of my second-lieutenant; and soon after of the third lieutenant being badly wounded. From this, and other causes, I found our fire had much slackened on the fore castle; and, fearful of the event, I instantly rallied the whole of our after-division, who had been bravely defending and now had succeeded, in beating the boats off the quarters. They gave a shout, rushed forward, opened a fresh fire, and soon after decided the conflict, which terminated in the total defeat of the enemy, and the loss of many of their boats; two of which belonged to the Rota, we took possession of, literally loaded with their own dead. Seventeen only escaped from them both, who swam to the shore. In another boat under our quarter, commanded by one of the lieutenants of the Plantagenet, all were killed saving four. This I have from the lieutenant himself, who further told me that he jumped overboard to save his own life.

The duration of this action was about 40 minutes. Our decks were now found in much confusion, our Long Tom dismounted, and several of our carriages broken; many of our crew having left the vessel, and others disabled. Under these circumstances, however, we succeeded in getting Long Tom in his birth, and the decks cleared in sort for a fresh action, should the enemy attack us again before day-light. About 3, A. M. I received a message from the American consul, requesting to see me on shore, where he informed me the governor had sent a note to captain Lloyd, begging him to desist from further hostilities. To which captain Lloyd sent for answer, that he was now determined to have the privateer at the risk of knocking down the whole town; and that if the governor suffered the Americans to injure the privateer in any manner, he should consider the place an enemy's port, and treat it accordingly. Finding this to be the case, I considered all hope of saving our vessel to be at an end. I therefore went on board, and ordered all our wounded and dead to be taken on shore, and the crew to save their effects as fast as possible. Soon after this it became day-light, when the enemy's brig stood close in, and commenced a heavy fire on us with all her force. After several broadsides she hauled off, having received a shot in her hull, her rigging much cut, and her fore-top-mast wounded; (of this I was informed by the British consul.) She soon after came in again, and anchored close to the privateer. I then ordered the Armstrong to be scuttled, to prevent the enemy from getting her off. She was soon afterwards boarded by the enemy's boats and set on fire, which soon completed her destruction.

They have destroyed a number of houses in the town and wounded some of the inhabitants.

By what I have been able to learn from the British consul and officers of the fleet, it appears there were about 400 officers and men in the last attack by the boats, of which 120 were killed and about 130 wounded. Captain Lloyd, I am told by the British consul, is badly wounded in the leg; a jury of surgeons had been held, who gave it as their opinion that amputation would be necessary to insure his life. 'Tis said, however, that the wound was occasioned by an ox treading on him. The fleet has remained here about a week, during which they have been principally employed in burying the dead and taking care of the wounded.

Three days after the action they were joined by the ship Thais and brig Calypso (two sloops of war) they were immediately taken into requisition by captain Lloyd, to take home the wounded men. The Calypso sailed for England with part of the wounded on the 2d instant, among whom was the first-lieutenant of the Plantagenet. The Thais sails this evening with the remainder. Captain Lloyd's fleet sailed to-day, supposed for the West-Indies.

The loss on our part, I am happy to say, is comparatively trifling; two killed and seven wounded. With regard to my officers in general, I feel the greatest satisfaction in saying, they one and all fought with the most determined bravery, and to whom I feel highly indebted for their officer-like conduct during the short period we were together; their exertions and bravery deserved a better fate.

I here insert, for your inspection, a list of the killed and wounded.

Killed.—Mr. Alexander O. Williams, second-lieutenant, by a musket ball in the forehead, died instantly; Burton Lloyd, seaman, do. through the heart, do.

Wounded.—Frederick A. Worth, first-lieutenant, in the right side; Robert Johnson, third-lieutenant, left knee; Razilla Hammond, quarter-master, left arm; John Piner, seaman, knee; William Castle, do. arm; Nicholas Scalsan, do. arm and leg; John Harrison, do. hand and face, by the explosion of a gun.

It gives me much pleasure to announce to you, that our wounded are all in a fair way of recovery, through the unremitted care and attention of our worthy surgeon.

Mr. Dabney, our consul, is a gentleman possessing every feeling of humanity, and to whom the utmost gratitude is due from us for his great care of the sick and wounded, and his polite attention to my officers and myself.

Mr. Williams was a most deserving and promising officer. His country, in him, has lost one of its brightest ornaments; and his death must be sadly lamented by all who knew his worth.

Accompanied with this you will find a copy of my protest, together with copies of letters written by Mr. Dabney to the governor of Fayal; our minister at Rio Janeiro, and our secretary of state. These letters will develop more fully the circumstances of this unfortunate affair.

We expect to sail to-morrow in a Portuguese brig for Amelia island, who takes the whole of our crew; till when, I remain gentlemen, your very obedient humble servant,
SAMUEL C. REID.

Protest of captain Reid, of the private armed brig General Armstrong.

CONSULATE OF FAYAL.—AZORES.

By this public instrument of declaration and protest be it known unto all persons whom it doth or may concern, That on this present day, being the 27th day of December, 1814, before me, John B. Dabney, consul of the United States for the Azores, personally appeared Samuel C. Reid, commander of the American armed brig General Armstrong, of New-York, of two hundred and forty-six tons; American measurement, &c. and on oath declared as follows, to wit: that he sailed in with said brig from the port of New-York, on the ninth day of September last, well found, staunch and strong, and manned with ninety officers and men, for a cruise; that nothing material happened on the passage to this island, until the 26th instant, when she cast anchor in this port soon after twelve at noon, with a view to get a supply of fresh water; that during the said afternoon his crew were employed in taking on board water—when about sun-set of the same day, the British brig of war Carnation, captain Bentham, appeared suddenly doubling round the north-east point of this port; she was immediately followed by the British ship Kota, of 38 guns, captain P. Somerville, and the 74 gun ship Plantagenet, captain R. Lloyd, which latter, it is understood, commanded the squadron.—They all anchored about 7 o'clock, P. M. and soon after some suspicious movements on their part, indicating an intention to violate the neutrality of the port, induced captain Reid to order his brig to be warped in shore, close under the guns of the castle; that in the act of doing so, four boats approached his vessel, filled with armed men. Captain Reid repeatedly hailed them, and warned them to keep off, which they disregarding, he ordered his men to fire on them, which was done, and killed and wounded several men; the boats returned the fire and killed one man and wounded the first-lieutenant. They then fled to their ships and prepared for a second and more formidable attack; the American brig, in the mean time, was placed within half cables length of the shore, and within half pistol shot of the castle. Soon after midnight, twelve, or as some state, fourteen boats, supposed to contain near four hundred men, with small cannon, swivels, blunderbusses, and other arms, made a violent attack on said brig, when a severe conflict ensued, which lasted near forty minutes, and terminated in the total defeat and partial destruction of the boats, with an immense slaughter on the part of the British. The loss of the Americans in both actions was one lieutenant and one seaman killed, and two lieutenants and five seamen wounded. At day-break, the brig Carnation was brought close in, and began a heavy cannonade on the American brig; when captain Reid, finding further resistance unavailing, abandoned the vessel, after partially destroying her, and soon after the British set her on fire. The said captain Reid, therefore, desires me to take his protest, as he by these presents does most solemnly protest against the said Lloyd, commander of said squadron; and against the other commanders of the British ships engaged in this infamous attack.

W. Mr.

on his said vessel, when lying in a neutral friendly port. And the said captain Reid also protests against the government of Portugal, for their inability to protect and defend the neutrality of their port and harbor, as also against all, and every other state or states, person or persons, whom it now doth or may concern, for all losses, costs or damages, that have arisen, or may arise, to the owners, officers, and crew, of the said brig General Armstrong, in consequence of her destruction, and the defeat of her cruise, in the manner aforesaid.

All which is sworn to be truth by the said Samuel C. Reid; Frederick A. Worth, first lieutenant; Robert Johnson, third-lieutenant; Benjamin Starks, sailing-master; John Brotnaham, surgeon; Robert B. Allen, captain of marines; Thomas Parsons, James Davis, Eliphalet Sheffield and Peter Tyson, prize-masters of the said brig General Armstrong.

I the undersigned, hereby certify, that the foregoing instrument of protest is a true copy taken from the original (L. S.) deposited in my consular office. In testimony of which I have hereunto set my hand, and affixed my official seal, this 27th day of September, 1814.

JOHN B. DABNEY.

Honor to the brave.—Captain Reid arrived at Savannah from Fayal. On his way home he was invited and partook of a splendid public entertainment at Richmond. The company was very numerous, and among them, the governor and others of the first character in Virginia. The speaker of the house of delegates, (Mr. Stevenson) president, and the members of the legislature constituted a large body of the entertainers. The toasts were highly characteristic of generous Virginia—we select the following:

'The Navy—whose lightning has struck down the "meteor flag of England"—They have conquered those who had conquered the world.

The private cruisers of the United States—whose intrepidity has pierced the enemy's channels, and bearded the lion in his den.

The army of the Niagara—the rivals of our tars—Their gallant deeds will live to endless ages, in the records of time.

Brown, Scott, Gaines and Porter—Chippewa, Bridgewater, Plattsburg and Erie, are the deathless monuments of their fame.

Barney, Boyle and their compatriots, who have ploughed the seas in search of the enemy, and hurled retaliation upon his head.

Our ministers at Ghent—who breathe the spirit of their country—war, in preference to the slightest sacrifice of honor.

Foreign nations—let us hold them as did our fathers of old—"Enemies in war; in peace. Friends."

Legislators!—May the people abandon those who sacrifice the safety of their country to the shadow of popularity.

VOLUNTEERS.—By the vice-president (Mr. Wirt)—The memory of the General Armstrong—she has "graced her fall and made her ruin glorious."

By Judge Cabell—The spirit of our forefathers; displayed in concert and energy of action; not wasted in endless and fruitless discussion.

By Judge Brockenbrough—Neutral Ports; whenever the tyrants of the ocean dare to invade these sanctuaries, may they meet with an "Essex" and an "Armstrong."

By general Cocke—American tars—their achievements form an æra in the naval annals of the world; may their brother-soldiers emulate their deeds of everlasting renown.

On captain Reid's retiring:

By the president—Captain Reid—His valor has shed a blaze of renown upon the character of our seamen, and won for himself a laurel of eternal bloom.

NAVAL ENGAGEMENT.

Though so much has been said of the desperate and terribly destructive defence of the General Armstrong privateer, in the port of Fayal, the following is the highest colored picture of the bloody scene that has yet been published. If the offence against the neutral rights of Portugal was rank, the punishment was severe; and we trust that captain Lloyd will be made personally to smart for his disregard of the law of nations, and the wanton sacrifice of his people.

We are glad to see such things fairly laid before Europe. There is no way in which the same money could be so usefully spent as to have the accounts of our victories (translated into different languages) spread through the civilized world. The pitiful affair at Washington City was thus circulated on the continent by the British. Let the people "hear the other side." It would produce an irresistible current in our favor, and its effect be felt for ages; and contribute to the future peace and safety of the United States. National honor is national strength.

From Cobbett's Weekly Register.

I observe it stated in the Halifax papers on the 2nd inst. that the Prince of Neufchatel, an American armed brig, had arrived at Boston, after sustaining a gallant action of twenty minutes with five boats full of men, belonging to our ship of war the Endymion. The account says, that one of our boats sunk during the engagement, which had on board at first 43 men, of whom two only were saved; and another which had 36 men, which was taken possession of after having eight killed, and twenty wounded."—The Endymion is said to have lost in all 100 men killed, wounded and prisoners, among which the first lieutenant and a master's mate were killed, and three lieutenants and two master's mates wounded. The Prince of Neufchatel had only "31 men at quarters, including officers, and 37 prisoners on board. Six of her men were killed, 15 severely wounded, 9 slightly, and 8 remained unhurt." It is true, that nothing has been published here in an official shape, respecting this naval disaster; but this circumstance can no more invalidate the truth of the statement, than the silence which has been kept up as to the fate of the Arion will lead us to doubt that

That vessel was sunk by her American opponent. The repulse and disaster attending the Endymion, is not, however, the only naval triumph of the enemy, which has been carefully concealed from the public eye. The following article appears in the Paris papers, received to the 22d inst.—“Extract of a letter from Mr. John B. Hubney, consul for the United States of America, Payal, October 6. Our countrymen have had a brilliant affair. Despising the rights of nations and violating neutral territory, three English vessels, the Plantagenet, Rota and the Carnation, attacked the brig General Armstrong, American privateer, of 14 guns, commanded by captain Reed, at anchor in these Roads. They succeeded finally in destroying her, but paid dearly for it, for they had 120 killed, and 90 of their best mariners wounded, including the flower of their officers.—Captain Reed, with his brave crew, consisting only of 90 men, had only seven slightly wounded.” About ten days ago I received the following letter from an English gentleman at Payal, which he transmitted by a vessel bound for Lisbon, giving the full particulars of the above affair. It speaks volumes, and must reach conviction to the minds of those who are so far deluded, to think that it is in the power of this country to subdue a people who fight with so much undaunted resolution as the Americans:

Payal, October, 15, 1814.

WM. CORBETT, Esq.—Sir, the American schooner, privateer General Armstrong, of New York, capt. Samuel C. Reid, of seven guns, and ninety men, entered here on the 26th ult. about noon, 17 days from that place, for the purpose of obtaining water. The captain, seeing nothing on the horizon, was induced to anchor. Before the elapse of many hours, his majesty's brig Carnation came in, and anchored near her. About six his majesty's ship Plantagenet, of 74 guns, and the Rota frigate came in and anchored also. The captain of the privateer and his friends consulted the first authorities here about her security.—They all considered her perfectly secure, and that his majesty's officers were too well acquainted with the respect due to a neutral port to molest her. But, to the great surprise of every one, about nine in the evening, four boats were dispatched, armed and manned from his majesty's ships, for the purpose of cutting her out. It being about full of moon, the night perfectly clear and calm, we could see every movement made. The boats approached with rapidity towards her, when, it appears, the captain of the privateer hailed them, and told them to keep off several times. They, notwithstanding, pushed on, and were in the act of boarding before any defence was made from the privateer. A warm contest ensued on both sides. The boats were finally dispersed with great loss. The American, now calculating on a very superior force being sent, cut his cables, and rowed the privateer close in alongside of the fort, within half a cable's length, where he moored her, head and stern, with four lines. The governor now sent a remonstrance to the Van Lloyd of the Plantagenet against such proceedings, and trusted that the privateer would not be further molested; she being in the dominions of Portugal, and under the guns of the castle, was entitled to Portuguese protection. Van Lloyd's answer was, that he was determined to destroy the vessel at the expense of all Payal, and should any protection be given her by the fort, he would not leave a house standing in the village. All the inhabitants were gathered about the walls, expecting a renewal of the attack. At midnight, 14 launches, were discovered to be coming in rotation for the purpose. When they got within clear, or gun shot, a tremendous and effectual discharge was made from the privateer which threw the boats into confusion. They now returned a spirited fire but the privateer kept up so continual a discharge, it was almost impossible for the boats to make any progress. They finally succeeded, after immense loss, to get alongside of her, and attempted to board at every quarter, cheered by the officers with a shout of no quarter, which we could distinctly hear, as well as their shrieks and cries. The termination was near about a total massacre. Three of the boats were sunk, and but one poor solitary officer escaped death in a boat that contained fifty souls; he was wounded. The Americans fought with great firmness, but more like blood thirsty savages than any thing else. They rushed into the boats, sword in hand, and put every soul to death as far as came within their power. Some of the boats were left without a single man to row them; others with three and four. The most that any one returned with was about ten.—Several boats floated on shore full of dead bodies. With great reluctance I state that they were manned with picked men, and commanded by the first, second, third and fourth lieutenants of the Plantagenet; first, second, third, and fourth ditto of the frigate, and the first officers of the brig; together with a great number of midshipmen. Our whole force exceeded 400 men.—But three officers escaped, two of which are wounded. This bloody and unfortunate contest lasted about forty minutes. After the boats gave out, nothing more was attempted till daylight the next morning, when the Carnation hauled in along side, and engaged her. The privateer still continued to make a most gallant defence.

These veterans reminded me of Lawrence's dying words of the Chesapeake, “don't give up the ship.” The Carnation lost one of her top-masts, and her yards were shot away; she was much cut up in rigging, and received several shot in her hull. This obliged her to haul off to repair, and to cease firing. The Americans now finding their principal gun (Long Tom) and several others dismounted, deemed it folly to think of saving her against so superior a force; they therefore cut away her masts to the deck, blew a hole through her bottom, took out their small arms, clothing, &c. and went on shore. I discovered only two shot holes in the hull of the privateer, although much cut up in rigging. Two boats' crews were soon after dispatched from our vessels, which went on board, took out some provisions, and set her on fire. For three days after, we were employed in burying the dead that washed on shore in the surf. The number of British killed exceeds 120, and 90 wounded. The enemy, to the surprise of mankind, lost only two killed and seven wounded. We may well say, “God deliver us from our enemies, if this is the way the Americans fight.” After burning the privateer, Van Lloyd made a demand of the governor to deliver up the Americans as his prisoners, which the governor refused. He threatened to send 500 men on shore and take them by force. The Americans immediately retired, with their arms, to an old Gothic convent; knocked away the adjoining drawbridge, and determined to defend themselves to the last. The Van, however, thought better than to send his men. He then demanded two men, which, he said, deserted from his vessel when in America. The governor sent for the men, but found none of the description given. Many houses received much injury on shore from the guns of the Carnation. A woman, sitting in the fourth story of her house, had her thigh shot off, and a boy had his arm broken. The American consul has made a demand on the Portuguese government for a hundred thousand dollars for the privateer, which our consul, Mr. Parkin, thinks, in justice, will be paid, and that they will claim on England. Mr. Parkin, Mr. Edward Bayley, and other English gentlemen, disapprove of the outrage and depredation committed by our vessels on this occasion. The vessel that was dispatched to England with the wounded, was not permitted to take a single letter from any person. Being an eye witness to this transaction, I have given you a correct statement as it occurred.

With respect, I am, &c.

ACCOUNT OF THE CAPTURE OF CASTINE.

Letter from lieutenant-colonel Johns to general sir John Sherbrooke.

Bangor, on the Penobscot River, September 3, 1814.

SIR.—In compliance with your excellency's orders of the 1st instant, I sailed from Castine with the detachment of royal artillery, the flank companies of the 29th, 62d, and 98th regiments, and one rifle company of the 7th battalion, 60th regiment, which composed the force when your excellency did me the honor to place under my command, for the purpose of co-operating with captain Barrie, of the royal navy, in an expedition up that river.

On the morning of the 2d, having proceeded above the town of Frankfort, we discovered some of the enemy on their march towards Hamden, by the eastern shore, which induced me to order brevet-major Croasdale, with a detachment of the 98th, and some riflemen of the 60th regiment, under lieutenant Wallace, to land and intercept them, which was accomplished, and that detachment of the enemy (as I have since learned) were prevented from joining the main body, assembled at Hamden.

On this occasion the enemy had one man killed, and some wounded. Major Croasdale re-embarked without any loss. We arrived off Bald Head Cove, three miles distant from Hamden, about five o'clock that evening, when captain Barrie agreed with me in determining to land the troops immediately. Having discovered that the enemy's pickets were advantageously posted on the north side of the cove, I directed brevet-major Riddle, with the grenadiers of the 62d, and captain Ward, with the rifle company of the 60th, to dislodge them, and take up that ground, which duty was performed under major Riddle's directions, in a most complete and satisfactory manner, by about 7 o'clock; and before ten at night, the whole of the troops, including eighty marines, under captain Carter (whom captain Barrie had done me the honor to attach to my command) were landed and bivouacked for the night, during which it rained incessantly. We got under arms at five o'clock this morning; the rifle company forming the advance under captain Ward; brevet-major Keith, with the light company of the 62d, bringing up the rear; and the detachment of marines under captain Carter moving upon my flanks, while captain Barrie, with the ships and gun-boats under his command, advanced at the same time up the river, on my right, towards Hamden. In addition to the detachment of royal artillery, under lieutenant Garston, captain Barrie had landed one six-pounder, a six and a half inch howitzer, and a rocket apparatus, with a detachment of sailors under lieutenants Symonds, Botley and Slade, and Mr. Sparling, master of his majesty's ship Bulwark.

The fog was so thick, it was impossible to form a correct idea of the features of the country, or to reconnoitre the enemy, whose number were reported to be 1400, under the command of brigadier general Blake. Between seven and eight o'clock, our skirmishers in advance were so sharply engaged with the enemy, as to induce me to send forward one half of the light company of the 29th regiment, under captain Coaker, to their support. The column had not advanced much further, before I discovered the enemy drawn out in line, occupying a very strong and advantageous position in front of the town of Hamden, his left flanked by a high hill commanding the road and river, on which were mounted several heavy pieces of cannon; his right extending considerably beyond our left, resting upon a strong point d'appui, with an eighteen pounder and some light field pieces in advance of his centre, so pointed as completely to rake the road, and a narrow bridge at the foot of a hill, by which we were obliged to advance upon his position. As soon as he perceived our column approaching, he opened a very heavy and continued fire of grape and musketry upon us; we, however, soon crossed the bridge, deployed and charged up the hill to get possession of his guns, one of which we found had already fallen into the hands of captain Ward's riflemen in advance. The enemy's fire now began to slacken, and we pushed on rapidly, and succeeded in driving him at all points from his position; while captain Coaker, with the light company of the 29th, had gained possession of the hill on his left, from whence it was discovered that the Adams frigate was on fire, and that the enemy had deserted the battery which defended her.

We were now in complete possession of the enemy's position above, and captain Barrie with the gun-boats had secured that below the hill. Upon this occasion twenty pieces of cannon fell into our hands of the naval and military force, the return of which I enclose; after which, captain Barrie and myself determined on pursuing the enemy towards Bangor, which place we reached without opposition; and here two brass 3-pounders, and three stand of colors, fell into our possession. Brigadier-general Blake, also, in this town, surrendered himself prisoner, and with other prisoners, to the amount of twenty-one, were admitted to their paroles. Eighty prisoners taken at Hamden are in our custody. The loss sustained by the enemy I have not had it in my power correctly to ascertain: report states it to be from thirty to forty in killed, wounded and missing.

Our loss, I am happy to add, is but small, viz. one rank and file killed; one captain, seven rank and file wounded; one rank and file missing. Captain Gell, of the 29th, was wounded when leading the column, which deprived me of his active and useful assistance; but I am happy to add, he is recovering. I have, &c.

(Signed) HENRY JOHNS, Lt. Col.

ACCOUNT OF THE CAPTURE OF MACHIAS.

From col. Pilkington to gen. Sherbrooke, dated Machias, September 14, 1814.

SIR—I have the honor to acquaint your excellency, that I sailed from Penobscot Bay, with the brigade you was pleased to place under my command, consisting of a detachment of royal artillery, with a howitzer, the battalion companies of the 9th regiment, and a party of the 7th battalion 69th foot, on the morning of the 9th inst. and arrived at Bucks Harbor, about ten miles from this place, on the following evening.

As the enemy fired several alarm guns on our approaching the shore, it was evident he was apprehensive of an attack; I therefore deemed it expedient to disembark the troops with as little delay as possible, and captain Hyde Parker, commanding the naval force, appointed captain Stauffell to superintend this duty, and it was executed by that officer with the utmost promptitude and decision.

Upon reaching the shore, I ascertained that there was only a path-way through the woods by which we could advance and take fort O'Brien, and the battery in reserve; and as the guns of these works commanded the passage of the river upon which the town is situated, I decided upon possessing ourselves of them, if practicable during the night.

We moved forward at 10 o'clock, P. M. and, after a most tedious and harrassing march, only arrived near to the fort at break of day, although the distance does not exceed five miles.

The advanced guard, which consisted of two companies of the 29th regiment, and a detachment of riflemen of the 60th regiment, under major Tod, of the former corps, immediately drove in the enemy's picquets, and upon pursuing him closely, found the fort had been evacuated, leaving their colors, about five minutes before we entered it. Within it, and the battery, there are two 24 pounders, three 18 pounders, several dismounted guns and a block-house. The party which escaped amounted to about seventy men of the 40th regiment of American infantry, and thirty of the embodied militia; the retreat was so rapid, that I was not enabled to take any prisoners. I understood there were a few wounded, but they secreted themselves in the wood.

Having secured the fort, we lost no time in advancing upon Machias, which was taken without any resistance; and also two field-pieces.

The boats of the squadron, under the command of lieutenant Bouchier, of the royal navy, and the royal marines, under lieutenant Welchman, were detached to the eastern side of the river, and were of essential service in taking two field pieces in that quarter.

Notwithstanding that the militia were not assembled to any extent in the vicinity of the town, I was making the necessary arrangements to advance into the interior of the country, when I received a letter from brigadier-general Brewer, commanding the district, wherein he engages that the militia forces within the county of Washington, shall not bear arms, or in any way serve against his Britannic majesty during the present war.* A similar offer having been made by the civil officers and principal citizens of the county, a cessation of arms was agreed upon, and the county of Washington has passed under the dominion of his Britannic majesty.—[Detested profanation.]

I beg leave to congratulate you upon the importance of this accession of territory which has been wrested from the enemy; it embraces one hundred miles of sea coast, and includes that intermediate tract of country which separates the province of New-Brunswick from Lower Canada.

We have taken twenty-six pieces of ordnance, (serviceable and unserviceable,) with a proportion of arms and ammunition, returns of which are enclosed; and I have the pleasing satisfaction to add, that this service has been effected without the loss of a man on our part.

[Here follows the usual compliments to officers, &c.]

I have the honor to be, &c.

A. PILKINGTON, lieut. col.

Deputy adjutant general.

To lieut. gen. Sir J. C. Sherbrooke, K. B. &c.

Return of ordnance, arms, ammunition, &c. taken at Machias by the troops under the command of lieutenant colonel Pilkington, 11th September, 1814, Ordnance, total 26. Arms, 161 muskets, 99 bayonets, 100 pouches, 41 belts, 2 drums. Ammunition, 20 barrels serviceable gunpowder, 75 paper cartridges filled for 18 and 24 pounders, 2,938 musket ball cartridges. 3 barrels of grape and case shot, 553 round shot for 18 and 24 pounders; 6 kegs of gun powder, 25 lbs. each; 28 paper cartridges filled for 4 pounders.

* Is this possible?—ED. REG.

ACCOUNT OF THE CAPTURE OF CASTINE, &c.
Downing-street, Oct. 9, 1814.

Major Addison has arrived with the following despatch from lieut. general Sherbrooke, dated Castine, at the entrance of the Penobscot, Sept. 18.

MY LORD—I have now the honor to inform your lordship, that after closing my despatch on the 26th ult in which I mentioned my intention of proceeding to the Penobscot, rear admiral Griffith and myself lost no time in sailing from Halifax, with such a naval force as he deemed necessary, and the troops as per margin,* to accomplish the object we had in view.

Very early in the morning of the 30th, we fell in with the Rifleman sloop of war, when captain Pearce informed us, that the United States frigate Adams had got into the Penobscot; but from the apprehension of being attacked by our cruisers, if she remained at the entrance of the river, she ran up as high as Hamden, where she had landed her guns, and mounted them on shore for her protection.

On leaving Halifax it was my original intention to have taken possession of Machias, on our way hither; but on receiving this intelligence, the admiral and myself were of opinion, that no time should be lost in proceeding to our destination, and we arrived here very early on the morning of the 1st inst.

The fort at Castine, which is situated upon a peninsula of the eastern side of the Penobscot, near the entrance of that river, was summoned a little after sun-rise; but the American officer refused to surrender it, and immediately opened a fire from four 24 pounders, upon a small schooner that had been sent with lieut. col. Nicholls (commanding royal engineers) to reconnoitre the work.

Arrangements were immediately made for disembarking the troops; but before a landing could be effected the enemy blew up his magazine, and escaped up the Majestaquados river, carrying off in the boats with them two field pieces.

As we had no means of ascertaining what force the Americans had on this peninsula, I landed a detachment of royal artillery, with two rifle companies of the 60th and 98th regiments, under colonel Douglass, in the rear of it, with orders to secure the isthmus, and to take possession of the heights which commanded the town; but I soon learned that there were no regulars at Castine, except the party which had blown up the magazine, and escaped, and that the militia which were assembled there had dispersed immediately on our landing.

Rear-admiral Griffith and myself next turned our attention to obtaining possession of the Adams, or, if that could not be done, to destroying her. The arrangements for this service having been made, the rear admiral entrusted the execution of it to captain Barrie, royal navy, and as the co-operation of a land force was necessary, I directed lieutenant col. John, with a detachment of artillery, the flank companies of the 29th, 62d, and 98th regiments, and one rifle company of the 60th, to accompany and co-operate with captain Barrie on this occasion; but as Hamden is 27 miles above Castine, it appeared to me a necessary measure of precaution first to occupy a post on the western bank, which might afford support, if necessary, to the forces going up the river, and at the same time prevent the armed population, which is very numerous to the southward and westward, from annoying the British in their operations on the Adams.

*First company royal artillery, two rifle companies of the 7th battalion, 60th regiment, 29th, 62d and 98th regiments.

Upon enquiry I found that Belfast, which is upon the high road leading from Hamden to Boston, and which perfectly commands the bridge, was likely to answer both these purposes, and I consequently directed major-general Gosselin to occupy that place with the 29th regiment, and to maintain it till further orders.

As soon as this was accomplished, and the tide served, rear-admiral Griffith directed captain Barrie to proceed to his destination, and the remainder of the troops were landed that evening at Castine.

Understanding that a strong party of militia from the neighboring township had assembled at about four miles from Castine, on the road leading to Blue Hill, I sent out a strong patrol on the morning of the 2d, before day-break. On arriving at the place, I was informed that the militia of the county had assembled there on the alarm guns being fired at fort Castine upon our first appearance, but that the main body had since dispersed, and returned to their respective homes. Some stragglers, were, however, left, who fired upon our advanced guard, and then took to the woods; a few of whom were made prisoners. No intelligence having reached us from captain Barrie on Saturday night, I marched with about seven hundred men and two light field pieces upon Buckstown, at three o'clock on Sunday morning, the 4th inst. for the purpose of learning what progress he had made, and of affording him assistance if required. This place is about eighteen miles higher up the Penobscot than Castine, and on the eastern bank of the river. Rear admiral Griffith accompanied me on this occasion, and as we had reason to believe that the light guns which had been taken from Castine were secreted in the neighborhood of Buckstown, we threatened to destroy the town unless they were delivered up, and the two brass 3 pounders, on travelling carriages, were, in consequence, brought to us in the course of the day, and are now in our possession.

At Buckstown we received very satisfactory accounts of the success which had attended the force employed up the river. We learned that captain Barrie had proceeded from Hamden up to Bangor; and the admiral sent an officer in a boat from Buckstown to communicate with him, when finding there was no necessity for the troops remaining longer at Buckstown, they marched back to Castine the next day.

Having ascertained that the object of the expedition up the Penobscot had been attained, it was no longer necessary for me to occupy Belfast; I, therefore, on the evening of the 6th, directed major-general Gosselin to embark the troops and to join me here.

Machias being the only place now remaining where the enemy had a post between the Penobscot and Passamaquoddy Bay, I ordered lieutenant colonel Pilkington to proceed with a detachment of royal artillery and the 29th regiment to occupy it; and as naval assistance was required, rear admiral Griffith directed captain Parker of the Tenedos, to co-operate with lieutenant colonel Pilkington on this occasion.

On the morning of the 9th, captain Barrie, with lieutenant colonel John, and the troops which had been employed with him up the Penobscot, returned to Castine. It seems the enemy blew up the Adams, on his strong position at Hamden being attacked; but all his artillery, two stand of colors, and a standard, with several merchant vessels, fell into our hands. This, I am happy to say, was accomplished with very little loss on our part; and your lordship will perceive, by the return sent herewith, that the only officer wounded in this affair is captain Gell, of the 29th grenadiers.

Head-quarters, Kingston, Oct. 16, 1814.

GENERAL ORDER.—His excellency the commander of the forces, has received a dispatch from lieutenant general sir John Sherbrooke, commanding the forces in Nova Scotia and its dependencies, dated the 23d Sept. reporting the successful operations of his majesty's arms, aided by the division of the fleet under the command of rear-admiral Griffith, in the capture of the forts of Castine and Machias, and the occupation of the enemy's posts in the vicinity of the Penobscot river.

The service has been attended with the capture or demolition of all the enemy's works of defence, ordnance and stores, and the complete dispersion of his troops.

A detached service intrusted to the command of lieutenant-colonel John, of the 60th regiment, and captain Barrie, of the royal navy, proceeded twenty-seven miles up the Penobscot river, attacked and dislodged the enemy from a strong position at Hamden, which had been occupied for the protection of the United States frigate Adams, which was totally destroyed by fire, previous to his retreat.

The reduction of fort Machias was intrusted to lieutenant-colonel Pilkington, and capt. Parker of the royal navy, but that fortress was evacuated by the enemy on the approach of the British force.

The lieutenant general commanding, expresses in the strongest terms of praise, his sense of the zealous and cordial co-operation of rear admiral Griffith and the officers and seamen of the royal navy, and marines, and also the able and active support he experienced from major general Gosselin, col. Douglas 98th, lieutenant colonel Nicols, royal engineers—the officers employed on detached service, and the zeal, alacrity, and steady discipline displayed by the officers and soldiers, which entitle them to the highest approbation.

Thirty-nine pieces of ordnance have been taken. The British loss amounts only to one rank and file killed, 1 captain and 7 rank and file wounded.

Capt. Gell, 29th regt. wounded severely, not dangerously.

Miscellaneous Scraps.

Under this head it is proposed to preserve a considerable body of incident and fact pertaining to the late war, that have from time to time been denied a regular insertion, for want of room.

THE BANKS.

The forced sales of British government bills in the early part of the war, with the extensive smuggling of British goods which was afterwards organized between the enemy and a considerable number of persons in the eastern states, appeared likely soon to drain the country of its precious metals; for which great war manœuvre the "Boston folks" were the instrument. All the banks of the District of Columbia, Maryland, New York, Pennsylvania, New Jersey, Virginia, Ohio and Kentucky, and generally, in the order named, were compelled to refuse payments in specie. Those of Ohio and Kentucky were much the latest, and it is believed they commonly paid the ordinary sums that had theretofore been demanded for change. Those of the "nation of New-England" generally paid specie as demanded, 16 or 18 excepted, that had always been in dispute, paying, or not paying, as circumstances induced or caprice directed, but these were not among the principal banks. Those of North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia and Louisiana paid specie on all occasions where it did not appear a "run" was made upon them, and some of them met every demand as theretofore. The Louisiana banks had stopped sometime previous to any of the others on account of a vast smuggling that had been carried on by the allied pirates [Baratarians] and the British, &c. but soon resumed their accustomed business. The banks of the southern states were much assisted in their monied operations by the number of prizes that reached their ports, and by a fair trade with Amelia island.

We have before us a Boston price current of specie and bills, dated January 19, 1815. The bank notes of that town and specie were at par:

New York at 19 a 20 per cent discount.
Philadelphia	22 do.
Baltimore	25 do.

Which last was the premium paid for gold in this city—silver 20;—by the brokers. The discounts at Boston rose considerably afterwards.*

It is worthy of remark and remembrance, that before the war, the notes of those banks which stopped specie payments, had ever been in the best repute, as a general circulating medium. Those which proudly held out, had had, before the war, the least portion of specie; that is, those of the eastern states: The city of Baltimore having more in the vaults of its banks, than there were in all the banks of all the "nation of New England." See Weekly Register, vol. VII, page 195; and will probably have as much again, when trade settles into a regular and honest channel.

The following may suffice to shew the general feeling of the banks and the people on this occasion.

PHILADELPHIA, AUG. 31, 1814. To the public. The directors of the banking institutions of this city, having, after mature deliberation, thought it necessary to suspend the payment of specie; they deem it their duty to submit to their fellow citizens the circumstances which induced them to adopt this measure.

From the moment when the rigorous blockade of the ports of the United States prevented the exportation of our produce, foreign supplies could be paid for in specie only, and as the importation of foreign goods into the eastern states has been very large, as it has for many months past occasioned a continual drain from the banks. This drain has been much increased by a trade in British government bills of exchange, which has been extensively carried on and has caused very great sums to be exported from the U States.

To meet this great demand for specie, the course of trade did, for a considerable time enable us to draw large supplies from the southern states, but the unhappy situation of affairs there, having deprived us of that resource, and circumstances having occurred which have in a considerable degree occasioned alarm and distrust, it became a serious consideration whether the banks should continue their exertions to draw within their vaults the specie capital of the country and thus facilitate the means of exporting it from the United States; or whether they should suspend the payment of specie before their means were exhausted. The directors were fully sensible of the inconveniences which a measure of this nature must occasion, and were they not fully convinced that the situation of affairs must soon leave them no alternative, it would not have been adopted, but believing the public interest will be best promoted by stopping the payment of specie before the monied capital of the country is further diminished, and that by adopting the measure at this time the banks may hereafter resume their accustomed operations with less difficulty, they have unanimously agreed to it, and confidently hope this determination will, under existing circumstances, meet the approbation and support of their fellow citizens.

The directors are making the necessary exertions to render the measure they have thus reluctantly adopted as little inconvenient as possible—and to facilitate the management of such concerns as have heretofore been usually conducted with the aid of specie—the payment of which will be resumed as soon as it can be done with propriety and safety.

At a meeting of the committees from all the banks in the city of New York, on the 5th August—William Few, chairman; Charles Wilkes, secretary—

Letters from the cashiers of several banks in Philadelphia and from other unquestionable authority were read, stating that all the banks in Philadelphia had come to a resolution to suspend payments in specie—whereupon the following resolution and preamble were agreed to:

Considering that the banks in Philadelphia have determined to suspend their payments of specie—

Considering that it cannot be doubted that such a suspension of payments in Philadelphia; will be followed by an increased demand on the banks here, and probably a diminished confidence; and further, that there is a considerable balance now due and accumulating, from the banks in Philadelphia to the banks in this city—therefore,

Resolved, That the banks in this city of N. York, with the utmost regret find it necessary to suspend their payments in specie.

CHARLES WILKES, secretary.

Meeting of the merchants and traders.

Philadelphia, Aug. 31, 1814.

At a very numerous meeting of the merchants and traders of the city of Philadelphia, held in pursuance of public notice at the Merchants' Coffee House this day:

Thomas M. Willing, was called to the chair, and Robert Ritchie, appointed secretary.

The chairman stated that the object of the meeting was to take into consideration the recent step adopted by the different banking institutions of the city, suspending for the present, the payment of specie.

The address of the different presidents of these institutions to the public was called for and read.

The following resolution was then offered to the meeting, and unanimously adopted.

That this meeting do approve the determination of the directors of the banks of Philadelphia to suspend the payments of specie at the present crisis, and do agree to receive in payment of all debts due to them the notes of the said banks, in the fullest confidence that the directors of the said banks respectively will pursue such measures as will enable them to resume the payment of specie, as soon as the circumstances which caused the suspension cease.

Resolved, That the different editors of newspapers be requested to publish the proceedings of the meeting daily for one week.

THOMAS M. WILLING, chairman.

ROBERT RITCHIE, sec'y.

At a meeting of merchants and traders, at

VOL. VII.

the Fontaine Coffee House, on the 1st of September 1814—

Gen. Ebenezer Stevens was called to the chair, and William Henderson was appointed sec'y.

The chairman read a communication which he had received from the chairman of the joint committee of the banks, as follows:

New York, Sept. 1st, 1814.

"SIR—I am desired by the committees of the several banks in this city to communicate to you for the information of the meeting at which you preside, that they have come to the following resolutions:

That the banks in this city will continue to take the notes of each other in all payments.

That, having always considered the payment of specie as forming a salutary and a principal check to an undue emission of notes; and that check being, by the unfortunate situation of affairs, for the present removed, they have agreed, unanimously,

To adopt such measures as will effectually in their opinion, prevent an improper increase of the circulation of bank paper.

"I have the honor to be, sir,

"Your obedient servant,

W. FEW, chairman."

"To the chairman of the meeting of merchants and traders."

Resolved, That while this meeting regret the circumstances that have obliged the banks to suspend their payments in specie, they fully concur in the necessity of that measure.

That the confidence of this meeting in the stability of the banks remains undiminished, and that relying on the prudence of the directors to restrain their loans within safe limits, they will by every proper means, uphold the credit and assist the circulation of their notes

That they will continue to receive the notes of the banks of this city in all payments as heretofore.

That at a period when the specie in the country is gradually lessening, and by the embarrassments of our commerce the usual means of supply are cut off, it appears to this meeting expedient to diminish by every proper method the export of specie, and to husband our resources in the hope, that at no distant period, the banks will be able to resume their payment of specie—therefore,

Resolved, That we will avoid all negotiations which may render specie payments necessary, and by every means in our power discourage the exportation thereof.

Resolved, That the proceedings of the meeting be signed by the chairman and secretary and published

Charleston, February 2.—Yesterday morning, in pursuance of orders from major-general Fishburne, the Charleston brigade paraded in Meeting-street for inspection, when they were reviewed by his excellency the governor and major-generals Fishburne, Butler and Moore, with their suites—after which they were inspected and dismissed. The number of men on the ground on this occasion was nearly double what has heretofore been seen on similar occasions, and their appearance such as gave general satisfaction.

Treasury notes.—The passage of the bank bill will most certainly raise the value of those facilities; those therefore who hold them, will do well not to part with them under their value. People who expect a paper medium will now, as in the revolutionary war, rapidly depreciate, will be deceived. It must be recollected in the last war, there was a constant emission, and no taxes or imposts to redeem, or absorb any part of them—the case is now very different. If the emission does not exceed the amount of income, the treasury notes will be a convenient mode of anticipating the revenue, and attended with no bad consequence.

GENERAL ORDERS.—The troops will parade to-morrow morning, at half past ten o'clock, on the ground between the rifle and artillery cantonments, to witness the execution of James Campbell, of the 26th regiment, convicted of, and sentenced to be "hanged until he is dead," for twice deserting, and once to the enemy, and who, it was almost proven, had, while a prisoner, betrayed his fellow-soldiers in captivity, and been instrumental to the death of one of them named Donavan, executed by the enemy on the suspicion of owing allegiance to the British king: Also, of Nathan Smith, of the 10th regiment, convicted of, and sentenced to be shot to death for sleeping while a sentinel on post.

By command of major-general Izard,

J. M. O'CONNER, Assist. adj. gen.

Head-quarters, Northern army, adjutant-general's office, Buffalo, 7th January, 1815.

Extract from general orders.—His excellency the president, has been pleased to confer brevet rank on the following officers, for distinguished services and gallantry displayed by them on the 17th September last, in the sortie of the garrison of fort Erie, the storming and capture or destruction of the enemy's batteries, artillery and ordnance, and of the troops in the trenches, eventuating in the repulse of his whole force, the raising of the siege of that fortress, and his precipitate retreat into Chipewewa, where he was subsequently beleaguered by our forces.

On lieutenant-colonel McDonald, 1st rifle regiment, the rank of colonel, in the army. First-lieutenant Donald Fraser, 15th regiment, rank of captain. Second-lieutenant Richard H. Lee, 15th regiment, rank of first-lieutenant. Third-lieutenant Samuel Riddle, 15th regiment, rank of second-lieutenant.

By command of major general Izard,

From the Virginia Argus.—[We have been favored with the following letter from the governor to colonel John Cropper of Accomack, acquainting him with his appointment to the rank of brigadier general.]

Richmond, January 18, 1815.

Dear Sir,—I have the honor to enclose you a commission of brigadier general in the militia of Virginia. I feel great pleasure in performing this duty; your revolutionary services entitle you to this evidence of the confidence of your country.

The unshaken loyalty of the people you are appointed to command, ensures to them the ardent attachment of their fellow-citizens throughout the state. In confiding to a citizen distinguished for valor and patriotism, the defence of a people so justly dear to the rest of the state, the solicitude of the legislature for the protection of your brigade district, has been most strongly manifested.

As long as I have the honor to be the chief magistrate of the commonwealth, I shall avail myself of every opportunity to prove to the people of Accomack and Northampton, my opinion of their value to the state, and my high sense of their fidelity to their country.

I am with great respect, dear sir, your humble servant,

W. C. NICHOLAS.

General John Cropper.

Danville, Va. Jan 27, 1815.—It will be recollected that we published on the 3d of December last, an account of the forcible seizure of Mr. Samuel Hugh in his bed by a party of Canadians, and of his being conveyed to Montreal, for trial at the court of King's Bench, in consequence of having been concerned in the unhappy affair last fall in Herriford, which terminated in the death of a Mr. Morrill, contractor for the British army. We understand that the circumstances attending that affair were in the first place falsely represented to governor Prevost—setting forth that the cattle seized by our citizens in arms was the private property of the Messrs. Morrills, and that it was a wanton act of barbarity, on the part of the Americans, in defiance of humanity and justice—but that when sir George obtained a true history of the facts, he appointed colonels Coffin and McDonough commissioners to meet others chosen by citizens of the states for the purpose of amicably settling the difficulties on the northern frontier, declaring that the perpetrators of the outrage on the person and property of Mr. Hugh, should make reparation to the amount of their whole estates, if justice required the sacrifice. The people of Essex and Coos have accordingly appointed Mr. Isaac Cushman, Charles Thompson, Moody Rich, Seth Cushman, esquires, and lieutenant H. Parsons as commissioners, who were to meet those from sir George at Herford on Friday last.

[From the Western Spy.]

Cincinnati, Jan. 14, 1815—On Saturday last major-general Gaines arrived at Newport, Ken. on his way to New-Orleans; on Monday a deputation from the citizens of Cincinnati waited on him with an invitation to accept a public dinner, which on account of the critical state of affairs below, and a sense of public duty, he declined. Previous to his departure he forwarded to the gentlemen who waited on him the following note.

To major Torrence, major Anderson, captain Oliver and captain McFarland.

GENTLEMEN,—Permit me to ask the favor of you to offer to the citizens of Cincinnati my best thanks for their polite invitation, communicated through you to a public dinner. I regret that it will not be in my power, consistently with my public duties, to attend, but shall nevertheless bear in mind a grateful sense of this pleasing testimonial of the munificence and regard with which the people of Cincinnati have honored me.

Though personally a stranger to Cincinnati, I have long viewed its local advantages—its rapid growth and its high prospective distinction among the thousand great cities of our national interior, and west; with a degree of pleasure, bordering, perhaps, not a little on national prejudice or national pride—but it is still a pleasure, for in this country we behold the healthful heart and robust stamina of united America—a heart and stamina that will for ever remain shielded from the paralytic touch with which British ships, foreign intercourse, and foreign influence corrupt and deaden some of the exposed extremities along the sea-coast. And should the traiterous aristocracy of one extremity or the insurgent mobocracy of another threaten to tear asunder our national union, then will the importance of this great interior body—this sheet anchor of our federal bark, be universally seen and felt. It will speak in a language of brotherly love, but in a tone strong as the mountain-storm, the American republic shall be preserved! Your obedient servant,

EDMUND P. GAINES.

From the Boston Patriot, January.—The sailing of an American frigate (particularly of old "Ironsides") makes as much noise and confusion in the British navy, as formerly did the escape of a whole squadron from France. It appears by accounts from Halifax, that the Saturn, 53, and Leander, 50, had gone off in pursuit of the Constitution, beside the New-Castle, 50, and Acasta, 40. They, no doubt, will endeavor to keep in pairs, in order to give aid and assistance to each other in case they should fall in with her. A few more of our frigates at sea, would clear the American coast of the enemy's cruisers, by their going in pursuit of them.

FATALITY.—An unfortunate man transporting a 42lb. carronade on a sleigh, in the northern part of New-York, overset his vehicle, and tumbled the gun upon his leg, by which he died. His death is charged to the war, for "free trade and sailors' rights" by a sapient editor of the neighborhood. It is true, that if there had been no war, the cannon might not have fallen upon him; but it is no less reasonable to suppose, that if he himself had not overset the sleigh, he would not have been hurt.

CALL FOR VOLUNTEERS. To the patriotic citizens of Ohio. The president of the United States has requested, through general McArthur, 500 mounted volunteers from this state, to act in conjunction with the volunteers from Kentucky, for a tour of 60 days, on a campaign against the hostile Indian towns. General McArthur will command the detachment. Every officer will be commissioned according to the number of men he may bring on the field, agreeably to the regulations of the United States' army. The field officers will be selected at the principal rendezvous, which will be at Urbanna, on the 20th day of September, (1814.) It is expected that the pay will be the same as that of the United States' rangers; that the men will have credit for a tour of duty; that all horses unavoidably lost in the service, will be paid for by government. The order from the secretary of war as to the arrangements for pay, subsistence, credit for a tour of duty and pay for all horses unavoidably lost, is daily expected by the adjutant general at Chillicothe, and will be published as soon as received.

Hopes are confidently entertained that this reasonable and timely requisition of the president will not be made in vain, when it is in defence of our frontiers, against the depredations of the inveterate and implacable savages, who have so long and so wantonly imbrued their hands in the blood of our citizens. If this call had been promptly obeyed, there is every reason to believe that the strength of the detachment will be such as to put a final period to hostilities in this quarter.

Yes, my countrymen! if you manifest that noble spirit which your cause inspires, you may henceforth repose in safety. The infant in the cradle will no more be awakened by the savage yell, nor the forest be lighted by the midnight blaze of your dwellings! The heroic examples of the brave and patriotic volunteers of Kentucky and Tennessee, under Shelby and Jackson, are before you; that you may imitate their valor and be crowned with their success, is the ardent desire and confident expectation of your friend and humble servant,

OTHINIEL LOOCER,

Acting governor of the state of Ohio.

Head Quarters, Chillicothe, Sept. 17, 1814.

Circumstances beyond my control, some of which it would be improper at this time to communicate, impose on me the painful duty of announcing that the mounted expedition, proposed to be carried on, by order of the president, against the hostile indians, is abandoned. The information which was solicited from the war department, in relation to the pay, credit for a tour of duty, &c. allowed to those who might serve on the expedition has not been received.

To those patriotic citizens who have volunteered their services on the present occasion, I tender, on the part of the government, my sincere thanks—their zeal is worthy of the just cause in which we are engaged: they will consider themselves, together with such militia cavalry as may have been detached for the expedition, honorably dismissed—the preparations and arrangements ordered with a view to the prosecution of the expedition will therefore cease.

All quarter-masters and contractors are hereby directed to furnish forage and rations to the troops on the return to their respective homes.

DUNCAN M'ARTHUR,

Brig. gen. U. S. army com. 8th military district.

*War department, Adjutant and Inspector General's office.
Washington, August 12, 1814.*

INSTRUCTIONS

For the government of those who have claims for pay and bounty, half-pay, pensions and bounty land, under the acts of congress, relative to the existing military establishment of the United States.

1ST.—PAY AND BOUNTY.

Those persons who have claims for pay and bounty, as the legal representatives of such non-commissioned officers, artificers, musicians and privates, as die in the service of the United States, must make application to the paymaster-general of the army, or to his sub-paymasters, who act as his agents. All balances of pay and bounty, at the time of the decease of such non-commissioned officer, &c. will be paid by the paymaster-general, or his sub-paymasters, to the widow, child, or legal representative of the deceased, who must produce written and legal evidence of his or her authority to demand and receipt for the same. When administration is granted to a creditor, solely as a creditor, no more will be paid than is barely sufficient to cover his claim, and the balance, if any, will be reserved for the benefit of the kindred or relations of the deceased. Affidavits of respectable persons, knowing the legality of the representatives of a deceased soldier, will be sufficient evidence to be produced, provided the deceased died a minor, unmarried, and no administration has been granted on the estate. If any person administers for the purpose of receiving the balance due, a copy of the letters of administration must be produced. Should the deceased leave a widow, and no administration has been granted on the estate, the balance will be paid to her, on her producing satisfactory evidence that she was his wife at the time he died.

2D.—HALF-PAY PENSIONS TO WIDOWS AND ORPHANS.

Widows and orphans who have claims to five years half-pay according to an act of congress, must establish the following facts, before they can receive the above pension:—1st. The date of the decease of the officer or soldier, under whom they claim: this fact may be established by the records of the war department, by the proper rolls of the army, by the testimony of military officers, or by that of other respectable persons. 2d. The legality of the marriage, the name of the widow, the names and number of the children, under sixteen years of age, at the father's decease, and the county, state or territory, in which she and they reside. 3d. That the widow, at the time of allowing this half-pay, was not married; she must also repeat that she is not married, at the time of receiving EACH PAYMENT, and establish the fact by the testimony of respectable persons knowing the case; as, in the event of marriage, the half-pay reverts to such of her children as are under sixteen years of age. In cases of orphans only, the guardians will act for them, establish their claims as above, and receive their pensions. All these evidences must be produced to, and filed in the office of the paymaster-general of the army; and orders will be issued to the several district paymasters to pay the pensions on the spot where it falls due.

3D.—BOUNTY LANDS.

Claims for bounty land must be substantiated; and this must be done by the REGULAR DISCHARGE of the ORIGINAL CLAIMANT, from the public service, the best voucher that can be produced. Certificates, from the pay office, should be carefully preserved, as indexes to the records of the ORIGINAL RIGHT. If the original claimant does not personally apply for his land warrant, he must prove his identity before a magistrate, by his own affidavit, and the affidavits of two witnesses, whose CREDIBILITY the said magistrate will CERTIFY; and must execute a power of attorney to whoever applies for the warrant in his behalf, the quality and signature of the magistrate; before whom the said affidavits are made, or the power of attorney is acknowledged, must be attested by the signature and seal of the county clerk, or other equivalent authority of the district in which he resides.

The power of attorney, to authorize the delivery of a land warrant, may be dispensed with, in case a member of congress, while the body is actually in session, will call at the war department, and sign a receipt for it upon the record. In this case, a letter or order, in his favor, from the person who has the right to receive the warrant, addressed to the secretary of war, will be deemed sufficient authority for its delivery.

If the ORIGINAL CLAIMANT be dead, and an heir applies in his right, he must produce legal certificates from competent authority, to prove that he is a LEGITIMATE HEIR BY LAW; in which case, although there may be other heirs existing, a warrant will be issued in that name, adding thereto, "and OTHER HEIRS AT LAW OF _____," &c. &c.

A land warrant WILL NOT be issued to an EXECUTOR or ADMINISTRATOR.

All claimants for bounty lands must make application to the war department

JNO. R. BELL.

Assistant inspector general

Further call on the Western Militia, from a New-York paper of Aug. 29, 1814.

The governor, by his general orders of the 22d inst. has made a requisition on major-general Hall for 3000 men of his division, together with the companies of grenadiers, riflemen and light infantry of the counties of Cayuga and Seneca, and the artillery companies in Auburn and Genessee, in addition to the 1000 previously required by gen. Brown, to rendezvous at Williamsville, in the county of Niagara, on the 1st day of September, to be commanded by general Peter B. Porter. The following field officers are assigned to this detachment: Lieut. cols Hugh G. Dobbin, George W. Fleming, Peter Allen, Caleb Hopkins, and James McBurney; and majors Thomas Lee, jun Daniel Cruger, Eranthus Everts, — Wilson. The residue of the field and staff officers to be assigned by gen. Porter.

"The Niagara frontier, (says his excellency, in this order,) presents a scene which must necessarily rouse the feelings of Americans and urge them to the relief of their countrymen. On one side of the river an important American post in possession of the enemy—on the other, fort Erie occupied by the American army. The latter pressed by superior force without the power of retreating."

General Porter's address to the militia of the western counties of New-York.

The commander in chief has ordered out a portion of the militia to the western frontier, and thought proper to place them under my command. You will indulge me, because I am probably better acquainted with the state of things to the west than most of you, to make a few remarks on the subject of this call.

The Niagara frontier, at this moment, presents a scene infinitely more interesting to you, than any you have witnessed since the settlement of the country. Two hostile armies, of nearly equal force, not a mile distant from each other, obstinately contending for mastery, which a few days must necessarily decide. It is perhaps impossible for either, certainly so for ours, to retreat without total ruin and defeat. In these two armies are concentrated all the disposable military force and all the arms and munitions of war of the province of Upper Canada, and of the western parts of New-York; and on the result of the contest, which must shortly ensue, will depend the fate of these counties respectively. Should the enemy succeed, there is nothing on this side of Utica, that can resist his force or escape his ravages. In the late attack on Erie, so gloriously repulsed, he had 400 savages in sight of our entrenchments, ready to leap in the moment the scales of victory should incline to his side, and complete the work of destruction; and this same scourge will follow him through the country, the instant that army, its only barrier, shall be broken down.

The enemy are not asleep, nor do they look with indifference to those who are fighting their battles. They will push on reinforcements as fast as their scanty means and devastated country will permit. Now is the time for us to act. We abound with men and means, and by a prompt and cheerful compliance with the order of the commander in chief, and by that means only, we can effect a certain and easy conquest, and give permanent security to our settlements.

If the face of the gallant little army, which, for six weeks past, has been wading through fields of blood for your security, composed, too, in part, of your own immediate neighbors and friends, cannot move you to action, I admonish you to recollect, that on the support, the immediate and vigorous support of this army, depends your own security. That army destroyed, and your fruitful fields, your stately edifices, and your fair possessions are laid waste. Your women and children will feel the weight of the tomahawk. Nay even liberty itself, without which these blessings are of no estimation in a patriot's heart, will fly from a country so unworthy of her protection.

At the request of the commanding officer, I came to this place (where I unexpectedly met the order of his excellency) for the purpose of obtaining volunteer aid, hoping that I might have some little influence in awakening our young men to a sense of the country's danger and their own honor. But what can I expect to effect with those whose ardor cannot be aroused by the eloquence of the cannon with which the Niagara is continually resounding? Those, however, who may choose to volunteer will be received as part of the detachment ordered by the commander in chief, and shall return immediately to Erie, proud to share the destinies of its brave defenders, whatever they may be. But I do not return without hopes of soon meeting at the appointed place of rendezvous, such of you, at least, as the constituted authorities of the country have called on for support.

Canandaigua, Aug. 21, 1814.

TO GEN. PETER B. PORTER.—From the Buffalo Gazette. SIR—Six months have now transpired, since we left our farms, our mercantile and manufacturing shops, in the patriotic state of Pennsylvania, with, as we fondly hope, a proper spirit to learn the art of war, and mutually avenge the wrongs of an injured country; and, as the character of the state we represent, as soldiers, as well as a corps of our meritorious fellow citizens, that preceded us in the year 1812, for the support of our country's honor, has suffered beyond the measure of patient endurance, by the mere trifling of a vain blusterer—our preponderating wish was, that when arrayed for battle, we might be led by a general, in whom we could unequivocally repose our confidence.

Sir, disclaiming, as we do, the spirit of sycophancy, we cannot, on this occasion, consistently with our feelings, leave this frontier, without proffering to you an expression of our mutual gratification in being introduced to you as our leader.

We have seen you at Chippawa and at Bridgewater, and have participated with you in the toils and cares of barricading and defending this fort for weeks. We have seen you active in devising means for drenching our bastions and abbattees with the blood of European mercenaries, filling the surrounding entrenchments, and adorning the waters of the Niagara with hundreds of their breathless corpses, without any loss to our country of a greater magnitude than to excite the sympathetic tear of a dozen affectionate mothers, wives or sisters.

In all these scenes we are proud to say, that we were animated by the presence of our general, and fully impressed with the idea that he performed his duty as a soldier and patriot.

Accept, sir, our mutual thanks for your kind and generous treatment, and our best wishes for your lasting prosperity in your country's cause.

Signed, in behalf of ourselves and our brethren in arms, from Pennsylvania.

AMMUNITION FOR THE BELLY.—One of the most celebrated captains of the 17th century being asked, what he believed to be the first duty of a general—replied, “to provide ammunition for the belly.”

The maxim is universal, and ought to engage the first care of statesmen as well as generals.

The maxims of this great man, the celebrated Montecuculi, are studied by military men.

One of those maxims was—“that every thing which is not impracticable for an enemy to execute, ought to be considered practicable.”

If we apply it to the situation in which we stand at this moment, it would be practicable for the enemy to enter the Delaware, and to make a landing somewhere—we should therefore believe that he probably will do so—and we ought to be prepared—for what? “To let him approach within 100, 50, 40 or 20 miles of us?” No. What then?

We should be prepared to meet him on the water's edge, wherever he may attempt to land, and then—what then? “Let him move up to your suburbs—unreconnoitred—unharrassed—unannoyed—and then suffered to perform such exploits here as at Washington—and after remaining two days unopposed, retire unmolested to plunder and disgrace some less populous town.”

Such in their operation would be the counsels of shallow and feeble minds.

What must we then do?

Do! Why, provide ammunition for the belly.

“What then—we cannot eat the enemy,” says some croaker.

Why, when you have subsistence, you may invite men to camps, and then you may arm and (if you have time) discipline them—

What discipline?

To the habits of obedience and command—to bear the fatigues and unavoidable privations of camps—abandon political disputes and all the hateful passions of faction—and unite to save all that is worth disputing about, from the force and vengeance of a barbarous enemy.

If the enemy comes—do not give him battle with raw troops in a thin single line, which if once penetrated, want of discipline would disable you from uniting, or redispersing your disunited parts to assail him.

Meet him in small detachments—powerfully sustained—upon which your small bodies can retreat, when fatigued, and have successive small detachments to keep up the warfare.

Attack his flanks—

Attack the whole length of his columns with an oblique fire—

Throw a strong body in his rear, and cut off his communication with his ships—

Drive all your horses and cattle beyond your own camp—

Do not leave him any part of your country to subsist upon—burn and destroy, rather than he should gain an hour's undisturbed subsistence on your soil.

The invasion of your soil supercedes all other law than that of self preservation.

Seize upon and execute every man who gives the enemy aid or comfort.

He who feeds or abets the enemy—murders your kindred and your children—Drummond has told the British not to be sparing of the bayonet—

Retaliate—let not a man of them return to tell the story of their temerity.

Provide magazines in time to feed those who fight for the general safety—who expose themselves to the merciless enemy—that your generations may live in happiness and liberty

Unite—co-operate—or you perish. [Aurora.]

Head-Quarters, 4th Military District, Philadelphia, December 24, 1814.

GENERAL ORDERS.—The Pennsylvania and New Jersey militia, in the service of the United States within the 4th military district (excepting the brigades under the command of brigadier-generals Cadwalader and Snyder, and four companies of brigadier-general Elmer's brigade) are to be mustered and inspected according to law, and discharged forthwith.

Major-general Gaines being ordered to Louisiana, the command of the 4th military district, will, for the present, devolve on brigadier-general Cadwalader, of the Pennsylvania militia, who will report direct to the war department.

Colonel Irvine, being the senior officer of the United States' army within the district, will take post at this city, and have the command of the regular troops, reporting to the commanding officer of the district.

The major-general in taking leave of the gallant and aspiring troops he has had the honor to command, begs they will accept his best thanks for the persevering zeal, and disciplined steadiness with which they have performed their various duties, and maintained amidst many privations, the proud pre-eminence of American patriots and warriors. To possess the confidence and friendship of such men—to meet, with them, the invading foe—to defend, with them, the soil once stained and consecrated by the blood of our forefathers, the general would always consider to be an honor to the highest grade. He bids them an affectionate farewell.

(Signed) EDMUND P. GAINES,
Major-gen. commanding.

Chs. J. Aourse, asst. adj. gen. U. S. army.

Major-general Strong, of the Vermont militia, who acquitted himself so handsomely when sir George Prevost invaded New-York and attacked Plattsburg in September last, has been re-appointed to the command by the unanimous vote of the legislature. On which occasion he issued the following general orders:

Head-Quarters, Vergennes, Nov. 28, 1814.

Major-general Strong announces to the militia of the 3d division of the state of Vermont, that he is again appointed to their command. He is sensible that it is no ordinary compliment, to be thought worthy to command such men as compose his division. Their zeal, courage and patriotism, so conspicuously manifested on a late memorable occasion, has given them a proud name; which it will be his high ambition, on similar emergencies and at all times to assist to perpetuate.

By the proclamation of his excellency the commander in chief of the 9th of September last, announcing the threatened invasion of our territory, this division is ordered to be in constant readiness for the field. To comply with this order with effect for our country or honor to ourselves, it is necessary to be prepared. The commanders of brigades, regiments and companies, will therefore take the precaution that the requisition of the several laws, regulating the militia, be complied with; for which they will be held individually responsible. Quarter-masters of regiments are, in particular, directed to examine and make report as to the requisite supply of ammunition in the several towns.

If an additional excitement is necessary to induce every man to do his duty—let him reflect upon the late invasion of our northern frontier—when, without distinction of party, the old and infirm, vied with the young, in the glorious cause of defending the soil of freedom. That soil is sacred, consecrated by the blood of our fathers, let it become the tomb of their sons sooner than be polluted by the footsteps of the invaders of our country.

I have thought fit and do hereby appoint Robert B. Bates, esquire, of Middlebury, and Warren Loomis, esquire, of Burlington, my aids-de-camp. All officers and soldiers to take notice and govern themselves accordingly.

SAMUEL STRONG,

Major-general 3d division of the militia of the state of Vermont.

THE STRANGER.—Boston, Sept. 29. The following is the principal part of the cargo of the valuable ship Stranger, a prize to the Fox privateer, whose arrival was announced in our last, and now ordered for sale by the marshal on the 14th October—viz.

66 iron guns, 24 pounders on Congreve's principles, with the carriages, axletrees, trucks, beds, quoin, blocks for tackles, hooks, thimbles, scraps, cordage for breeching, tackle fall, and indeed every essential and minute requisite for placing them on board a vessel of war in readiness for actual service.

Also—The following munitions of war:

Articles of copper. Powder measures, tunnels, shovels, ladles, hoops, can hooks, adzes, drivers, vices, slippers for magazines, snuffers powder horns, priming wires, vent bits, firelocks, locks, cartouch boxes with and without belts and frogs, wad hooks, sponges with and without staffs, and ropes, combs for sponges, tompons, gunner's crows, mallets, steel purchase chissels, painted caps for sponges, budge brails, magazine brooms, match rope, muscovy, dark and tin lanthorns, hand screws, brass locks for cannon from 32 to 9 pounders, lead aprons and lead corans for the locks of cannon, long match, ladle hooks, lynch pins, 20d, 10d, 6d nails, quill tubes, padlocks, tallow, whitening, emery, burnishers, sweet oil, pole axes, machine and machine spikes, twine, wad gauges, junk, pails with iron hoops, thread, worsted, cutting knives, scissors, needles, forge tongs, pincers, nipping rods for muskets and pistols, muskets with bayonets and scabbards, musketons, pistols with ribs, signal rockets, port-fires, blue lights, slings for muskets, musket and pistol cartridge boxes, flints, cartridge and fine paper, flannel cartridges, swords with scabbards, belts for do. pikes, drums, round and grape 21 pound shot, leaden musket and pistol balls, moulding ladles for leaden balls, forms for lead and cartridges.

Armourer's tools. Vices, wrenches slakes, hammers, punches, cold chissels, iron braces, square bits, screw plates, sett of drills, files of various kinds, lock tools, turn screws, &c.

Also—The following clothing, shipped for the use of the minors and sappers, such as sergeants, corporals, musicians, drummers and private's coats, jackets, trousers, shirts, drawers, stockings, shoes, gaiters, hats, caps, plumes, feathers, &c. &c. together with a variety of other articles.

The above articles were designated by the enemy for his vessels of war building at Kingston.

SENSIBLE COMPLIMENT. The people of the towns of Bature, Bethany and Alexander, near the Niagara frontier, on the 26th September, 1714, sent general Gaines a polite note, accompanied with a handsome subscription ($400 and upwards) for furnishing the soldiers of fort Erie with vegetables, and also 300 bushels of potatoes, and other articles of which the were greatly in want—for which they received the hearty thanks of the general; who in his reply, observes—"The soldiers of Erie and Niagara will gladly seize upon every occasion so prove that so long as they have health and strength, the citizens of the interior may repose in safety, and be assured that the savage monster, who, in December last, commenced among the defenceless women and babes, his work of massacre and conflagration, shall be foiled and humbled."

THE BLOCKADE. Extract from earl Bathurst's letter to Sir John C. Sherbrooke. "I have brought under the consideration of his majesty's government, the memorial of the merchants of Halifax, in which they represent the consequences which the blockade of the American ports will produce, if rigidly enforced to the exclusion of vessels bearing your license, and have only to express my regret that a measure which operates so severely against the enemy, should, in any degree, affect the interests of his majesty's subjects. But at the same time, his majesty's government do not feel themselves justified in authorising any relaxation of the measures adopted by Sir A. Cochrane, which will have the effect of debarring neutral nations from a trade which was at the same time carried on by one of the belligerents."

[The above, (observes a Boston paper,) we understand, is a copy of a letter received at Halifax, on the receipt of which all licensed boats were ordered off.]

CAPTAIN MANNERS. From a late London paper. The conduct of this noble hero, during the late desperate engagement between the Reindeer and Wasp, in which he gloriously fell, is the theme of universal praise. After having part of the calves of his legs carried away by a ball, he received another through both thighs, which made him sink for two or three minutes on his knees, but no entreaties could prevail on him to go below—and recovering himself, he headed the boarders with a full determination to master his antagonist or perish in the attempt. While climbing into the rigging, two balls from the Wasp's top penetrated the top of his skull, and came out beneath his chin. Placing one hand on his forehead, the other convulsively brandishing his sword, he exclaimed, "My God! my God!" and dropped lifeless on his deck. The Reindeer was surrendered by the captain's clerk, no individual of a higher degree being in a state to execute the melancholy office.—One of the Reindeer's men was wounded in the head by a ramrod. About half of the ramrod passed through his temples, and remained stationary. Before it could be extricated it became necessary to saw it off close to one of his temples. The man is in a fair way of doing well!

LAW CASE. Albany, Oct. 10, 1814. At a circuit court now sitting in this city, a cause came on to trial on Saturday last, between a Mr. James McConell and major-general Wade Hampton. The prominent facts which appeared on trial, we understand to be these:—That while our army at the north was under the command of general Hampton, last autumn, Mr. McConell, who is a very respectable citizen, learning that the enemy had received some considerable reinforcements, and that an attack on our army was to be apprehended, thought it his duty to communicate this to the general, and accordingly called at his quarters for that purpose. But to his astonishment, instead of receiving the thanks of the general, he was told with the most violent imprecations, that his information was false, he was a traitor, and should be hung immediately. He was then dragged to the guard-house by a body of soldiers, confined there four or five days without being permitted to write or speak to any person, except in the presence of the officer of the guard; compelled to lay on the damp bare ground; to subsist upon the most filthy rations that were dealt out to the criminals under confinement, and in momentary expectation of being led out to execution. The general then called together some of his officers whom he thought most fitted to his purpose, styled them a court-martial, appeared as the accuser, and insisted on this self-constituted military tribunal condemning him to death for treasonable practices! The unfortunate man, although refused the means of employing counsel, or procuring witnesses, was discharged. It appearing that the information which he had given the general proved to be true, and that the only reason for this procedure on the part of general Hampton, was a private pique against M'Connell, as he had frequently said he meant to hang him if he could.

General Hampton's counsel offered nothing in evidence to contradict these facts, or any thing to mitigate this monstrous outrage.

His honor chief justice Thompson presided at his trial, and gave the charge to the jury, most decidedly condemning all usurpations of military power, and recommending, under a dispassionate consideration of the circumstances, such a verdict as would deter any future attempt to make the liberties of the citizen dependent on the arbitrary will of a military commander. The jury retired a few minutes, and returned with a verdict for the plaintiff, of nine thousand dollars damages.

NAVAL COURT OF ENQUIRY.—At a court of enquiry, consisting of captain Isaac Huli and captain John Smith, of the United States' navy, at the navy-yard in the harbor of Portsmouth, N. H. to investigate the conduct of the officers and crew of the United States' ship Adams, commanded by captain Charles Morris, and the causes of the loss of that ship by fire, by order of captain Morris, in order, as was alleged, to avoid capture by the enemy at Hamden, in the district of Maine, on the 3d of September, 1814, the opinion of the court upon the fact found, was, by order, attached to the proceedings transmitted to the department, and is as follows, viz.

OPINION.—"The court having attentively considered the testimony of the case, are of opinion, that captain Morris, the officers and crew of the late ship Adams, have done their duty, and express their entire approbation of their conduct on this occasion; and further, that had the ship not have been destroyed she must have fallen into the hands of the enemy. And, from the circumstances which attended her destruction, they are, moreover, further of opinion, that the conduct of captain Morris during the approach of the enemy, and in the destruction of the United States' ship Adams, reflects on him the highest credit. The court adjourned sine die.

"ISAAC HULI, President of the court:
"G. W. PRESCOTT, Judge Advocate."

LOSS OF THE CUTTER EAGLE, &c.—From a New Haven paper of October 17, 1814.—On Monday last the sloop Susan, captain Miles, of this port, on her passage from New-York, with a very valuable cargo, was captured off Mill river by a sloop fitted out by the British frigate Pomone, commanded by a lieutenant, with from forty to sixty men, armed with muskets, &c. with an 18-pounder and two 4's. The packet, though armed, was surprised, and made no resistance. This occurrence was observed by a sloop which had just passed the Susan, and a passenger was immediately landed from her, who came express to this place with the information. The revenue cutter Eagle, captain Lee, immediately prepared to go out and retake the Susan, manned by her own crew and about thirty volunteers, who promptly tendered their services for that purpose. The wind being light and unfavorable for the captors to get off with their booty, it was hoped the Eagle would be able to cut them off before they could pass the harbor. At about four P. M. she got under way, towed out of the harbor, and stood to the southward and eastward, the wind being light all night; did not observe the sloop; at day-break found themselves nearly under the guns of a sloop of war; all hands were immediately called to man the sweeps; got out two boats ahead, with a view to get her into a creek on Long Island shore, there being no port of safety which she could reach. Being almost calm, the brig manned several barges and sent them in pursuit, which came up fast, and a firing commenced between them and the cutter at about 7 A. M. Approaching the shore, captain Lee learned from some fishermen who had assembled on the beach that he could not enter the creek, there not being sufficient depth of water. The brig drawing near, and seeing no other chance of escape, the cutter was laid on shore, under a high bluff, nearly opposite Falkland Islands, and the barges coming up she commenced a brisk fire on them with round and grape shot, which soon obliged them to sheer off. Commenced landing the guns, ammunition, sails, &c. and, with the assistance of the people on shore, were enabled to get two 4 and two 2-pounders upon the bluff, where they were planted, and the colors near them, with a determination not to "give up the ship." These, with the musketry, kept the enemy from landing or taking possession of the cutter, though several attempts were made by the barges, whilst the brig kept up a heavy cannonade, taking a distance out of our reach, and hoping to drive us from the hill. Finding their efforts unavailing, they commenced firing upon the cutter to destroy her, at the same time keeping up their fire upon the hill, from the sloop that captured the Susan and a barge, taking positions so as to rake on every quarter, which they kept up till about 2 P. M. when the sloop and barge hauled off, and the firing ceased. In a short time the sloop resumed her station, and the firing recommenced, and was continued till between four and five o'clock, occasionally returned from the hill, when the sloop hauled off again, and about sunset stood to the eastward. Several other attempts were made by the barges during the night to gain the cutter, but the vigorous and well directed fire from the hill always compelled them to return. The brig kept up her station till about nine o'clock the next morning, when she got under way and stood off.

During this affair several acts of heroism were displayed worthy the intrepid character of our seamen. Having expended all the wadding of the 4-pounders on the hill during the warmest of the firing, several of the crew volunteered and went on board the cutter to obtain more. At this moment the masts were shot away, when the brave volunteers erected a flag upon her stern; this was soon shot away, but was immediately replaced by a heroic tar, amidst the cheers of his undaunted comrades, which was returned by a whole broadside from the enemy. When the crew of the cutter had expended all their large shot and fixed ammunition, they tore up the log-book to make cartridges and returned the enemy's small shot which lodged in the hill.

The cutter's force was only six guns—four 4-pounders and two 2's, with plenty of muskets and about fifty men.

The enemy being gone, and provisions, &c. being scarce, the volunteers from this city left captain Lee and his crew, and arrived here on Thursday evening, in a sloop from Long Island. Captain John Davis was slightly wounded in the knee from a stone impelled by a 32-pound shot which struck near him.

Killed—1 calf, by a 32-pound shot, which was picked up on a field nearly a mile distant. Though we do by no means despise the prowess of the enemy, we would observe that the brig which achieved this notable exploit is the same that killed a hog and a horse at Stonington—the Dispatch. She fired nearly 300 shot.

We have since learned that captain Lee succeeded in getting off the cutter, and was about to remove her to a place of safety, when the enemy returned and took possession of her. She was greatly injured, but it is expected the enemy will be able to refit her to annoy us in the Sound.

The Susan was taken down to the enemy's squadron, where she has been ransomed, and a flag went off yesterday with the ransom money. The passengers on board her were treated with great politeness, paroled and released.

HONORABLE TRIBUTE.—The following address, which we find in the Plattsburg Republican, of December 24, signed by all the hostages who had returned from captivity, merits remembrance:

TO MAJOR VANDERVENTER.

Plattsburg, December 23, 1814.

SIR—We, the undersigned, American officers lately confined as hostages in Canada, beg leave to express to you our sincere thanks, for the zealous and unremitting exertions which you have ever made to ameliorate the condition of your fellow sufferers in captivity. Emancipated from long and rigorous imprisonment, and once more restored to the enjoyment of liberty, the American officers would be wanting in duty, did they fail to testify, both to you and to their country, the sentiments of gratitude which they entertain for your benevolent exertions in their behalf. The strenuous and successful efforts which you as senior officer have made to clothe and provide with adequate comforts, the brave soldiers of the United States sent down to Quebec, naked and diseased, and the noble and disinterested manner in which you supplied pecuniary relief, on your individual credit, to the prisoners, at a time when the British government in Canada refused to negotiate public bills for that purpose, will ever entitle you to their warmest thanks.—Without a public agent at Quebec, the situation of the prisoners would have been wretched indeed, but for your timely interference.

About to be separated from your former companions, be assured, sir, that you carry with you the respect of all who know you, and their warmest wishes for your welfare.

We are respectfully, sir, your obedient servants

LIBERALITY.—From a Salem paper of January, 1815.—Captain John Ordronaux, of the Prince of Neufchatel, on her late cruise, has (we understand, from an unquestionable source) given to his prisoners, not only the 3 or 400 dollars mentioned a few days since, but also 700 dollars more. We also have the fact from first rate authority, that he alone fired a bout portant upwards of 80 muskets in the engagement off Nantucket, and must have killed or wounded upwards of sixty of the enemy himself.

Captain Ordronaux was the gallant commander of the little privateer Marengo three years ago, when she had only fifty-two men, and after a desperate engagement, took his Britannic majesty's brig of war the Pelican, who had then one hundred and thirty men, and about $80,000 in specie on board. It was off Jamaica that the engagement took place, in a calm, in sight of all the men of war in that place. None dared to send their barges after him because they knew his name was Orionax. His daring enterprise successfully led him to attack and vanquish the Pelican. He took on board her specie and safely brought it to New-York.

MISSISSIPPI TERRITORY—It is due to the valor and patriotism of the citizens of this territory, though scattered over a great extent of country, and surrounded by difficulties from the neighborhood of the Indian nations, to record, that they emulated the high and glorious examples of Kentucky and Tennessee, and bore a portion of the everlasting honor that belongs to the defenders of Orleans. When called upon by general Jackson, they seized their arms with the alacrity that belongs to the gallant sons of the west, and marched freely for the post of danger.

NAVAL CHARACTER. One of our gallant thorough bred seamen, an officer in the navy of the United States, being asked by an old sinner who had sheltered himself within the enemy's lines during the revolution, "what his politics were?" replied—"to drink my allowance of grog—to chew my tobacco, and fight for the republic—what's yours?" The story was silent.

SOMETIMES BY FIRE. Cobbett, while he was on the side of the ministry, expressly told us that the British "sometimes" employed "fire" to check our manufactories. Hence among the "events of the war," we notice the recent destruction by that element of a cotton mill. See near Poughkeepsie, N. Y. damage 50,000 dollars, and of another at Betville, N. J. damage from 40 to 60,000. [January 1815.]

DELAWARE. The legislature of this little state, with one eighteenth of all the power of government in the senate of the United States, adjourned [January 1815] without proposing or enacting any thing whatsoever for the defence of its territory; without ever passing a militia law, which we believe that state has not nor, if it has, is so defective as to be good for nothing.

DIRECT TAX. The following is from the New Bedford "Mercury" of the 27th January. This town is famous for its loyalty.

"On Tuesday last, the deputy collector of the 14th collection district, agreeably to previous notice, proceeded to sell the real estates of about 30 persons of this town, for the payment of direct taxes. No person appearing to purchase, the whole was knocked down to Uncle Sam.* Whether Uncle Sam or his agents will ever dare attempt to take possession of these purchases, is another part of the business.

Mercury.

DECATUR. The ship carpenters at the navy yard in Brooklyn, (N. Y.) have already volunteered upwards of 1600 days work towards building a new frigate for commodore Decatur. [A few days after the capture of the President was known.]

CHATHAM. The following extract from a speech of the great lord Chatham, delivered in the British parliament on American affairs, being nearly one of his last in that body, is happily revived at the present time:

MY LORDS—You cannot conquer America. You may swell every expense; pile and accumulate every assistance you can buy or borrow; traffic and barter with every little, pitiful German prince, who sells his subjects to the shambles of a foreign power, your efforts are vain and impotent; doubly so from the mercenary aid on which you rely. For it irritates to an incurable resentment the minds of your enemies, to overrun them with the mercenary sons of rapine and plunder; devoting them and their possessions to the rapacity of hireling cruelty! If I were an American, while I saw foreign troops remain in my country, NEVER would I lay down my arms—NEVER NEVER, NEVER!"

[Remember Castine!]

FAST DAY. On the day of the late public fast, the editor of the Boston Gazette observed—"If we are not mistaken this is the day appointed by the president of the U. States, to be observed in solemn acts of fasting and prayer, and humiliation."

On which the editor of the New York Columbian remarked. "And if the Columbian is not mistaken, certain gentlemen in Connecticut were punished by the legislature for suffering labor on their premises, on Mr. Adams's fast day. Mistakes were attended by more serious consequences than they are now."

ANDREW ALLEN, late the British king's consul at Boston, famous for the impudence of his conduct after war was declared in distributing licenses to American citizens, "well inclined," as the licenses said, to his majesty's government, it is stated has been rewarded for his "services in America" by a pension of 500*l.* per annum. It would be curious to know how much certain of his late associates receive, or expect, for the "aid and comfort" they afforded him.

HUMOR.—From the Baltimore Federal Gazette.—A late London paper states that a very large medical staff will accompany the troops destined for America. It would appear from this that they expect to be very sick of the expedition—and we hope that they will not be disappointed in that expectation.

A law student who has for some time past been attending his duty as a member of an artillery company; was asked a few days since what books he had been lately reading, answered, that he had been for the last two months been engaged studying CANNON LAW.

* U. S. or Uncle Sam—a cant term in the army for the United States.

BRITISH GOODS. A very considerable quantity of British (prize) goods, was brought to Portsmouth, N. H. last autumn. The following account of the sale will be regarded as a curiosity a little while hence:

Woolen, cotton and silk goods, from $6 to 11 50 the £. sterling.

Shoes and hats, 3 50 to 5 do.

Rum, 2 35 a 2 80 cts. gall.

Brandy, (Naples) 2 30 a 2 40 do. do.

Gin, 1 30 a 2 35 do. do.

Hyson tea, 2 14 a 2 15 lb.

Raisins, Muscatel, 9 a 9 25 box.

Do. Smyrna, 36 lb.

Pepper, 20½ do.

BRITISH APPEAL. The following official letter from capt. Hayes. was sent to the prisoners on board the Majestic, in answer to their several petitions for release: [dated in January 1815.]

"I have examined the letters sent to me by the Americans now on board the Majestic, and I lament that there should be a necessity for detaining as prisoners any of those taken in merchant vessels; but to your own government, Americans, must you look for the cause of this severe measure; and all I can do for you is to send your communication to the admiral. I do not, however, see how you can expect to return to your wives and families, while Mr. Madison is giving a high bounty for every Englishman brought into an American port of the very same description with yourselves. And the good sense of the Americans, I trust, will point out to them the justice of our present conduct, and how cruel it would be in us to suffer our countrymen (taken in merchant vessels) to be carried to an American prison, without endeavoring by retaliation to put a stop to it. With us it is not a measure of revenge for the injurious acts of the American government, but one to obtain the release of our suffering countrymen, of whose situation you can pretty well judge by what yourselves feel. We have no satisfaction in the increased severities of the war, and it is to your own government you must look if they are continued.

JOHN HAYES,

Captain of the Majestic.

STONINGTON. If the following be a fair abstract of sir Thomas Hardy's report of the attack upon Stonington, we are sorry for it. It is as false and as uncaudate a statement as any we have seen. We would have wished that he might have told the truth. It is from a late London paper

"Vice-admiral sir Alexander Cochrane has transmitted to John Wilson Croker, Esq. a letter from rear admiral Hotham, inclosing one from capt. sir T. Hardy, of his majesty's ship Ramilies, dated off Stonington, the 12th of August, giving an account of an attack upon that place by the said ship, with the Pactolus, Despatch brig, and Terror bomb. The Despatch of the 9th of August, anchored within pistol shot of the battery; but the Pactolus not being able to approach the shore near enough to support her, the brig was recalled, having had two men killed and twelve wounded. On the 11th, after the Terror had thrown in some shells and carcasses the Ramilies and Pactolus anchored as near as the shallowness of the water would allow, and fired several broadsides into the town, from which it suffered great damage. At the commencement of the fire the enemy withdrew the guns from the battery to the outside of the town, where they had assembled 3000 militia! The town of Stonington had been conspicuous in preparing and harbouring torpedoes and giving assistance to the enemy's attempts at the destruction of his majesty's ships off New London.

VERMONT. Extract of a letter from a gentleman in Addison county, Vermont, to a member of congress, dated Jan. 8th, 1815.

"Volunteer companies are forming in all the neighbouring towns, getting arms and ammunition, and holding themselves in readiness. If the British take a ride to Whitehall this winter, they will never return."

TRAITORS. New London, Jan. 25th, 1815.

The private armed boat Retaliation, John Rogers commander, on the 2. st inst. brought in a boat from Lyme, with two men on board named Russel and Gilbert, on a suspicion that they were bound on a trading trip to the enemy's squadron. Her load consisted of sheep, turkeys, geese, soap, candles; pepper, cheese, eggs, &c. On Monday they were brought before a court of enquiry, where an examination was had; but whether upon the evidence, they are to be holden for trial remains undecided. The men in the interim are committed to gaol

MILITARY FORCE. The Richmond Enquirer, to shew the preference of a regular army to militia levies, publishes the following abstract from the official returns of the United States' forces at Norfolk, in one of the months of last year:

Regular force 1660--250 sick--21 deaths.

Militia force 2540--2012 sick--160 deaths

--200 discharged for inability.

691 discharged in November, having served a tour of duty, half sick.

NEW-YORK ARSENAL. From the Columbian March, 8. We were quite unexpectedly disappointed, of a visit to the state arsenal, yesterday, to find it far exceeding any thing of the kind heretofore known in this country, and exhibiting, on a smaller scale, the furniture and materials of the tower of London, but not surpassed, in perfection and neatness, we presume, by any similar establishment in the world. Twelve thousand stand of arms, (musketry) with accoutrements complete, and rifles, swords, pistols and ammunition in proportion, arranged in festoons, stars, and other fanciful and convenient forms, in glittering polish and perfect order, furnish a spectacle worth a half hour's walk to view; while the politeness of the officers attending affords every gratification to the most curious enquirer. The cannon, mortars, shells, shot, &c. are not mentioned. Thirty or forty ladies were among the spectators attracted by the novelty of this grand display of "bruised arms hung up for monuments." yesterday afternoon.

AMELIA ISLAND. Extract of a letter from Amelia, Sept. 9. 1814. "Yesterday 13 sail of neutral ships sailed for Europe, principally for England, with the following number of bales of cotton, viz. Nadashda, 1330; Two Friends, 1110; Venus, 805; Neva, 804; Joachim, 517; Freden 860; Active, 703; Emelia, 700; brigs Sophie, 600, Hoppet, 500; Carolus Magnus, 480; Flor de Tejo, 200; Rio Mendiogo, 100. Total 8921 bales—also, about 2000 casks rice. The whole quantity exported this year is estimated at 35,000 bales; and there are 4000 bales now on hand. Twenty neutral ships are waiting cargoes."

To IRISHMEN. While the city of New York was threatened, the following spirited address was published—

To Irishmen. We, the undersigned, submit, to such of our countrymen, as are not subject to militia duty, or other insurmountable difficulty, that now, or never, is the golden moment to enrol themselves, and to repay the debt of hospitality to their adopted country.

Even the monarchs of Europe have found it their interest to entertain and distinguish the persecuted Irish, and faith and loyalty have always marked their steps. The constituted authorities of this republic are not less wise and generous—shall we then be less grateful? Shall those who, in the hour of desperate trial have been unshaken by bribe, by torture or by death, degenerate in a land which is the last refuge of persecuted freemen? If any be so recreant we disown them for our countrymen. Our appeal is to the constant; our call is on the brave! Such only are invited whose hearts can answer to that call: Broken, like the rest, in fortune, we have neither bribe nor patronage to offer, nor any thing to share, but the dangers of the field. Nor shall we solicit or cajole. Zeal and affection must be the common stock; with those qualities the poor is rich enough; without them the richest is too poor. We have no interest but the safety of our country; no ambition but to march with its defenders. Thrice happy, if in doing so, we may also avenge the wrongs of our dear and native land.

The respectable signatures already obtained give fair hopes of success, but the numbers are yet inadequate to a separate organization. The three months of service will soon elapse, and the honor may, by a short delay, be forever lost of having their names incised amongst these heroes whose brows so many laurels have already circled at an epoch which future annals will consecrate to fame.

Lists are now open at No. 69 Beekman-street, No. 6 Murray-street. If at the end of the present month, the number of 500 is not complete, we shall conclude that all who have not joined us are already at their post; and with those who have offered, we shall seek some other line of honorable duty for ourselves.

WM JAMES MAC NEVAN.

WILLIAM SAMPSON.

PRACTICAL PATRIOTISM.—Charleston, February 10. 1815.—The alarm men of Fairfield district have met by sections at convenient places within the district, and have resolved to contribute, either in labor, money or provisions, as it may be required, for the use of the families of the militia now in or who may hereafter be called into the service of their country. They propose to plant, tend and harvest the crop, wherever it may be necessary, for those who are absent on duty. The but few, very few, if any, of the brave volunteers now in service from that district may require any such aid, the merit of this act is not the less; and is an example worthy of imitation, and highly honorable to the old hoary veterans of Fairfield district.

GALLANT AFFAIR.—On the 7th of February, 1815, about sun-rise, near James' Island, Dorchester county, a British tender was just within the mouth of Little Choptank, and a cake of ice was drifting her towards the ice near the shore, within about 400 yards. Joseph Stewart and others, to the number of nineteen, went to the spot, and finding a mound of ice about one hundred and fifty yards from the tender, formed by means of loose cakes floating into the mouth of the river, and accumulated by the force of the tide, made their way to it over parts of the ice which were thawed, jumping from cake to cake; and using it as a breast-work commenced a fire on the tender. When they arrived the British had got their anchor on the bow and loosened sails. After an engagement of two hours the British cried for quarters and surrendered. They consisted of nineteen male persons and had on board a twelve-pound carronade, a swivel, seventeen muskets and six pistols, with plenty of powder and ball.

Another.—On the 12th ultimo, a British tender and barge came up Honga river, as far as Lake's cove, and got possession of six of our vessels, some loaded and bound for Norfolk. Two of the vessels were fired by the enemy, when fifteen or twenty militia-men having collected, commenced a brisk fire from canoes, and continued it, amidst a shower of grape and round shot, until they drove the enemy off, who left their sails bent to the masts of our vessels, and a great coat; the militia following them in their canoes until their ammunition gave out. Property to the amount of 10 or 12,000 dollars was saved; and the British were supposed to have lost several killed and wounded.

ELEGANT EXTRACT of a letter from a gentleman abroad to his friend in America, dated in Nov. last.

[Attributed to John Q. Adams]

"The success of the attack of the English upon Washington intoxicated them to such a degree, that they translated their Gazette account of it into all the principal languages, and sent it by special messengers all over Europe.—That of sir John Sherbrooke's expedition followed immediately after, and in more than one way flattered their dreams of conquest. Their conduct at Washington, however, excited throughout all Europe a sentiment very different from that which they had expected; a sentiment of disgust at the Gothic barbarism of their proceedings; and since then their failure at Baltimore, their defeat on lake Champlain, their retreat from Plattsburgh, and the sortie of the 17th Sept. from Fort Erie, have redeemed our defeats, have aggravated theirs, and now lead them to the anticipation of a disastrous issue to the campaign.

"It is a mortifying circumstance to one who feels for the honor and interest of our country, to find a British prime minister boasting in parliament, as the earl of Liverpool has done, that the infamous outrages of their troops in America had been much more vindicated and justified by Americans, in American newspapers, than they have in England itself. Still more of humiliation did I feel at his assertion, that the people of the District, of which they have taken possession, people of the state of Massachusetts, had manifested a disposition to become British subjects! I still indulge the hope that he has magnified into an expression of popular sentiment, the baseness and servility of a few individual sycophants, who may have intended merely to save their property from plunder, by paying court to the British commanders. Deeply as was the sordid spirit of faction has degraded Massachusetts, I will not yet believe that the lofty sentiment of Independence has been extinguished in the souls of any considerable portion of my countrymen, or that they have sunk low enough in the scale of creation, willingly to become subject of Great Britain."

GEN. BROWN partook of a public dinner at Philadelphia on the 18th February, given in his honor by the citizens without distinction of party, to which also the officers of the army and navy were invited. Wherever the hero appeared he was received with cheers by the people, and the U. S. troops at that place repaired to his quarters and saluted him. The toasts drank on the occasion were patriotic—the general's was—"All true Americans by whatever name distinguished."

The general having retired, the following toast was given:

Our distinguished guest and fellow citizen; major general Jacob Brown—may he long live, in health and happiness, to enjoy the esteem of his country, and the laurels he has won in her service.

LAW CASE.—Charleston, Feb. 9. The Launch belonging to the frigate Hebrus, which was deserted by her crew at Edisto Inlet on Sunday the 29th ult. and afterwards taken possession of by the militia, was brought up to town yesterday. A question has arisen as to who are the legal captors; whether the U. States' barges, who drove off and afterwards captured the crew of the launch, or the militia, who found her thus deserted upon the beach, and took possession of her before the barges could return from the capture of her crew. She mounts a 12lb carronade and five handsome brass swivels, and has a number of water casks on board.

ILLUMINATION.—From the National Intelligencer of February 20, 1815.—On Saturday last, several national salutes were fired, and the "star-spangled banner" of America, and the red-cross flag of Britain were displayed together near the city hall, during the day.

At night a general illumination took place, and a number of rockets were fired, some of them made, by one of our citizens, in imitation of the British Congreve.

The following proclamation of the mayor gave the signal for illumination:

A Proclamation.—The president of the United States has this day announced, by proclamation, the return of PEACE.

In the late contest for the sacred rights and honor of our country, the American army and navy have, by the most replendent achievements, exalted their character as high as ambition could desire.

The American people have never failed to prove, that although naturally inclined to peace, they can brave with a manly spirit the horrors and calamities of war, when they consider that respect violated which is due not only to themselves but to every independent nation.

A retrospect of our affairs from the commencement to the cessation of hostilities, though the scene is occasionally checkered, cannot but afford a heartfelt gratification to every lover of his country.

Whereas, in consideration of these things, the glory of our country and the return of happy peace, it is becoming to make due acknowledgments to the Supreme Ruler of events, and to shew every rational demonstration of joy: Therefore, I James H. Blake, mayor of the city of Washington, by the authority and with the advice of the corporation of said city, do enjoin on the citizens generally to illuminate their respective houses this evening, commencing at 7 and ending at 9 o'clock. And I do require the public officers of this corporation to be vigilant in the preservation of peace and tranquility.

Given under my hand at the city of Washington, this 18th day of February 1815.

JAMES H. BLAKE, Mayor.

N. B. A salute will be fired at 7 o'clock, which will be the signal for commencing the illumination.

Pers. From the Pittsburg Commonwealth. A gentleman hearing the extravagant pretensions of the British commissioners at Ghent, trusted our ministers would give them a very lake-onic answer. All who have heard the names of PERRY and MACDONOUGH will take the force of the allusion.

A correspondent who has seen the Montreal puff about 1500 barrels of pork (which are said to have frightened the Yankees on the Niagara frontier) wishes to be informed whether they contained part of the hogs that sir George Prevost drove to the Plattsburgh market.

We presume that they did not, as sir George did not stay there to have them killed.

Phil. Free. Journal.

Plattsburgh, Dec. 3, 1814. The following articles were found on board a small transport sloop, which accompanied the British fleet as far as the Isle La Mott, in September last, and there sunk, in consequence of being too heavy loaded.

The enemy carried off eight eighteen pounders which they had mounted on a small battery erected on the west side of the island; but permitted the sloop to remain, which was afterwards raised by the inhabitants of Isle La Mott, and the stores taken out, viz.

25,000 Sand bags,

500 Fascine knives,

An anchor, weighing 500 lbs.

A 6 inch cable; 504 feet in length,

A large quantity of shot and shells,

200 shovels and spades,

100 pick axes,

20 kegs powder.

A number of bls. of hard bread,

A barrel of sugar, &c.

The sloop was formerly a packet between this place and Burlington, and taken by the enemy, in this harbor, in their excursion up the lake in 1812—it has since been restored to its former owner.

It is worthy of remark, that capt. Lloyd, who in a 74 gun ship, refused to fight the President frigate—with the assistance of a frigate and a sloop of war, succeeded in destroying a privateer (the Armstrong) of 9 guns, with a loss of about 300 killed and wounded! By which it appears he can do something.

Captain Downie (says the "Plattsburg Republican") publicly declared while on the Isle La Mott, in the hearing of 20 or 30 American citizens, that in thirty minutes after the first fire, he would be on board the American ship Saratoga. The first fire from the Saratoga proved fatal to capt. Downie.

Sir George Prevost predicted that Macdonough would strike his flag in 20 minutes, and held out his watch to see when the time should expire. Admiral Cochrane promised to several Americans, to break the "egg shell" at fort M Henry [Baltimore] in two hours; but looked very foolish when those persons, after twenty six hours bombardment, told him that "the time was out!" The fool Dacres, of the Guerriere, told his men to prepare a hogshead of molasses to treat the Yankees, who were to be his prisoners in fifteen minutes. So they go on, though every lesson they have had one would think might have taught them better.

It is said, that our public and private armed vessels have been directed to sink, instead of burning the vessels they do not think proper to attempt to send in. A considerate and prudent measure, as we expect that the ocean, especially on the British coasts, might otherwise be covered with the floating wrecks of half-consumed vessels, to the great danger of our flyers, in the night! This will keep the road clear!

The London Times of July 2, speaking of the "painful events" that have happened at sea, and of the pride with which we look forward to other victories, says—"There is but one way to turn the current of their thoughts and efforts from their present direction; and that is, to crush their growing navy to atoms. The enterprize may be twice as difficult now, as it would have been (had our means then permitted,) in the first month of the war; but it will infallibly be ten times as difficult, nay, it may become absolutely impossible, if it is delayed till a future war. Now America stands alone; hereafter she may have allies. Let us strike while the iron is hot."

Now many people in the United States have thought it ungenerous that we declared war against England when she had few allies. I very much question if the said persons would be pleased, if, "in the course of human events" it might be our fortune to act in concert with the "royal Bourbon," or "magnanimous Alexander." We may yet hear of "Russian influence."

But—as to crushing our little navy "to atoms"—the British want better hells and Bet. ter hands to do it—when too strong for us, we can generally run away. In all other cases we beat them shamefully. We acknowledge this is vexatious, and not a little humiliating to the pride of John Bull, and therefore allow him to grumble.

Major-general Keane, it is now reported, is to be sent out to beat the Yankees into submission.

"But should our haughty foe expect
To give our boys a caning,
We guess they'll find our lads have learnt
A little bit of training."

Englishmen of all countries. The crew of a British privateer taken at the southward by our gun-boats, though consisting only of 26 men, (colored and uncolored) is stated to have originated in no less than sixteen different countries and islands, viz: From England 6, Bermuda 3, Ireland 2, Portugal 2, Italy 2, Scotland 1, Nova Scotia 1, Germany 1, Sweden 1, Prussia 1, Norway 1, Malta 1, Corsica 1, France 1, Cuba 1, Martinique 1.

While Great Britain employs such motley groupings of "black spirits and white, blue spirits and grey," against us, to kill, take, sink, burn and destroy, one would think she need not be so tenacious of her claims of the perpetual allegiance of her own subjects, and so violent in her charges against us for harboring and naturalizing in time of peace, the natives of other countries in a civil and legal way. [Colum.]

The bird of war. Another anecdote is given, by the Baltimore Patriot, of the gallantry and courage of the cock, a bird consecrated for his valor by the ancients to Minerva, the goddess of war. The account of his crowing in the battle of Trafalgar, and on board the Saratoga and Eagle, in the battle of Lake Champlain, attest his martial spirit, and show that his claims to the characteristics of vigilance and bravery have not diminished since the earliest accounts of fabulous history. After an allusion to the three cheers given by the brave chanticleer on lake Champlain, the Patriot says:

Another fact of a similar nature, may not be uninteresting. During the bombardment of Fort M-Henry, at a time when the explosions were the most tremendous, a rooster mounted a parapet and crowed heartily. This excited the laughter and animated the feelings of all present. A man, who was severely indisposed and worn down with fatigue, declared that if ever he lived to see Baltimore, the rooster should be treated with pound cake. Not being able to leave the fort, the day after the bombardment he sent to the city, procured the cake, and had fine sport in treating his favorite rooster.

Copy of a letter from the secretary of the treasury to his excellency David R. Williams.

Treasury Department, 29th December, 1814.

SIR—I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 22d instant, informing me, that the legislature of South Carolina has placed the sum of 260,000 dollars at the disposal of government in aid of its finances. The state of South Carolina, always conspicuous for her public spirit and liberality, has, on this occasion, given a proof of patriotism which is well calculated to exalt her own character, and to inspire every member of the union, with a spirit of the noblest exertion, in the common cause.

I hastened to communicate your letter to the president, and it was peculiarly grateful to me, to find, that he cordially united in the sentiment of respect for the state of South Carolina, which I have the honor to express.

I am, with great consideration and esteem, sir, your most obedient humble servant,

A. J. DALLAS.

Copy of a letter from the secretary of the treasury to Thomas Lee, esq. comptroller-general of South Carolina.

Treasury Department, 29th December, 1814.

SIR—I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter, informing me that the legislature of South Carolina had passed to the credit of the government, in the state bank, a sum of $60,000 dollars as an assumption of the state's quota of direct tax, which it is proposed to lay for the ensuing year. This act of patriotism and liberality is in unison with the general character of South Carolina, and merits the cordial acknowledgment of the government as well as the applause of the nation. It presents a noble example to every member of the union, and in that respect, as well as in respect to the fiscal aid which it affords, must be essentially serviceable.

I am, with great respect, sir, your most obedient servant,

A. J. DALLAS.

Thos. Lee, esq. comptroller general, &c.
Charleston, South Carolina.

A Dinner to general Ripley, was given at Pittsfield by the republicans of Berkshire county and officers of the U. S. army, in respect for his bravery in the battle of Niagara, the defence of fort Erie, and the sortie from that work, in which he received his wounds. Among the toasts are the following:

The Constitution—May its enemies meet the fate of the Java.

The army and navy—their deeds of valor have evinced to the world that we are a match for Great Britain without allies.

New England vs. New States—verdict for the defenders at New-Orleans.

The bayonet and the shuttle—let us aim to manage the latter in peace, as well as we have the former in war, and our country will be soon rid of British goods and British influence.
